REMARKS AT U.S. CONFERENCE OF MAYORS WINTER MEETING, 1/29/1999

FIRST LADY HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON REMARKS AT U.S. CONFERENCE OF MAYORS WINTER MEETING CAPITAL HILTON HOTEL WASHINGTON, D.C.

MRS. CLINTON: (Applause.) Thank you. Thank you very much. Thank you so much. Thank you, Deedee (ph), for that kind introduction. Thank you for your leadership and the work that you have done on behalf of issues that are critical to young people and the future of our cities.

I am very pleased to join all of you. I know that you had a meeting searlier today at the White House with my husband. I know that not just because I knew what was on his schedule, but I could hear you. (Laughter.) The enthusiasm and the energy that was on display in that meeting just permeated the entire White House complex. And I think that's a good sign for the feelings that we have about what is happening in our cities, their promise, their growth. And it is very exciting for me to meet with the people who are leading the effort on behalf of the cities of our country. I also will certainly take to heart Deedee's (ph) offhanded suggestion that I join you again. I understand after Mayor Morales' description of what you're going to be doing in New Orleans, that you're going to be deluged with requests for people to be part of that meeting, and to enjoy some of that good New Orleans hospitality.

You know, the time in which we meet here in 1999 is really an opportunity for us to take stock of where wee are as a nation, the progress that we've made to celebrate it, to be grateful for it, but to look forward as well to the kinds of cities, the kind of country we want to have in the 21st century.

The work you do every single day on behalf of your cities is such that I know you're thinking about not just the present, although that is very demanding of your time, but what your contribution will be in your service to ensuring that our cities -- your city -- has the kind of future it deserves to have for the people who live there.

There are many who have worked with you who have really paved the way. But you are serving at a unique moment in history, and your presence here in our capital is a strong reminder that America needs its cities, and our cities need a strong partnership with the federal government. That is what my husband and his administration have tried to do, and I'm grateful for the support that you have given to those efforts.

Many officials from the administration have already addressed you and have spent time with you. But this partnership that has been forged between the administration and the cities of our country is one that must last far into the next century. It has produced tangible benefits for the people you serve, and we know it has produced benefits for the quality of our life together.

Many, many people have worked very hard with the president to create this partnership. But there are two that I want to recognize, and you know them well because of the work that you have done with them. And that is Mickey Ibarra and Lynne Cutler (ph). I thank them very much for their work. (Applause.)

I was also pleased to be announced into the room by Mayor Webb, who said to me "You know, I'd love to stay but I've got important business. My Broncos are in the Super Bowl," and he had to leave to catch a plane, and I bid him Godspeed, because after all, first things first. And so he is on his way.

I also am very grateful to all of you for the U.S. Conference of Mayors Award to spotlight outstanding city arts programs for at-risk youth. I understand that you had a gala last night and I understand that Mayor Riley (ph) was recognized, as well he should be for his leadership.

But I have been in many of your cities visiting many programs that have used the arts for many purposes. Certainly we now understand -- perhaps better than we did even 10 years ago -- how the arts can be an engine for economic development and opportunity. And we certainly understand better today how the arts can have an extraordinary impact on the future of young people, particularly those who are at-risk.

It is up to all of us to ensure that our schools and our cities provide opportunities for children from all backgrounds to both appreciate the arts but also to have their talents tapped into, so that they can make a contribution. We recently recognized a number of city programs around the country at a celebration in the White House, and story after story was told about how the work that was being done in these arts programs that many of you have supported and sponsored was making a difference between lives of hopefulness and lives of despair.

Young people learn differently. Not everyone learns the same way, and many young people have talents that would otherwise go untapped if they were not exposed to an arts program in the school, in an afterschool program and in a summer program. And so I want to thank you for making the arts once again central to the life of our cities and the life of our young people in those cities.

After all, what is a city but people? And throughout our history, we have seen cities come and go, we have seen them reach great heights, we have seen them fall back and be lost forever. But what we know is that hardworking citizens, citizens who have a vision of the future, have created the great cities of our nation and the world.

And within those cities, it is vibrant neighborhoods that really create the life that we look to when we think of a city. And you understand better than many of us in our country today the enormous challenges that cities face as we approach the 21st century. But you can also take great credit -- and I hope you will -- for what you have achieved in the last several years.

I saw some of you wearing a button about our cities being safer. They are safer, and that is one of the tangible results of the partnership between a president who understood what needed to be done to give you the tools and resources you required to meet the most basic need of any city -- making sure our citizens were safe from crime and violence. I want to thank you, because when we see those statistics come out, as we have now for five years in a row, that crime and violence is going down nationwide, we know that it is because of the hard work in the cities and neighborhoods of America taking the tools that this president provided, that is really making the difference. So I want to congratulate you and thank you.

I also want to thank you for putting education back in the very middle of our nation's agenda. You are making extraordinary progress in turning some of the toughest big city systems around, and you're making progress in continuing to work to ensure that medium-sized and smaller cities have the schools they need to prepare our children for the 21st century.

The president's initiative to put 100,000 new teachers in the classrooms really mirrors the initiative to put 100,000 police on our streets.

And they come from the same impetus -- that we understood very clearly when Bill ran for president that our police were both outmanned and outgunned, that we had to have more police, we had to have tougher gun laws, we had to have a Brady Law, we had to once again right the imbalance that existed between criminals and law enforcement.

Well, in our classrooms, we have too many children in too many classrooms overwhelming our teachers. It is very difficult when you have, as we do in many city systems -- and not just our giant cities, but medium-sized and even smaller cities -- children coming into the classroom for whom English is not only not their first language, but who are part of classes where you have 10, 12, 50, 100 different languages and dialects represented.

We know that we can only deal with this problem at the classroom and school level, and part of what the president's initiative is intended to do is to give you again the tools and the resources to make a difference in your school systems. We have to close the education gap if we expect our cities and our nation to thrive into the next century, and that means ensuring that all children have access to a quality education. And that's impossible to imagine achieving if there are so many children in the early grades that they cannot get the attention they need to get their feet solidly on the ground when it comes to learning English, reading well, being able to move forward in the education system.

You've also done a tremendous job in revitalizing our urban centers with economic opportunity, and unemployment is the lowest it's been. And we have certainly made good on the promise that was put forward to the cities that we would work hand-in-hand with you to make sure welfare reform was achievable. And we've got a lot of good success stories to point to. But I know and you know that there's still a lot of hard work to do. When it comes to welfare reform, we have to remain vigilant. We have to be creative and flexible in determining what works best. And because of the extraordinary economic opportunity that's been created in the last six years, we have taken care of large numbers of people who could be moved into work and we've had some very gratifying results. I was recently talking with one of the CEOs who's part of the president's welfare to work effort, and he told me how surprised he was at how successful they've been in moving people into jobs who were coming off of welfare. But you know and I know that there is a group of people for whom the easy part is over; there's a lot of tough work ahead to meet the multiple needs of people -- both medical needs, health needs, psychological needs, education and training needs -- that we're still going to have to try to find better ways of addressing.

You also know that despite the extraordinarily good news about unemployment, there are pockets of unemployment that are still far too high in our cities, people who have not yet been brought into the mainstream of the economy, and we have to do all we can to make that a reality as well. And in the president's budget there are some very creative ways of addressing that remaining problem of how we make sure that prosperity is spread to every American in every part of our land in every city, no matter what its size. (Applause.)

We also have unfinished business when it comes to health care. And often the cities are on the front lines of determining what to do about this. Your partners in the counties are also often left with trying to figure out how we will cover people who have no insurance. And there is a lot of work that we're still going to need to do. But certainly making it possible for all of our children to have insurance coverage through the president's initiative, the children's health insurance program, so-called CHIP, is very critical to the health of the cities and their budgets and the counties as well. Because we know that there is a lot of uninsured, uncompensated care that is going to end up somewhere, or else we will begin turning people away.

Now, county hospitals, city hospitals have been the last resort for many people who have nowhere else to go. In the president's budget, we're also going to try to put in some funding that will help create more of a network among public health centers, city and county facilities, charitable institutions so that we can have a true health-care safety net. But you will have to be part of making sure that the proposals that are put forth are practical and workable, and we will need your guidance on that.

If we look at this whole range of issues, whether it is crime and violence going down so our neighborhoods and our parks are finally thankfully getting safer, or whether it is education and the challenge we face with our children, unemployment and economic opportunity in every poor neighborhood, in every Indian community - - everywhere Americans need that extra enterprise and assistance -- whether it is continuing the work on welfare reform, whether it is also focusing on health care so we are sure that we have a financially stable system that truly provides quality health care to all Americans, this is the kind of family agenda that is worthy of the American people that the president outlined in his state of the union. It is an agenda that is worth fighting for and will bear results on behalf of our people.

But you know better than most that if we just pass programs, even as challenging as it may be to pass some of the programs that are part of the president's family agenda and his agenda for the cities and livable communities, that still really falls on your shoulders to make sure that whatever is passed in Washington is implemented effectively at the local level. You are the ones that truly make those programs work, that bring communities together, that create systems of consensus-building that will enable us to put into action what we all dream of, which is to continue building on the progress that we have seen made in the last six years.

I think we have a special opportunity to focus our communities on the kinds of places we want them to be in the years to come, because we do stand at this unique moment. We're at the end of the century, we're at the beginning of a new millennium. Now, if we do nothing about that, it will come and go without any of our interference or even acknowledgment. The century will end, the new millennium will begin.

But I think it gives us a tremendous opportunity to take stock of who we are, where we are, and where we want to be. People around the country are beginning to really get excited about this end-of-century, end-of-millennium time period. Certainly there are reasons why we would have this occurrence commemorated, whether we did it on a community basis or not. There are going to be millennium products, we've got the Y2K issue we have to deal with. Some people are already planning their New Year's Eve parties and the like.

But part of what we hope that the White House Millennium Council can work with you to achieve is to really take this time and do more with it, to really focus on the kind of people we want to be and the kind of cities we want to have. What do we treasure in our communities? What do we want to preserve for future generations? What values do we want to bring forward into the next century? How can we define ourselves as citizens of cities, states, of nations, of world?

I think people are expecting something to happen, so why not harness this millennium moment and the spirit that it engenders for the common good? That was really the question that the president and I asked ourselves more than a year ago, because we saw this as a great opportunity. So we began working on it in the White House, and we put together the White House Millennium Council. And we adopted the theme "Honor the Past, Imagine the Future."

And the president has invited states and communities -- non- profit, Indian communities, corporations, public agencies -- all citizens to participate in efforts that strengthen our democracy, improve our communities, and enable us to give lasting gifts to the future.

We have found that one of the best ways to imagine the future is to preserve what we value of the past, the artifacts and historical sites, the documents that really tell the story maybe of your city, of your state and certainly of our country.

Last year the president proposed and Congress approved a $30 million Millennium Fund to save America's treasures. And that is an effort that maybe you've read about. I've been in some of your cities and in many smaller communities in the last year talking about it and trying to bring attention to some of the treasures that are literally in every corner of our country. I've had a wonderful time doing that. And everywhere I've been, I've met people who understand how critical it is to use this time to save what we value so that we do have values to bring into the future.

Our partners in this effort are the National Trust for Historic Preservation and the National Park Foundation.

Each of them have different responsibilities and different obligations under their various missions, but both are committed to helping all of us, working with the White House and working with you, to really bring attention to the treasures that we have that are worth saving.

And I was delighted because we had told the Congress that if they would appropriate a federal share that we could use in this effort we would match it. And I kind of took a big gulp when I said that. But at the end of this year, we'd already raised more than $30 million in private funds to go with the public funds that the Congress had appropriated, because there is a great outpouring from individuals, from corporations, from foundations and other institutions that recognize the significance of this moment to help save America's treasures.

What I have found in the places I have visited that a lot of these treasures don't just offer some kind of dry history lesson, but really give us a glimpse into our future as well. Visiting Thomas Edison's laboratory in New Jersey, for example, you could see the spirit of ingenuity that has fueled progress in America for centuries. Stepping inside Harriet Tubman's home in Auburn, New York, I could understand better the legacy of courage that she brought to the journey she made time and time again to bring slaves to freedom.

As I toured the Breed Street Shoal (ph) and the wonderful Los Angeles Theater in Los Angeles, I could once again sense the civic pride that has served generations of immigrants and an earlier community in Los Angeles in an area that is now revitalizing and for which the arts will be a prominent part in that revitalization.

These are not only individual memories -- they are part of our national story. So I'm pleased that once again this year, the president's budget will request another $30 million to save America's treasures. And he's also recommending that funds be appropriated to ensure that the photographs and the paintings and the documents in our federal collection are available to all citizens on the Internet. This gives us a wonderful opportunity to reach out to schools and public libraries everywhere you live, to enable people who might not have the opportunity to travel to the Archives and the Smithsonian to see over the miracle of the Internet what is here and what marks our history. You know better than I that each community has unique resources -- treasures if you will -- that should be restored and preserved. Whether it's a town hall in a city square or even a city park or a monument, there is something there that you can use to help teach the people in your community about their past and ask them questions about the kind of future they want to be part of building.

I'm also pleased to take this opportunity to unveil a new millennium initiative, called Millennium Community. This is a program to bring official recognition to cities, towns, communities and Indian tribes that are planning millennium projects that honor the past and imagine the future. I'm glad that we've worked to develop this program hand-in-hand with you, the U.S. Conference of Mayors, and also with the National Association of Counties, the National League of Cities, the National Association of Towns and Townships, and the Bureau of Indian Affairs. Their leaders are here with us today, and I want to thank them.

In his state of the union, the president said "I want to invite every town, every city, every community to become a nationally recognized Millennium Community by launching projects that save our history, promote our arts and humanities and prepare our children for the 21st century."

Now every community has a different way of approaching this. We've already learned from working with some of you. Some may want to launch a local effort to save a treasure, to raise the funds necessary to do so. Others may want to join the Mars Millennium Project, which is challenging schoolchildren around the nation in conjunction with NASA to design a community that they would want to live on on the planet Mars in the year 2030.

Some might want to join the Millennium Trails project, which we hope will build 2,000 new trails that will help us explore our environment and mark our heritage along the way. Richmond, California, for example, will celebrate its new "Rosie the Riveter Park," to pay tribute to the women who worked in the World War II shipyards. The people of Casper, Wyoming, will restore some of the important trails that run through that town, such as the old cattle trails that stretch from Texas to Montana. Minneapolis is planning to celebrate its heritage with snowshoe races and dog-sled rides through downtown. And Denver, Colorado is committed to preserving historic sites and districts.

In Little Rock, the students there will be learning about the millennium through a new curriculum in the city's public schools. And Canton, Ohio, will revitalize a six-block downtown area, the centerpiece of its millennium celebration. People in Seattle, Washington, are adding over 20,000 trees to that city's landscape. And Alaska is promoting cultural events that encourage Native Americans to draw on the wisdom of elders and the idealism of the young. We have some of those examples in this Millennium Communities handbook, which I hope that you will take with you, share with the people in your city and your staff, and look for ways that you might find suitable to pursue some millennium activities in each of your communities.

We're also seeing a lot of interest in cities that are sister cities of those around the globe who want to strengthen their ties to their sister cities by promoting international cultural and educational exchanges. Chicago, for instance, is inviting foreign artists to visit the city and paint murals throughout its neighborhoods.

Today I'm also announcing two new tools that I hope will help you develop your own millennium plans. The first is the handbook, which I hope -- we've tried very hard to make it so -- is a practical guide for civic leaders, groups, and individuals. Another tool is the new web site which Bell South, partnering with the U.S. Conference of Mayors, is creating. The web site for Millennium Communities will allow designated communities to share ideas and projects. And we hope that you will want to be so designated, that you will want to be part of this great national effort as we stand on the brink of this new century.

You know, I've been reading a lot about what people were doing at the turn of the last century and even the last millennium. And certainly if you try to think back 1,000 years, there were many differences, of course; but there were some similarities that we might also overlook. People even at that time were imagining the future. They were creating new art forms, they were building cities, they were forming reading groups -- those who could read. They were designing new systems of cultivation, they were spreading religion from every corner of the globe. They were remapping the world as they were discovering it.

And they were -- importantly -- saying "No!" to the doomsayers. You know, there's always a split when there is an important point in time. And we will see it again here in our country and around the world. There are people who face the future with fear, even with apocalyptic vision. That was true 1,000 years ago, as some monks would travel around Europe telling people the end was near and that they should come together and cower in fear.

But the other human impulse is the one that really held sway, and that is the feeling of hopefulness and opportunity and challenge in confronting the future.

Well, we know that there are those among us in our country who are stockpiling water and canned goods and worrying about Y2K, a problem that we do have to take seriously, but which I expect to be resolved with the hard work of many of you. But what I think is the more likely feeling that you will find in your communities, as I have found it around the country, is this sense of opportunity and hopefulness. And there is much we can do to build on that.

People are much more likely to come together across racial or ethnic or linguistic lines if they feel hopeful about the results that would flow from their taking what they see as a risk to try to be vulnerable and work with others unlike themselves. People who are hopeful will want to clean up monuments or create new parks, because they see a future where that will define the quality of life for themselves and their children. People who are hopeful are really those Americans who are true to our tradition of hopefulness.

With all of the difficulties and challenges our country has confronted, we always fall back on a sense of hopefulness. And that is what I hope will happen again in this coming year. Because we do, as we look back on the last six years of progress, have a lot to celebrate. We have a lot of work ahead of us to continue building on safer cities and reformed schools and welfare workers working and all that we can see at the ground level that is occurring. So let's not just celebrate with parties and champagne -- as much fun as that will be -- let's add to the celebration some contemplation, some commemoration and really look for ways that we can bring our communities and our country together.

If we imagine the kind of cities we want for the 21st century, we know we're on the right track to achieving them, and we know that the road is a very challenging one. But we have hope, because we have seen what hope and hard work can produce. When every citizen has the opportunity to live a productive, fulfilling life, and when our communities can live together in peace, without the sound of gunfire, with people feeling free to walk through a park on a beautiful summer evening; when children are learning the skills they will need to compete in the global economy, and when there is public space that invites us in and a feeling that we are contributing to the common good of our future together, then we will know we have given gifts to the future that will stand the test of time.

So let me invite each of you to use this opportunity to become a Millennium Community, to work with us in creating this moment in time that we hope will stand for the symbol of what we as a nation want to create for our future. I thank you for what you have already done and I look forward to working with you for what we can do together. Thank you very much. (Applause.)

REMARKS BY PRESIDENT CLINTON AND FIRST LADY HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON TO U.S. EMBASSY STAFF AFTER MEETING WITH JORDAN'S NEW KING ABDULLAH, 2/8/1999

U.S. EMBASSY, AMMAN, JORDAN

(Applause.)

PRESIDENT CLINTON: Thank you very much. Thank you. Please be seated. Thank you.

MRS. CLINTON: Thank you all. I just want to express our personal appreciation to all of you for the incredible support that you have given to us in this very difficult time as we have come here to pay our last respects.

I also, on a personal note, wish to acknowledge the deep sadness that the entire American people feel. You see before you four leaders of our country who really represent many, many Americans who could not be here, but whose hearts are with the people of Jordan. I also hope you know that the friendship between our families on a personal level and between our countries is very, very deep. And we will be there in friendship and support in the months and years ahead.

As I was visiting with Queen Noor a few minutes ago and expressing our personal condolences, I could not help but think how much better off this region and our world would be if not only leaders but all of us stopped to think, "How would King Hussein have acted? What would he have said?" If we could bring the same sense of humility and openness and stability to all of our relationships that he brought and that I saw him bring not only to presidents but to every person he encountered. That would be one way to honor the legacy of this extraordinary man and this very great leader.

Thank you, as part of the American community and the Jordanian nationals who work with the Americans here at the embassy, for representing our country in good times and hard times. We're grateful to you for the service that you give.

Thank you very much.

(Applause.)

PRESIDENT CLINTON: Thank you very much. Thank you. Thank you.

Ladies and gentlemen, I would like to begin, if I might, by thanking President Bush, President Carter and President Ford and this congressional delegation for coming on very short notice all the way to Jordan to make a clear and unambiguous statement about our regard and respect and gratitude to King Hussein and the people of Jordan. I thank them very, very much. (Applause.)

I want to thank Ambassador Burns and all of you in the embassy community for representing us in a difficult and challenging part of the world and a wonderful country. I thank all the Jordanian nationals who work for the United States. We are honored by your efforts, and when Jordanians and Americans work together in our embassy here in Amman, they symbolize the partnership that we hope will always exist between the United States and Jordan.

Most of what I would have said has already been said so eloquently by those who have spoken before. I would just like to make a couple of points about King Hussein and about King Abdullah. First of all, Hussein really did bring people together. You know, I was looking at the four of us, here we are, two Democrats; two Republicans. We have agreed on many things. We've disagreed a thing or two over time. But we know that America's interest and America's heart were close to this king and this country.

I looked at the Israeli delegation today -- (laughs) -- I could hardly believe my eyes. (Laughter.) All the candidates for prime minister were there. (Laughter.) They were all walking together. You know, I don't know if they talk at home, but they were all talking here. (Laughter.) I thought, it was as if Hussein was hugging them all, you know. (Laughter.) It was really a beautiful sight. People coming from all around the world, countries that are at each others' throats here meeting in peace and friendship and the sanctity of the umbrella of this great man. He worked with every American president since President Eisenhower -- an amazing thing.

The second thing I would like to say is that he really was driven not by the title he had but by the responsibilities it bore. And he was ennobled not by the title, but by the strength of his own character and his vision and his spirit. It was unbelievable to me when we talked right before we started this last round of peace negotiations at Wye, and I knew how ill he was. He said, "Well, I would be willing to come down there if you think it would help." I said -- (laughs) -- "If I think it would help?" I said, "This whole thing's about to come apart. Of course it would help." I said, "If you come down, they won't have the courage to walk away here without an agreement." And so he did. And he took a house, and some days he could only work 30 minutes or an hour, but every day we needed him in that long Wye peace accord, he was there. Every day he was needed, he was there, no matter how sick he was, no matter how bad he felt.

And his son, the new king, told me tonight, he said, "You know, the truth is it put some days on his life, because he was doing what he believed in." And all the icy atmosphere of those tense talks would immediately disappear when Hussein walked in the room, because all the differences and animosities and grievances seemed small in the face of this very large presence. And it was almost as if the more frail his body became, the more powerful the essence of his spirit was.

Every Jordanian citizen can be proud of that -- can be proud the on every continent and every country of the world, people said, "That is the sort of person we all ought to be."

The last point I would like to make is that I would like to join the previous speakers in saying that I have great confidence in the young king of Jordan. I had a very good meeting with him today. He clearly understands his mission. He said in the most moving way, he said, "I and all of my brothers and sisters have absorbed our father's teaching. We know what we are supposed to do. And I intend to do it." And he said it in a way that exuded the quiet, humble confidence that I saw so often in his father.

And finally, just on a purely personal note, I was deeply honored to be able to bring Queen Noor's mother and father over on the airplane with me. They are in this audience tonight, because we are leaving from here. And I think we should let them know that our prayers and support are with them, and we are grateful that their daughter, a daughter of America, has been a magnificent queen of Jordan and a great friend to the people of both countries.

Hillary and I have had so many unbelievable experiences as a result of the great honor of serving in the White House. But among those I will treasure most every day of my life are the times we had with the king of Jordan. He made us all a little better, and always will.

Thank you very much. (Applause.) END

REMARKS ABOUT RELIEF EFFORTS FOR VICTIMS OF HURRICANE MITCH AND HURRICANE GEORGES, 12/16/1999

LOCATION: WASHINGTON, D.C.

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON DELIVERS REMARKS ON RELIEF EFFORTS FOR VICTIMS OF HURRICANE MITCH AND HURRICANE GEORGES

FEBRUARY 16, 1999

CLINTON: Oh, thank you, thank you very much.

(APPLAUSE)

Thank you.

(APPLAUSE)

Thank you. Thank you very much. I am so pleased that this day has come, and I understand some of you were a little delayed at the gate, for which I apologize, but we're delighted you are all here to be part of these announcements this afternoon.

We owe a great debt to my friend and someone who has done a tremendous job on so many issues, Tipper Gore, for immediately bringing public attention to what had happened in Central America. And I want to thank her personally again for that.

Secretary Albright, thank you for your leadership and for shepherding American diplomacy into the new century so well and with such strength and purpose.

Secretary Caldera, thank you for being here. I enjoyed very much seeing you when I was on the ground visiting our troops, and it gave me such a tremendous sense of pride to see the men and women of the United States military performing as well as they always do, given whatever assignment they undertake.

I, too, want to thank Brian Atwood and the entire USAID family for the work they do every day around the world, and in particular what they've done here.

I also want to say a special word of appreciation to Maria Echaveste, who headed up the president's task force that has led us to the recommendations that we are making today in response to the need that was reported to the president.

And the people who put on the green eyeshades and find the money over at OMB, I want to thank all of you for working double and triple time to make this day happen.

To the members of Congress, to the ambassadors and other members of the diplomatic community, and particularly to the all NGOs represented here, I want to thank you for your strong presence on behalf of the people of the United States. As you served on the front lines to help open roads, restore homes, bring services back into isolated communities, literally, to save lives in Central America and the Caribbean.

This has been one of the most extraordinary international efforts in recent memory. When I visited the region shortly after Hurricane Mitch, I not only talked with American troops about what we were doing, but I saw firsthand supplies and troops coming from other countries, literally around the world. On the tarmac in Honduras I saw a plane from Japan and another filled with food and clothing that just happened to be from Little Rock, Arkansas. I don't know that that was planned.

(LAUGHTER)

CLINTON: But more than that, I was moved by the meetings and conversations that I had with the leaders of these countries and with the citizens who have embarked on an extraordinary effort to rebuild not only the physical infrastructure of their countries, but more than that, the sense of hope and optimism that had recently come to this region after so many years of bloodshed and war, disappointment and pessimism about the future.

A woman in Nicaragua told me that the hurricane, in terms of its damage, was worse than both the war and the earthquake that leveled Managua. And when I obviously expressed some surprise at that rather remarkable statement, she said that it was because, unlike the terrible problems with the earthquake or even unlike the years of unrest and war, certain parts of the country were left untouched and life could go on somewhat normally.

But here, the entire country was affected, entire crops wiped out, villages destroyed, parents left without jobs or food for their children.

So that it's clear that these nations that we are addressing today need not just short-term humanitarian relief, which we have come forward with in an extraordinary show of support, but they need long-term reconstruction. Which is why when my husband first announced U.S. assistance to help the people of Central America get back on their feet and look again toward the future with hope and optimism, he made it clear that we would stand with the people of these countries for the long haul. And today, we are making good on that promise.

I'm very pleased that the president has proposed funding of nearly $1 billion to help our Latin American neighbors repair and rebuild in the aftermath of these disasters. This proposal will bring our total commitment to over $1.2 billion, and it will help in several critical ways.

First, if this funding is approved, 17 million people will have help protecting themselves from the contagious diseases that too often rear their ugly heads in the aftermath of natural disasters. Seven hundred health clinics will be up and running, and more than seven million people will have access to clean water and proper sanitation.

Second, this proposal will help create jobs, boost economies, and rebuild entire communities.

When I was in Central America, I heard time and time again that the leaders -- this new generation of leaders in these countries -- understood very well that it was not enough just to stop the fighting, as important as that was; to reach peace agreements; and to be able to establish the rule of law and democracy.

CLINTON: But instead there had to be sustained investments in the well being of the people of these countries -- investments in education to raise literacy rates, in health care to lower maternal and infant mortality rates. And it is this progress which has been so much put at risk because of the devastation of these hurricanes.

I remember very well in my meeting with the leadership of Guatemala and the promises that were made when the peace agreements were signed two years ago. Those promises were not just about decommissioning weapons, as important as that is. Those promises included investing more money in education and in health care and in making it possible for the people who are now free of war to feel that they have a future worth building.

In Nicaragua alone, 60 percent of the citizens are unemployed as a result of the hurricane. For farmers whose crops were wiped out, the president's proposal will provide important tools to help restore production. For people in rural areas, it will reinstall the roads and bridges that bring produce to markets and create jobs.

And for 70,000 entrepreneurs, it will provide the small loans needed for micro businesses. This is something that we feel very strongly about in this administration, from the president on. And some of you may have been in the White House last week when we held our second annual awards ceremony here in the United States to honor micro enterprise.

But we know that it's a tool for building lives and creating markets where none exist before. And so this proposal will include such funding.

The president's proposal will also help rebuild the roads, homes and schools that people rely on every day. For example, 6,000 new open air schools will be created and school supplies will be put in the hands of 200,000 children.

Finally, this proposal we hope will help our neighbors prepare for their future in several different ways. They need more help in creating better systems to deal with disasters. That is one of the strong recommendations I heard as I met with the leaders in these countries. Some countries were better prepared than others, but all can use some additional help.

They also need help in shifting the way they do agriculture, not only to more productive crops, but to help manage the environment better. Some of the damage was caused by the impact that erosion had created in many of the areas so that the rains literally had nowhere to go but to create mudslides. So there needs to be more thought given as to how to create productive agricultural land with perhaps new crops and at the same time undo the damage that erosion and environmental degradation has created in order to be better prepared for future storms.

CLINTON: This package also includes $50 million to help the Dominican Republic, Haiti and the eastern Caribbean restore the housing, health care and jobs destroyed by Hurricane Georges. I saw again personally when I visited the Dominican Republic and Haiti the continuing effects of the damage from Hurricane Georges in both of those countries, and this will be a very welcome addition to the work that those countries are doing.

This proposal also includes an additional $10 million to help the victims of the recent earthquake in Colombia, a devastating earthquake whose damage is still being assessed in some remote areas of Colombia.

From the start, our obligation to help Central America and the Caribbean recover from these tragedies has transcended politics, and so, too, must it now. This entire proposal is the product of close bipartisan consultation with members of Congress from both houses and both sides of the aisle. I'm very heartened by the support that Republican members have given, many who also made the trip to see for themselves the effect of these hurricanes. And it is our hope that Congress will quickly act to pass this proposal.

On March 8th, I will accompany the president on his trip to Nicaragua, Honduras, El Salvador and Guatemala, where he will see the destruction firsthand, where he will also meet with people who've been affected, as well as meeting with American troops and American NGOs. And he will hear what all of you in this room know so well -- how important it is for us to extend a helping hand to our neighbors to help them heal and rebuild.

I know that many of you who have worked in Central America and the Caribbean for many years understand how devastating the effect of these hurricanes have been. We understand how at just the moment in time when all of these countries were poised for the future this devastating natural disaster has seemed to come out of nowhere and set them back with respect to pursuing their dreams and their hopes.

Well, we want to be friends and partners in rebuilding those dreams and hopes, and that is what the president's proposal attempts to do. It is why I hope, in addition to what we're able to provide through this supplemental appropriation, the American people will continue with their generous support as well.

With every road or bridge we help rebuild, with every crop that is planted, with every school and health clinic that is rebuilt, we want to send a strong message to the people of Central America and the Caribbean who have overcome so much in recent years that we will continue to stand by them as we move toward the future together.

We understand that the future of the United States is linked to the future of the people of these countries, and it is a great point of personal pleasure for me to be part of a process that helps bring together our countries and the people of countries and our governments on behalf not only of the reconstruction work that needs to be done, and not even just on behalf of the humanitarian relief that must continue, but on behalf of this new, strong friendship among our peoples.

Thank you very much.

(APPLAUSE)

"Good Morning America," ABC, 2/17/1999

DIANE SAWYER: After weeks of speculation, yesterday Hillary Rodham Clinton finally made it official that she is giving careful thought to running for the U.S. Senate next year in New York, so running out of the White House. Undoubtedly, the Democratic Party won't find anyone with better name recognition, and her recent approval ratings have been as high as 70 percent. Not only that, a new poll has her ahead in a race against perspective candidate New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani by 11 points. If the election were held today, she'd probably win.

Pres. BILL CLINTON: America's First Lady.

DIANE SAWYER: (voice-over) But name recognition cuts both ways. It's a notoriously bloody battlefield -- New York politics. And Mrs. Clinton would be sacrificing the moral authority she's amassed for the future on human rights, women's rights, children's rights, for trench warfare over the past -- things like Whitewater and Travelgate.

HILLARY CLINTON: I am happy to answer the grand jury's questions.

DIANE SAWYER: (voice-over) Not to mention the still bitter memory of that early work on health care reform.

ALEC BALDWIN: Hillary Rodham Clinton possesses unique talents, skills, and experience.

DIANE SAWYER: (voice-over) On the plus side, a big name means big donations. And Mrs. Clinton knows the glories and bruises of the campaign trail. Last year, in an 11th-hour push for Charles Schumer, now senator, she showed she can speak the language of New York, whether it's on Park Avenue or out in the minority communities.

HILLARY CLINTON: This is about who leads New York. This is about who sets the agenda for the 21st century.

DIANE SAWYER: (voice-over) And the unknown? Well, how would New York's powerful Jewish community react to her advocacy of a Palestinian state last year? And what will she be saying about the polarizing issues like the death penalty and welfare? No one doubts that Mrs. Clinton is strong enough for the race, just look at what she's weathered in public life. The only question is this -- Given what she's weathered in public life, why would she be running? Why?

Joining us now to talk about this possibility, from Washington, ABC's Cokie Roberts, co-host of This Week and from Indianapolis, ABC News political analyst, George Stephanopoulos.

George, let me begin with you. It's begun. "New York Daily News," a columnist says that Mrs. Clinton, if she's going to run, has to learn when you say it takes a village you means Greenwich Village, and if you come to New York, you have to wear black, black, black and leave your old accessories at home, for instance, the big one in the Oval Office. Is Mrs. Clinton serious about taking this on?

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS, ABC News Analyst: I don't think so. I think she must be having an awful lot of fun with all the speculation over the last few weeks and she's clearly putting out the word she's thinking about it, but all the questions you raise in your piece still come back. Even if Mrs. Clinton could win, why would she want to go through an amazingly tough race in her last years in the White House, and why would she want to be the junior senator from New York when she could be one of the senior statesman in the world after leaving the White House.

DIANE SAWYER: Why would she be teasing people either?

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS: I think she's got a sense of humor, number one. I think number two, it's flattering. Number three, it's been, frankly, a helpful story line to have in the post impeachment phase, Mrs. Clinton out on her own and being flattered in the New York press and being built up in the New York press. It puts out some independence with her from the President. So I think it serves a lot of purposes even if she doesn't decide to run.

DIANE SAWYER: Cokie, what's your vote on this, and what are the quirks of a Senate race?

COKIE ROBERTS, ABC News: The quirks of a Senate race are awful any place, and in New York they are really awful. Just ask Geraldine Ferraro. The truth is I think Mrs. Clinton -- I only know from what I read and some of her friends I've talked to -- I think she might start to consider it seriously. What happens to potential candidates is everyone starts telling them we need you, the state needs you, the party needs you, you can do it, only you can do it. And it starts to go to people's heads. And why not. I think -- I just hope she has some good friends who only care about her and not the Democratic Party who can give her advice about what's the right thing for her. Because putting yourself through this campaign after what she's been through to me is just plain nuts.

DIANE SAWYER: George, we've seen how she handles the President under attack, stoically and strongly. How is she when she's personally under attack?

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS: She's tough. I mean, Diane, there's no question about that. She likes to come out fighting. It's both the lawyer in her and the political Paul in her. But also at the same time, she doesn't like it all that much. One of the images I have in my head is that whenever we had big debates or big events on the campaign trail, she would sit back in a room and wait for it to be over. She does the fight, but she doesn't always enjoy it.

DIANE SAWYER: George Stephanopoulos, Cokie Roberts, thanks so much, for stopping by this morning. It's 17 past.

Charlie?

CHARLES GIBSON: Thank you very much, Diane.

ANNOUNCER: February 17, 1999.

CHRIS WALLACE, ABC News: (voice-over) Her husband figures she's a natural.

Pres. WILLIAM J. CLINTON: I think she would be terrific in the Senate, but that's a decision that she'll have to make.

CHRIS WALLACE: (voice-over) And the media is thrilled at the prospect.

JACK NEWFIELD, "New York Post": I think it would be the most exciting Senate race in the country. It would be Viagra for the media.

CHRIS WALLACE: (voice-over) But is she ready for the rough and tumble of a New York political campaign?

DON IMUS: And if she wants to run for the Senate against the most vicious person on the planet, Rudolph Giuliani, what is she nuts?

CHRIS WALLACE: (voice-over) Tonight, Hillary Clinton and the 2000 Senate race.

ANNOUNCER: From ABC News, this is Nightline. Substituting for Ted Koppel and reporting from Washington, Chris Wallace.

CHRIS WALLACE: Let's admit right from the outset that what we're indulging in tonight may be one of the better examples of hype. After the year the first family has been through, it would certainly be understandable if they want to have a little fun toying with the idea of one more campaign. And after the year Mrs. Clinton has been through, it would certainly be understandable if she wants to have a little fun being courted as a candidate.

But even if it turns out to be nothing more than a brief diversion, the thought of the First Lady throwing herself into the cut and thrust of politics New York style, well, it's too enticing to ignore. It would be historic, the first First Lady ever to run for office. It would be compelling theater, Hillary Clinton slugging it out on the issues in between bites of bagels or cannoli. (ph) And it would be great politics, a true liberal taking on everything the Republican Party can throw at her. As Nightline's Chris Bury reports, in New York they can hardly wait.

CHRIS BURY, ABC News: (voice-over) The headline left little doubt what was on the minds of New Yorkers this morning. From the tabloids to the ticker on Times Square, the prospect of Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton was the talk of the town. The notion of a match up between Mrs. Clinton and New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani is pure catnip for politicians and pundits desperate for a post-impeachment fix.

Sen. CHARLES SCHUMER, (D), New York: I think Hillary Clinton would be a great candidate and a great senator and what she has told me is that she is now beginning to look at this seriously.

Sen. JOHN McCain, (R), Arizona: Many of us who are political junkies salivate at the prospect of a Clinton-Giuliani race for the United States Senate.

JACK NEWFIELD: It would be Viagra for the media.

CHRIS BURY: (voice-over) Even the President has not discouraged speculation.

Pres. WILLIAM J. CLINTON: I think she would be terrific in the Senate but that's a decision she'll have to make.

CHRIS BURY: (voice-over) And Tuesday's statement from the First Lady that she will give careful thought to a potential candidacy in order to reach a decision later this year has only ginned up the rumor mill.

Sen. CHARLES ROBB, (R), Virginia: It turns out I am the sole representative of the United States Senate. Of course that's only the current United States Senate that I'm referring to in this particular instance.

CHRIS BURY: (voice-over) Today, pushing Social Security reform with the President, Mrs. Clinton ignored even veiled references to any change in careers. But ABC News has learned she sought advice from experienced New York political pros as soon as her husband was acquitted. "New York Post" columnist Jack Newfield says Mrs. Clinton's statement has already frozen the race.

JACK NEWFIELD: Congresswoman Nita Lowey is the only other alternative the Democrats have at this point and she has already said she would immediately step aside if the First Lady wants to enter the race. I think Hillary Clinton's interest, and I think there is interest, is going to freeze the field until April or May or June when she finally decides.

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON, First Lady Of The United States: Now, every New Yorker, I believe, has a tremendous stake in this -- men, women, children of all ages, all backgrounds, races, ethnicities because one of our great challenges moving into this new century is are we going to do this together?

CHRIS BURY: (voice-over) The buzz about Hillary began with her wildly successful fundraising efforts on behalf of Charles Schumer and other Democratic candidates. Now, they are urging her to run, knowing her approval ratings have never been higher. That she is an Illinois native living in Washington and registered to vote in Arkansas makes little difference in New York.

BOBBY KENNEDY: The first senator from the state of New York, Rupert King, was from Massachusetts.

CHRIS BURY: (voice-over) That's how Bobby Kennedy answered the carpetbagger question when he moved to New York just to capture a Senate seat in 1964. But even if New Yorkers are historically open to out of towners, why would Mrs. Clinton want to run given what she has been through lately and knowing she will have enormous and lucrative opportunities ahead? The First Lady's former press secretary believes all this attention validates Mrs. Clinton's standing as an independent political figure.

LISA CAPUTO, Former Hillary Clinton Press Secretary: It's got to be enormously flattering and I think in many ways that this notion and interest in having the First Lady run for a Senate seat does reaffirm that she is a person of substance.

CHRIS BURY: Flattering as such attention might be, Mrs. Clinton also knows there are plenty of good reasons not to run. To begin the Clintons face millions in legal bills and she would give up the opportunity to make a lot of money. And a campaign in New York, particularly against a tough opponent like Rudolph Giuliani, would likely be far more ferocious than anything Hillary Clinton has faced in the White House.

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON: Are we ready? Well, let me thank all of you for coming.

CHRIS BURY: (voice-over) As First Lady, Hillary Clinton has hosted only one full scale White House press conference, nearly five years ago, to answer questions about Whitewater. Since then her media exposure has been carefully choreographed for the most positive and often glowing results. But this is the kind of coverage Bill Clinton has attracted and his wife could anticipate in a city whose press corps prides itself on being tough.

JACK NEWFIELD: She is going to be sitting in Katz's Delicatessen with her mouth full of knish and 30 guys are going to be yelling at her to explain the $100,000 profit she made in the commodity trade in Arkansas in 1979.

CHRIS BURY: (voice-over) In fact, just this morning the popular New York radio personality Don Imus offered a taste of what Mrs. Clinton might expect.

DON IMUS: See, the last time we talked to her she was playing three card monte with billing records in the book room and jerking your chain on Wall Street and hiding suicide notes and she wants to run for the Senate against the most vicious person on the planet, Rudolph Giuliani? What is she nuts?

CHRIS BURY: (voice-over) This afternoon, Mayor Giuliani, who has yet to announce his candidacy for the Senate, refused to speculate about a possible match up with Mrs. Clinton.

Mayor RUDOLPH GIULIANI: I don't have anything to say to her. I mean she's got to decide what she wants to do and I'll decide what I want to do and rather than play your game, I'll do it on my own terms.

CHRIS BURY: (voice-over) In New York, politics is a rough and tumble game. Consider last fall's Senate race between Charles Schumer and Al D'Amato. The most hotly contested question was whether D'Amato had called Schumer a putzhead.

AL D'AMATO: I have absolutely no knowledge of ever having made that statement.

Sen. CHARLES SCHUMER: Al D'Amato used a cheap slur against me and then when asked lied about it.

LISA CAPUTO: I think Hillary Clinton is such a fighter. She's got a real tough skin and I think that if she could weather what she's weathered over the past six years, I think that she can just about weather anything.

CHRIS BURY: Two other popular first ladies, Jackie Kennedy and Eleanor Roosevelt, were also encouraged to run for the Senate and of course neither did. Some of those who have spoken with Mrs. Clinton in recent days are convinced she will ultimately follow their example. But until her decision is known, the political world will be asking is Hillary Clinton serious about a Senate race or is she just teasing.

This is Chris Bury for Nightline in Washington.

CHRIS WALLACE: So, does Hillary Clinton have what it takes to run? We'll ask three veterans of New York political warfare, when we come back.

(Commercial Break)

CHRIS WALLACE: Joining us now from New York, former Republican Senator Alfonse D'Amato. Joining us from Los Angeles, Jerry Nachman, former columnist and editor of the New York Post. And joining us here in Washington, Mandy Grunwald, political and media advisor to both the President and the First Lady and to New York Democratic Senator Patrick Moynihan.

Mandy, let's start with Don Imus' question, is she nuts? After everything she's been through, why in the world would Hillary Clinton sign up for what promises to be a brutal campaign?

MANDY GRUNWALD, Former Clinton Advisor: (Washington) Well, if she wants to do it it would probably be for the same reason she's done a lot of things in her life, because she thinks it's the place she could make a difference. You know, there are a lot of issues she's worked on, children's issues, women's issues, and I think if she decides to make this run she's not going to focus on the New York Post or what the traffic's going to be like but really what the job would be and what she could get done. And yeah, you're always a little bit nuts to run in New York and it's always tough, but she's dealt with Ken Starr. I think she could probably deal with the New York Post.

CHRIS WALLACE: Senator D'Amato, imagine that you're the Republican candidate in this race. Would it be delicate to run against the First Lady? Would you have to pull your punches?

AL D'AMATO, (R), Former Senator New York: (New York) You'd have to certainly be careful, particularly if you have a woman. But let me say she has a natural constituency. She'd rally a tremendous amount of support and she'd be a very formidable candidate and I think the media would just have a wonderful time, great, great theater and it would be a donnybrook. She would have everyone throughout the country following this race. The New York press corps is one of the toughest. Is she up to it? I think that she's weathered some pretty tough storms and she would be a tough candidate for anyone.

CHRIS WALLACE: You say it would be a donnybrook. We'll get into detail later, but briefly, how would you run against her? What are the one or two points that you think as a Republican you would want to make against her?

AL D'AMATO: Oh, I think you'd have to take, go right to her strength and indeed, she has been a great advocate on behalf of women and children, etc., and some of these programs are great programs, but someone has to pay for it. And so you'd have to try to take it on the plane as to who's going to pay and where does the money come from and will another Democrat elected to the Senate help New York as opposed to having someone who will be in the majority and who will be able to deliver for New Yorkers. You have to take it up scale. You cannot take it rough and tumble. Chuck and I had a rough and tumble one. I think you have to be very careful.

CHRIS WALLACE: Would you consider taking on this race yourself?

AL D'AMATO: Well, I'm looking at it. I said it's a decision we haven't made yet but if I decide to run, it will be notwithstanding whether the First Lady makes the race or not. Would she be formidable? She certainly would. I don't know of anyone who would be tougher on the Democratic side.

CHRIS WALLACE: Jerry Nachman, as a former New York street reporter, if this race happens, it doesn't get any better than this, does it?

JERRY NACHMAN, Former "New York Post" Editor: (Los Angeles) No, Chris, it makes me homesick just thinking about it. It would be the Ali-Fraser fight. This battle, potential battle between Hillary Clinton and Rudy Giuliani, probably on paper, has to be one of the great bouts of all time.

CHRIS WALLACE: How rough does it get for Mrs. Clinton both from the Republicans and from the New York media?

JERRY NACHMAN: The most fascinating thing to me, Chris, is the possibility of Mrs. Clinton getting the nomination without a primary. I mean Senator D'Amato can attest to what a leg up that would be for any Democrat to go into the general election without having gone through the combat and having spent the money of going through a Democratic primary in New York.

CHRIS WALLACE: Mandy Grunwald, what about this issue which Chris Bury referred to in his story? As First Lady when things got hot, Hillary Clinton could just disappear for weeks on end. As a Senate candidate, she'd have to be out there and answer the questions every day.

MANDY GRUNWALD: Sure she would. I mean the New York press corps is very demanding and she would have to play the game their way. Yes, there would be some things that would be a little bit different because she's First Lady. But if she makes the decision to run, she would have to understand what a campaign in New York is all about. And I think she'd be ready for that. I think it's not really whether she can handle it, it's whether this is the best place for her to make a difference. I think we'd all love to watch it. I mean I think you hear that from all of us. And if you think that a campaign between Hillary Clinton and Rudy Giuliani would be interesting, I'd love to see one between Hillary Clinton and Al D'Amato. Now that's, that you'd buy tickets for.

CHRIS WALLACE: Al D'Amato, let me ask you, how tough would it be to run in New York? You've done it many times. How tough would it be for Mrs. Clinton? What would she have to learn? What would she have to watch out for?

about and certainly there are going to be people, you've heard it, who will be bringing up questions of stock transactions and missing documents and all of that kind of thing. So that's the theater of it. But when it really comes down to, it's going to come down to do people believe that she will make a difference, a positive difference for the state and I think if Rudy Giuliani is the candidate, he's got a tremendously formidable record. I'm proud of my record as having been able to deliver. And so we would contrast those things. And then the question being in the majority and being able to deliver. So would it be nasty? Yeah. I think the media's going to look to stir it up and we do our own part in it and it would be a slug fest, Rudy Giuliani, Al D'Amato or some of our other great candidates.

CHRIS WALLACE: We have to take a break here but when we return, let's look at some actual issues. Just what are Mrs. Clinton's strengths and weaknesses? And we'll continue our discussion in a moment.

(Commercial Break)

CHRIS WALLACE: And we're back again with Senator Alfonse D'Amato, Jerry Nachman and Mandy Grunwald.

Mandy, you just heard the senator refer to it. If Mrs. Clinton runs, won't she be hit with all of those old scandals, her role in Whitewater and Travelgate and the billing records?

MANDY GRUNWALD: You would think if the Republican Party have learned nothing else in the last couple years it's that that strategy has driven it to its lowest poll ratings in its history. I think Senator D'Amato might say that the Whitewater hearings he conducted contributed to the weakness he faced as a candidate for reelection last year. If that's the best they've got which is, you know, kind of recycling all that stuff again and trying to defeat her on scandal, I think she'd kill 'em.

CHRIS WALLACE: Senator D'Amato, is there still life in those old scandals?

AL D'AMATO: Well, I think it really would come from not the candidate himself, but I think the media's going to bring it up. I think that's just an inevitable fact. I mean I've run so many times in New York and yet the old things are just hashed and rehashed. But Mandy's right, if a candidate tries to take her on on the issues of Whitewater, etc., they lose. They're going to have to take her on on the issues that really New Yorkers are going to look at -- do you want to be just taxed to death and more spending and more big government and can we contrast Mrs. Clinton's positions and what it will cost people for many of the programs that she advocates?

So I think it's going to be more intellectual and more on the basis of who can deliver, who can get the job done, who's going to be better for New Yorkers? It'll be a great race.

CHRIS WALLACE: Mandy, let me ask you about that. I mean can't Mrs. Clinton be attacked as a big government liberal? Won't she be hung around her neck, the failed health reform plan?

MANDY GRUNWALD: Well, I think she learned a lot from the, from her episode in 1994 with health reform and has shown with the work she's done on other health care issues taking a smaller approach to things like HMO reform, the HMO Bill of Rights, children's health coverage, that she learned from that experience. I think she very much is part of what she and the President have always called the third way, the sort of centrist place they've taken the Democratic Party. And there, I think people would be in, actually, for a lot of surprises on questions like welfare reform where she very much supported what the President did. I think you'd be surprised that, you know, where she, where you might call her a liberal and where you might call her a conservative. I think she's very much where the President is on a lot of these issues and I think New York has made that choice over and over again that they support the direction that the Clinton administration has taken this country.

CHRIS WALLACE: Jerry Nachman, Mrs. Clinton has also gone on record supporting a Palestinian state. Not good politics in New York, is it?

JERRY NACHMAN: No, she's going to get hit very hard on that. But I think I want to agree with Mandy that on the issues she will do very well, Chris. It's going to come down to how brittle is she because she's going to get questioned on everything. Remember, if it's a Rudy Giuliani-Hillary Clinton election, there are going to be lots of questions about these two quirky marriages that these two candidates come from. There will be all the questions on Monica, all the things that the politicians say that it's not right to go into, the press will go into, and the question is Hillary, who's been able to duck as First Lady is going to have to learn from her husband. In 1992 when Clinton came to New York for the primary, he got pummeled mercilessly and we as journalists saw that this was the most resilient politician we'd ever seen. It was during the New York primary in 1992 where the Gennifer Flowers stuff, the I didn't inhale stuff, the draft dodgers stuff all came to a point and he won the New York State primary anyway. She could take a lot of lessons from her husband on how to get through those tough days.

CHRIS WALLACE: Mandy, how does Mrs. Clinton handle all that and why in the world, again, why would she want to?

MANDY GRUNWALD: I just keep laughing about the irony that we've spent the last year watching a group of people trying to kick the President out of office and now we have a group of people trying to drag her in. It's just, the juxtaposition is unbelievable. I think she could handle whatever she needs to handle. She has shown this year an unbelievable grace under pressure and has handled publicly things that nobody in the world has ever had to. If she wants this job, I have every faith that she'll know how to go about dealing with all the various things in the New York press, in the New York political system that she needs to. It isn't going to be easy. I don't take it lightly. I think the real question is whether this is the right choice for her. And she's going to take some time to figure that out.

CHRIS WALLACE: All right, well let's talk about that. As long as she's out there it freezes the race, Mandy, for any other Democrat. How long, realistically, does she really have to make up her mind?

MANDY GRUNWALD: I don't know if there's any specific time line. She said she'd make a decision later this year. I certainly think, you know, having worked for Senator Moynihan three times, I'd like the seat to stay Democratic and I'm sure he would, too. Hillary Clinton would be the best chance, I think, of assuring that, but Nita Lowey would be a strong candidate and there are probably others out there. I don't think there's a magic date. I think Hillary should take the time to make this decision right and if she doesn't run I assume she'll work very hard for whoever decides to.

CHRIS WALLACE: We've only got about 30 seconds left so I'm going to ask you all to share it and be brief about it. We know all the reasons why Mrs. Clinton would flirt with it, but let me ask, and start with you, Senator D'Amato, when it comes right down to it, what do you think, will she or won't she?

AL D'AMATO: Oh, I think there's a great chance she's going to run. She becomes her own person. I've always thought that money is not the thing she's going to be looking for, it's going to be prestige on her own. So it's a good likelihood.

CHRIS WALLACE: Very briefly, very briefly, Jerry Nachman.

JERRY NACHMAN: I'm not sure she has the belly for what the press is now doing jumping jacks waiting to do to her.

CHRIS WALLACE: And Mandy Grunwald, yes or no?

MANDY GRUNWALD: I don't know. I don't think she knows yet and I hope whatever choice she makes she gets, gets some of the fun that she hasn't had in the last year.

CHRIS WALLACE: We're going to leave it there and I think that's a great place to leave it. Mandy Grunwald, Senator D'Amato, Jerry Nachman, thank you all very much for joining us tonight.

And I'll be back in a moment.

(Commercial Break)

CHRIS WALLACE: Tomorrow on World News Tonight with Peter Jennings, a closer look when a country's entire genetic makeup is on file in a computer database, is it the perfect lab or the end of privacy?

And that's our report for tonight. I'm Chris Wallace in Washington. For all of us here at ABC News, good night.

"Sunday Morning," CBS, 2/21/1999

THE COMEBACK

CHARLES OSGOOD, host:

If Hillary Clinton were a stock traded on the big board, the sell-off would have come about four years ago. She was blamed for pushing too hard and too fast for her controversial national health-care program. She was being investigated, along with her husband, in a co-- complex land deal which few people understood. She was suspected of hiding evidence from her previous work at an Arkansas law--law firm. She was the butt of jokes from late-night comics and political cartoonists, and had become sort of a dart board for the then triumphant Republicans who took control of Congress in 1994. But as any stock analyst will tell you, what goes down can sometimes come roaring back up. The Comeback is our cover story from Martha Teichner.

(Footage of Hillary Clinton)

Mr. SAM DONALDSON (ABC News): Mrs. Clinton, everybody wants to know if you're going to run for the Senate.

MARTHA TEICHNER reporting:

(Voiceover) She will decide, say her friends, when she has done what one calls her due diligence. This past week, every move she made was watched, not for body language clues as to the state of her marriage, post-impeachment, post-Monica, but to guess her political intentions. Never mind all the speculation. Her advisers insist the decision will be made, not in a matter of days, but weeks, possibly even months, when she has immersed herself totally in the pros and cons of running for the Senate in New York.

Unidentified Pollster #1: If the next election for US Senate in New York state were held today, whom would you support if the candidates are Rudy Giuliani, the Republican, and Hillary Clinton, the Democrat?

Unidentified Woman #1: Hillary Clinton.

(Footage of poll takers on telephones)

TEICHNER: (Voiceover) But if the election were held today, according to the polls, Hillary Rodham Clinton would beat New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani by 11 percent.

Unidentified Pollster #2: Do you have a favorable or an unfavorable impression of Hillary Clinton?

Unidentified Man #1: Favorable.

(Visuals of covers of poll printouts; poll printout form; footage of poll takers working at computers)

TEICHNER: (Voiceover) On Tuesday night, in a new survey conducted by the Marist College poll in Poughkeepsie, New York, New York state voters liked Mrs. Clinton by better than a 2:1 margin. The numbers seem to reinforce the notion that the first lady is the only person to emerge from the White House scandals with her reputation intact, if not enhanced.

Unidentified Pollster #3: You say Hillary Clinton. OK.

TEICHNER: (Voiceover) We wanted to know if that's really true, so we asked the Marist pollsters to tack on a question for us.

Pollster #3: Do you like Hillary Clinton more or less than you did two years ago?

TEICHNER: (Voiceover) Five out of 10 people liked her more, only two out of 10 liked her less. But what was interesting was why.

Unidentified Woman #2: She's a woman of character. I think she knows what she wants, and she's gonna get it.

(Footage of pollsters)

TEICHNER: (Voiceover) How she handled the scandals was not the main reason people liked her more. It was significant, but the number one reason was, paraphrasing, 'how she has grown as a person.'

Unidentified Man #2: After watching her for a couple of years, she's just a very smart lady.

Pollster #3: Why do you like Hillary Clinton less now than you did two years ago?

Unidentified Woman #3: Why?

Pollster #3: Yes.

Woman #3: Because I just don't understand why she'd stay with her husband and let him make a fool of her.

(Footage of pollsters; computer screen; Teichner and Miringoff)

TEICHNER: (Voiceover) The like-her-less people, by almost 2:1, said it was because of Mrs. Clinton's handling of the scandals, their feelings about her mostly tied to their opinions of the president. But again, overwhelmingly people liked her more than they did two years ago.

Mr. LEE MIRINGOFF (Director, Marist Poll): So there's a sense now of the beginnings of an assessment of her in her own right.

TEICHNER: (Voiceover) Lee Miringoff is director of the Marist poll.

Mr. MIRINGOFF: I don't think it's, you know, an issue of a traditional role vs. a non-traditional role. I don't think it's an issue just strictly of Hillary Clinton vs. Hillary Rodham Clinton. I think it has to do with what she represents.

TEICHNER: (Voiceover) The turnaround has been remarkable.

Mrs. HILLARY CLINTON: I just want to say before I go in that I am happy to answer the grand jury's questions.

TEICHNER: (Voiceover) This is, after all, the only first lady ever hauled before a grand jury. In January 1996, the same month she testified on Whitewater issues, her approval ratings registered disapproval, another first for a first lady. The figures were 36 percent negative, only 26 percent positive, according to a CBS poll.

Ms. GAIL SHEEHY (Journalist): She's so allergic to scrutiny that she causes more scrutiny.

(Footage of Sheehy; visual of Vanity Fair cover and inside pages)

TEICHNER: (Voiceover) Journalist Gail Sheehy's look at the Clintons' marriage was featured in February's Vanity Fair, and she's writing a book about the first lady.

Ms. SHEEHY: Being very not forthcoming with information all the way through only created more and more suspicion and gave more and more ammunition to their enemies on the right.

TEICHNER: (Voiceover) The numbers stayed negative all the way to the Democratic National Convention in August 1996.

Mrs. CLINTON: It takes a family, it takes teachers, it takes clergy. Yes, it takes a village.

TEICHNER: (Voiceover) After Mrs. Clinton spoke in Chicago, the climb back up began. So did her transformation. She never stopped traveling the country, no, the world, speaking on behalf of children and women, but there were no more pictures of her embattled and defensive on the evening news.

Unidentified Reporter #2: Did you have anything to do with this, and what...

Mrs. CLINTON: I--I--it's the first I've heard of it. I know nothing about it. I have no comment about it.

(Excerpt from "Rosie O'Donnell Show")

TEICHNER: (Voiceover) "The Rosie O'Donnell Show" was another story. Her friends and staff say she is just reaching the audience she needs to reach, middle-class women. Her critics say she has repackaged herself as a traditional first lady.

(Photograph of Mrs. Clinton and O'Donnell)

Ms. SHEEHY: I think that Hillary has very cleverly figured out that having been a projection for Americans since she came into the White House and whether they demonize her as the, you know, yuppie wife from hell, or whether they see her as, you know, the most graceful stand-by-your man wife, sh--if--if it's going her way, the less she says, the better.

(Footage of Bill Clinton; Mrs. Clinton; visual of Vogue cover; footage of Mr. and Mrs. Clinton)

TEICHNER: (Voiceover) By the time the Monica story hit in January 1998, Mrs. Clinton's numbers were already way up, 45 percent positive, 27 percent negative, according to a CBS poll. She stood by her man and they went up even more. As the sordid soap opera played itself out on Capitol Hill, the first lady looked better and better, even if that's not how she felt. The editor of Vogue is quoted as telling celebrity photographer Annie Liebovitz that she wanted Mrs. Clinton to look like British royalty on the December cover. She is now enjoying her highest ratings ever, almost 3:1 positive. But compare Hillary Clinton to other first ladies, say Barbara Bush, who was polling 20:1 positive even when her husband was losing to Bill Clinton in 1992.

KATHLEEN FRANKOVIC (CBS News): It's fair to say that she was, in fact, being judged by different standards than other first ladies, but part of that is probably because she was acting as first lady in a different way from other first ladies.

TEICHNER: (Voiceover) Kathleen Frankovic heads the CBS News polling unit.

FRANKOVIC: It's very clear that the--the views that people have of Mrs. Clinton are very much affected by the partisan lenses they look through and they're also very much affected by gender.

TEICHNER: Republican men, according to the polls, still can't stand Hillary Clinton by more than 3:1. Republican women are almost evenly divided. Democrats, on the other hand, men and women, support her by 10:1 or more, so by anybody's calculations, Mrs. Clinton is a major asset to the Democratic Party.

TEICHNER: (Voiceover) She proved herself an indispensable campaigner and fund-raiser before last November's elections. If she ran for the Senate, she couldn't be out there campaigning for other candidates. As fiercely private as Mrs. Clinton is, her friends and staff say she is not intimidated by the prospect of having old wounds reopened if she runs. She is concerned about protecting Chelsea, and whether the Senate is the right place for her. Former New York Governor Mario Cuomo has another idea.

Former Governor MARIO CUOMO (New York): She could be a great vice president, especially if the Republicans make Elizabeth Dole their vice presidential candidate, which I suspect is what's going to happen.

(Split screen footage of Mrs. Clinton and Mrs. Dole)

TEICHNER: (Voiceover) Right, Clinton and Dole all over again. A friend of the first lady's remarked, 'It's too cute by half.' But the point is, she has choices, perhaps more than her husband will have.

Mr. CUOMO: If she didn't run for the Senate, she would be--and didn't run for anything--she would be one of the most important people in this country anyway.

(Excerpt from Mrs. Clinton's graduation address at Wellesley College)

Mrs. CLINTON: Take up the challenge of forging an identity that transcends yourself. Transcend yourself and you will find yourself.

TEICHNER: (Voiceover) These were Mrs. Clinton's words to graduating seniors at Wellesley College, her alma mater, in 1992. They could be a blueprint to how she's always tried to live her life.

Mrs. CLINTON: Throw yourself into the world and make your voice count.

(Footage of Mr. and Mrs. Clinton)

TEICHNER: (Voiceover) They will surely be a blueprint to the choices she makes when Hillary Rodham Clinton emerges after eight years of her husband's presidency, and it's finally her turn.

THE FIRST LADY IN NORTH AFRICA

DIANE SAWYER: First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton and her daughter Chelsea are in the middle of a two-week tour of northern Africa. Their second spring break in Africa together ever. They're going to visit three African countries beginning first in Egypt. We thought we would look at some of the not so home movies.

HILLARY CLINTON: Countries which help girls to be educated and give girls good health care, good nutrition, good opportunities..

BARBARA WALTERS: You know she's acting as a good will ambassador. But what fascinating countries to see. I mean to be able to take Chelsea and do that kind of sight seeing in Tunisia and Egypt and Morocco, very exotic, exciting place.

DIANE SAWYER: It's true. And Chelsea always emerges in the middle of this, too, as someone with such poise and grace in these situations. We see her going into a mosque now cutting ribbon. She also toured a bazaar and had a great time just interacting with some of the people in the bazaar, we're told. And she not only that while she was there, was very relaxed talking about the fact that she might indeed run for Senate.

BARBARA WALTERS: Uh-huh. We thought she would have a respite there. She was still asked about it. She says she'll cope with it when she gets home.

DIANE SAWYER: Do you think she'll do it? Do you want to bet?

BARBARA WALTERS: What do you think?

DIANE SAWYER: Not sure. Still can't believe it.

BARBARA WALTERS: You have to say yes she will. I don't want a I'm not sure bet.

DIANE SAWYER: I bet I don't think so.

BARBARA WALTERS: I bet she will. What are we betting?

DIANE SAWYER: Done, we'll be back.

(Commercial Break)

DIANE SAWYER: So before you go, I'm not Hispanic, I'm not so young, I'm marginally hip, can still audition for "The View"? Please?

BARBARA WALTERS: We're going to say later on we have now narrowed it down to three. We're going to ask people to stop sending tapes. We got thousands of tapes. But we're down to the, you know, the last few.

ANTONIO MORA: If Tony and I put on dresses it won't work either?

BARBARA WALTERS: That's a flop.

DIANE SAWYER: The "Tootsie" approach.

BARBARA WALTERS: I love being with you. We tease each other, but I really do enjoy it. And I'm so glad it's just for one day.

DIANE SAWYER: I don't suppose tomorrow you want to sleep in, are you serious?

BARBARA WALTERS: Very serious. I'll get up and watch you.

DIANE SAWYER: Please do watch. Tomorrow we have astonishing surgery. You got to see this. In the womb, on twins, will it work?

We will see you tomorrow.

A FAIR PAY ROUND TABLE, 4/7/1999

REMARKS BY PRESIDENT BILL CLINTON AND FIRST LADY HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON AT A FAIR PAY ROUND TABLE
450 OLD EXECUTIVE OFFICE BUILDING
WASHINGTON, D.C.

(Applause.)

MRS. CLINTON: Thank you, and welcome to the White House. Please be seated. We are delighted to have you here this afternoon to help commemorate Equal Pay Day, which is tomorrow. I'm glad to see so many both new and old faces in the fight for equal pay.

And we know that this is a struggle that has taken some time. We've made a lot of progress, but I hope that we'll eventually see the end of Equal Pay Day because the goal will have been achieved, and we won't have to have any sessions like this, where we continue to talk about it.

We know that women who walk into the grocery store are not asked to pay 25 percent less for milk, they're not asked by their landlords to pay 25 percent less for rent, and they should no longer be asked to try to make their ends meet and their family incomes what they should be by having 25 percent less in their paychecks.

Many people have worked for the goal of equal pay over the years, and I want to thank some who are here, starting with our wonderful secretary of labor, Alexis Herman, as well as a great advocate for equal pay and women's rights -- it has nothing to do with the wife he has or the daughters he's raised -- but Senator Tom Harkin, who is a real champion. (Applause.) Also Congresswoman Eleanor Holmes Norton is here with us -- (applause) -- EEOC Chairwoman Ida Castro. (Applause.) And I want to thank two local officials who are here, Lewiston (sp) mayor Callie Terra (sp) and Georgia representative Sharon Beasley (sp), for their contributions as well. (Applause.)

I also want to pay a special word of appreciation to Linda Chavez-Thompson and the AFL-CIO, Gail Chaeffer (sp) and the Business and Professional Women, Susan Bianchi Sand (sp) and the National Committee on Pay Equity. Together, these groups have helped lead the fight for pay equity, and they will be organizing hundreds of grass- roots events around the country tomorrow.

In a few minutes, we are going to hear from our four panelists. They will be able to tell you in their own words why they are here. But when you have heard from Professor Nancy Hopkins, Sonya Tyler (sp), Caroline Gant (sp) and Patricia Higgins, you will appreciate, as I think all of us who have ever been in the world of work do, the struggles and the challenges and the victories that they have faced and the way they represent so many other women.

One of my staff members was home for the holidays last week, and there was a cartoon stuck up on the refrigerator in her house. I mean, that is where everybody keeps all of their reminders, their namesakes, their children's drawings and all the important documents, at least in my experience. And her mother, without knowing anything about this day and this particular commemoration, had cut out a cartoon, which showed six people sitting around a conference-room table, all in suits, all wearing glasses, all men. And one of them announces, "Gentlemen, we must cut our expenses in half, so I am replacing each of you with a woman." (Laughter.)

Now clearly, these are not as bad as the cartoon -- you know, they have to exaggerate to get our attention -- and things clearly have improved. As a recent Council of Economic Advisers report makes clear, the gap between women's and men's wages has narrowed since 1963. But women still bring home only about 75 cents for every man's dollar.

And I think it is important that, despite this longtime inequity, there are still those who claim that this is a made-up problem, that any wage gap between men and women can be explained away by the choices women make. And we all know that individual women, thank goodness, make different choices; that women, for personal reasons or other professional reasons, may choose a particular career or work pattern that results in lower wages.

But this is not an accurate finding, and those who promote it should look at the entire picture and the studies that have been done repeatedly which demonstrate the contrary. Women at all ages, when you adjust for differences in education, experience and occupation, as a recent CEA study report reminds us, there is still a sizable gap between men's and women's salaries that can best be explained by one phenomenon, the continuing presence and the persistent effect of discrimination, sometimes in very subtle ways. And we'll hear about some of that from one of our panelists.

In fact, recently an important report issued by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, which one of our panelists will discuss, looked at pay equity among tenured faculty and found that women at the School of Science were discriminated against in diverse areas, including hiring, awards, promotions, committee assignments, and the allocation of resources such as lab space and research dollars. This report showed that even women who supposedly break through the glass ceiling and reach the highest echelons of their professions still find themselves bumping up against some gender discrimination.

So I think it's fair to say that when you have some of the best scientists in the world taking a look at this issue in one institution and coming to these conclusions, and then that in turn supports the broader findings that have been derived from looking at society at large, we know that we do have a wage gap that we have to address. And it's not just a gap in wages, it's a gap in our nation's principles and promises.

So it's a great pleasure for me to be here with the secretary of Labor and the panelists whom you'll hear from. And it's a particular pleasure to introduce the president, who reminded Senator Harkin, in my presence, a few minutes ago that until he became president, I always made more money than he did -- (laughter) -- and the wage gap went the other direction in our family. But since I've been a full-time volunteer now for six-and-a-half years, the gap is narrowing even in the Clinton family.

So please join me in welcoming the president. (Applause.)

That is the truth. (Laughter.) But Hillary didn't tell you the rest of the story.

Senator Harkin, whose wonderful wife Ruth was also a part of our administration for several years, she has often made more money than her husband. And so we decided that maybe we should become part of a small but vocal radical caucus saying we shouldn't stop at equal pay, we like it when our wives made -- (laughs) -- more money than we do. (Laughter.) We have enjoyed the benefits of that.

I would like to thank Senator Harkin and Eleanor Holmes Norton for being here and for being long-time champions of this cause. I thank Ida Castro, our EEOC chair, the local officials who are here, and Secretary Herman, who bears a lot of the responsibilities for what we are trying to achieve, for her work.

I'd like to make just a few brief points. Hillary has made most of the points that need to be made, and we all know here we're preaching to the saved and trying to get a message out to the country.

But I'd like to point out, as I tried to do in the State of the Union, that the time in which we are living now in terms of our economic prosperity is virtually unprecedented. We had 4.2 percent unemployment last month. I remember a meeting I had and a huge argument I had in December of 1992, when I had been elected but not inaugurated president, about how low we could get unemployment before inflation would go up. And all the traditional economists said, Man, when you get below 6 percent, you know, you will just see what'll happen. And the American people turned out to be a lot more productive, a lot more efficient, technology turned out to be a lot more helpful, we were in a much more competitive environment. So now we have 4.2 percent unemployment, the lowest rate since 1970, the lowest peacetime unemployment since 1957, 18 million new jobs. But we still have some significant long-term challenges in this country.

We have pockets of America, in rural America, in urban America, in our medium-size industrial cities, our Native American reservations, which have not felt any of the impact of the economic recovery. We still have substantial long-term challenges to Social Security, to Medicare, and we still have a significant fact of inequality in the pay of women and men.

And the central point I would like to make is that we should not allow the political climate or anything else to deter us from concentrating our minds on the fact that this is a precious gift that the American people have received, even though they have earned it. Countries rarely have conditions like this. If we can't use this moment to deal with these long-term challenges, including the equal pay challenge, when will we ever get around to it? That is the message I want America to send back to Washington.

Yes, have your disagreements. Yes, have your fights. Yes, conduct your campaigns. Yes to all this, but for goodness' sakes, realize that this is, at a minimum, the opportunity of a generation, maybe more. And every single problem that we can take off the table for our successors and for our children is an obligation we ought to shoulder and get the job done. That's what this is about.

And those of us who are old enough to remember what the economy was like in the 1970s with the long gas lines; what it was like in the 1980s when we had the so-called "bicoastal" economy and my state and Senator Harkin's state had double-digit unemployment in county after county.

I'm telling you, times get tough and then you go around and try to talk to people about problems like this, their eyes glaze over because even the people who would benefit, they're just trying to keep body and soul together. They're worried about holding on to what they have. We have an opportunity now to make a better America for our children; for all of our children.

And the second point I want to make is the one I made jokingly in the story about Tom and me having the privilege of living with women who made more money than we did, and that is that this is not just a woman's issue. The women who are discriminated against often are in families, raising children with husbands who are also hurt if their wives work hard and don't have the benefits of equal pay.

A lot of the women who are single mothers are out there working, and they have boy children as well as girl children. This is not just a gender issue, and men should be very interested in this.

I can say, furthermore, that I believe that it would be good for our overall economy. You know, you hear all these problems that they say it'll cause the economy if you do this. All this stuff is largely not true. I mean, every time we try to make a change to have a stronger society, whether it's raising the minimum wage or cleaning up the environment or passing the family leave law, the people that are against it say the same thing. And we now have, you know, decades of experience in trying to improve our social fabric. And America has had a particular genius in figuring out how to do these things in a way that would permit us to generate more economic opportunity and more jobs and more advances.

I'd like to make, too, a third point -- not in my notes, but Hillary made me think of it. You know, there are these people now who are out there saying, "Well, you know, there really isn't much of an equal pay problem, because it's almost exclusively confined to women who have children, and women who have children have to have more intermittent periods in the workplace and" -- you know, you've heard all the arguments -- "and once you factor that out, well, there's no problem."

Well, I have two reactions to that. First of all, if you take that argument to its logical conclusion, we would be the most -- we would be depopulating America before you know it. No one else has really figured out any way to bring children around -- (laughter) -- as far as I know, at least. Secondly, if that is true, it still doesn't make it right.

Let's -- if you give the people the entire argument, which I don't the analysis supports -- but if you did, what does that mean? It means that an important part of the equal pay battle should be strengthening the Family and Medical Leave Law, for example -- something I've been trying to do, without success, ever since we signed the first bill -- it ought to apply to more companies, it ought to be more extensive, it ought to cover more situations. You know, we've proved that we can do this without hurting the economy. And if you believe -- I mean, you know, if you believe that having children is a significant factor here, and if you believe, as I do, that's the most important work of any society, then why shouldn't we continue with something that's done so much good -- this family leave law -- to find other ways to do it, to find other incentives for flex time, just all kinds of things we could be doing if this is a problem?

Now finally, let me say -- let's talk a little bit about what I think we can do about this right now. Earlier this year I asked Congress to pass two measures to strengthen our wage discrimination laws and to boost enforcement of existing ones. I ask Congress again to pass the $14 million equal pay initiative that's in our balanced budget, to help the EEOC identify and respond to wage discrimination; to educate employers and workers about their rights and responsibilities -- you'll hear some pretty impressive people talk about that on our panel in a moment; and to help bring more women into better paying jobs.

Again, I ask the Congress to pass the Pay Check Fairness Act, sponsored by Senator Daschle and Congresswoman DeLauro, which would put employers on notice that wage discrimination against women is just as unacceptable as discrimination based on race or ethnicity. Under current law, those who are denied equal pay because of race can seek compensatory (sic) -- compensatory and punitive damages. This new legislation would give women the same right. It will make a difference. It would protect employees who share salary information from retaliation. It would expand training for EEOC workers, strengthen research, establish an award for exemplary workers.

We can do more. Today I'm pleased to announce that we want to strengthen our legislation by requiring the EEOC to determine what new information on worker salaries they need to improve enforcement of wage discrimination laws and to find a way to collect that information. The new provision would call on the EEOC to issue a new rule within 18 months to gather, in the most effective and efficient way possible, pay data from companies based on race, sex and national origin of employees.

Addressing wage discrimination takes courage, as our panelists can tell you. It takes courage as an employee to speak out, to gather evidence, to make a case. It takes courage as an employer to recognize problems in pay equity and take steps to remedy them.

Just recently -- let me just mention the experience of one of our panelists -- we saw this courage among the administrators and women scientists at MIT, one of our country's most outstanding institutions of higher education.

Together they looked at the cold, hard facts about disparities in everything from lab space to annual salary. They sought to make things right, and they told the whole public the truth about it, which is a rare thing, and I appreciate what they did. I commend them. I hope their success and their example can be replicated throughout our country.

Now, again I say this should not be a partisan issue, it should be an American issue. And as you argue through these matters this year, I ask you, every time you are in contact with any person in a position to vote on this in Congress or influence a vote on Congress, ask them this simple question: If we don't deal with this now, when will we ever get around to it?

Thank you very much. (Applause.)

CHARLES GIBSON, Host: We were talking just a few moments ago to Elizabeth Dole, who has just come back from a visit to the areas overrun with refugees, the areas around Kosovo.

Well, the First Lady, Hillary Rodham Clinton, is also talking about a trip to that region. But before she goes, yesterday, Mrs. Clinton was here in New York. She has traveled through -- or maybe I should say stormed through the state of New York, looking very much like a potential candidate. She made eight whirlwind stops in New York yesterday alone.

As ABC's Bill Blakemore reports, rarely has a potential candidate touched so many bases in so little time.

BILL BLAKEMORE, ABC News: (voice-over) Whether she is running or not, her schedule, eight stops in one day, seems designed to show she knows how to, and to show she's a woman and politician in her own right.

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON: I love New York, to start with. I always have.

BILL BLAKEMORE: (voice-over) First stop, foreign affairs. Discussion at the U.N. about funding Kosovo refugees, and the announcement that she's going there herself.

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON: I've been asked to go, I've expressed my very strong interest in going. And as soon as I'm given the green light to go, I intend to go.

BILL BLAKEMORE: (voice-over) Second stop, the environment, Central Park, for a national program that converts old railroad beds into hiking and recreation trails.

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON: We need your resources, your commitment, your energy.

BILL BLAKEMORE: (voice-over) On women's issues, National Women's Broadcasting Awards at the Waldorf Astoria.

But all this typical First Lady work will go only so far with New Yorkers choosing a senator.

LEE MIRINGOFF, Marist College Institute of Public Opinion: Well, she's not from New York, she's not really from anywhere. She's really from TV, and then she suddenly shows up here. Now she's possibly candidate Clinton. It's a different role, and she has to really make that transformation.

BILL BLAKEMORE: (voice-over) Her fourth stop, education, at Columbia Teachers College. Then artists, recognized at a scholarship dinner.

INTRODUCER: Hillary Rodham Clinton.

BILL BLAKEMORE: (voice-over) Then, with nine hours on the ground, she gets a lifetime award from the Children of Chernobyl Relief Fund.

Stop number seven, a fund raiser for one of her husband's steadiest supporters throughout the impeachment, Congressman Jerry Nadler.

A few weeks ago, her husband told reporters he'd be delighted to help her get out the vote if she runs. Would she welcome his support?

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS, ABC News Political Analyst: Well, certainly publicly. I think, though, that even deeper than that is that this is really her chance to show that she can get elected, that she can serve in her own right, not just as his partner.

BILL BLAKEMORE: However she emerges as her own woman, New York State polls show that she and possible Republican candidate New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, are now running a dead heat. The lead that she had over him three months ago has worn off.

(voice-over) Her long day ended with a visit to a child care organization. There'll be another full day in the New York City suburbs today, and Thursday a tour in upstate New York. Topics, farm problems, public school quality, health care reform, and minority group relations.

Run or not, Hillary Clinton is covering all the bases.

Bill Blakemore, ABC News, New York.

CHARLES GIBSON: Will she run, won't she run? It is the political soap opera question that fascinates everyone.

(Commercial Break)

CHARLES GIBSON: If I made you bet $5 right now, does she run or doesn't she run, what's your bet?

ELIZABETH VARGAS, HOST: I would bet she does run, but I wonder why, I really do.

CHARLES GIBSON: All right, you're on. I can't bet $5, but you're on for a buck.

ELIZABETH VARGAS: Oh, come on, Charlie, if I can bet $5, you can bet $5!

CHARLES GIBSON: OK, I'll go with $5. I'll go with $5.

News Conference on Humanitarian Relief for Kosovo, 4/21/1999

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON, DELIVERS REMARKS ON THE CRISIS IN KOSOVO

APRIL 21, 1999

CLINTON: Thank you and I want to welcome all of you here today. And I very much appreciate your coming. I want to thank those whom you will hear from in a few minutes including FEMA Director James Lee Witt; and USAID Deputy Administrator Hattie Babbitt. Congressman James Moody (ph) who runs Interaction. We also have with us OPM Director Janice LeChance (ph) and Morrison Webb, executive vice president of AT&T.

I also want to recognize the heroic contributions of Refugees International, an organization that is on the front lines of humanitarian disasters around the world. And they lost three relief workers in a terrible car accident this week in Albania, who were trying to reach the refugee camps.

Before I begin, I want to say a word about the terrible school shooting that occurred yesterday in Littleton, Colorado. I'm sure all of us are joined together in mourning the loss of so many young lives. And we are sending our prayers and sympathy to the families, the loved ones, the classmates of the victims and the entire community. It's hard to imagine this happening again. And at the extraordinary time that we heard about it, I think all of us hoped it were not true.

When we look into the eyes of our own children we cannot even imagine the fear that parents in Littleton must have felt waiting to find out if they had lost their children.

And it is very hard to just comfort a child who seeing it on television, is afraid. Imagine what it is like for the young people who saw their friends die before their eyes. Even if we cannot comprehend or imagine the magnitude of the pain that is filling the hearts of the people of Littleton, we can help with our prayers and our hopes by doing all that is possible to make sure the children there receive the counseling and support they need. Whatever medical and psychological help might be required.

CLINTON: And more than that we can, once again, recommit ourselves to insuring that all classrooms and schoolyards are filled with learning and the sounds of children who are enjoying the everyday give and take of life and not filled with violence and anguish.

We're here to talk about a very different tragedy in another part of the world, but one that is equally demanding of our response. The humanitarian disaster in Kosovo is almost incomprehensible.

You've come here because you do want to help and for that we are grateful because we need that help more desperately than ever. We've seen the horrifying images of children in trains, children separated from families, robbed of their childhoods, their homes and their memories.

Two out of three of the Kosovars have already been forced to flee their homes, often at gun point, without time to even snatch a family photograph from the wall or even to take identification papers or medications on their fearful journeys.

Like all Americans, I have been outraged by recent reports of paramilitary forces destroying health centers and hospitals, driving out doctors and nurses and depriving refugees of much needed medical care.

I've heard chilling examples of what is happening from a doctor whom I met with again just last week. I met with her first last summer when she came to the White House to tell me what was occurring even then as people were being driven into the mountains.

This brave woman, who had worked around the clock, has now become a refugee herself. Last week when she visited me, I could not only tell from her words, but by the haunted pain in her eyes, what she and the people around her have endured.

CLINTON: She had come here -- luckily enough she still had her passport which she smuggled out in the diaper of a nephew she held on her lap -- she'd come here to bear witness and to make sure we understood what was happening to the people of her country.

We are doing as much as we can to ease the suffering of the refugees, but we have a lot of work ahead of us. Some of you have seen first-hand what life is like in those camps as wave after wave of displaced people pour across the borders exhausted and hungry and sick, where international relief agencies are working desperately against time to prevent outbreaks of cholera and other diseases.

You also are aware that, in addition to the camps, there are tens of thousands of refugees being housed in homes in Macedonia and Albania by people who've taken those refugees in. Oftentimes, 20, 30 people living in one room. And those host families are also stretched to breaking point.

To help the people of Kosovo rebuild their lives, we know we have to work as a team at every level of government, in international relief agencies and other charitable organizations, in our businesses, our houses of worship and our communities.

Since the violence began, the United States has contributed more than $150 million in humanitarian aid including blankets, tents, water jugs and enough food to feed three quarters of a million people. A few weeks ago, I went to Dover Air Force Base and saw the service men and women who have literally been working around the clock loading the food onto pallets to be transported to reach the people of Kosovo.

CLINTON: This week the president called on Congress to pass his $6 billion proposal for an emergency aid package which includes nearly $800 million in humanitarian assistance.

The American people, as is the case when events like this occur, have responded with an outpouring of generosity and support. Here at the White House we are flooded with countless calls, letters and e-mails from people who want to know how to help. A woman from Indiana wrote asking whether there was anything the mothers of this country could do to help the mothers of Kosovo.

And another woman from Florida wrote we are so blessed in our beloved country and I really believe that the majority of Americans would like to help in some way, but don't really know how. Well there are ways for everyone to help.

USAID and FEMA are working together to make sure that Americans can do our part through a toll-free number, 800-USAID-RELIEF and the website www.info.USAID.gov. under the Kosovo listing.

Today I'm also pleased that the president will be sending a memo to every employee in the federal government encouraging them to find out what they can do to help as well.

Across the country, people are coming together to try to understand how they can make a difference. On Monday I met in New York with the heads and representatives of major foundations to talk about what more can be done in the foundation community to support those who are on the ground delivering the services.

I'm very grateful to former Congressman Jim Moody and everyone at Interaction for their leadership and commitment. I also know that the American business community has responded and is responding and wants to know what more it can do to be responsive.

Leading corporations from AT&T to Time Warner to Pepsico are urging their employees to help by matching their contributions dollar for dollar. One relief organization, Project Hope, has already received up to $5 million worth of pharmaceutical supplies.

UPS has donated cargo space to transport food and other goods into the refugee camps. Slimfast is also involved in the relief effort and I'm pleased that their president, Danny Abraham (ph), could be with us today.

Major Internet companies to Yahoo! to Amazon.com to eBay.com are donating prime space on their home pages to the Red Cross, Care and other organizations. I'm especially pleased that Yahoo! and Broadcast.com are running public service announcements as a way of getting more people involved.

These are only a few of the major contributions that we're hearing about and that NGOs are receiving.

CLINTON: All told, I believe NGOs have already received $25 million in cash in kind donations. This is setting, yet again, a new standard in corporate, indeed, international citizenship.

I cannot tell you how proud I am every time I travel around the world on behalf of our country and I see what American corporations are doing, not only to provide jobs which is the first and most important way to help any country, but also by setting an example of philanthropy and corporate citizenship that is literally helping to transform the way business is conducted and what can happen in a society.

That's why we want to encourage you to continue to be creative about ways you can make a difference. In a few minutes, we're going to find that cash contributions, as you'll hear from our speakers, are often the most effective way to help in an ever-changing situation.

But every donation counts and every donation is helping. I want to say a special word though about Macedonia and Albania, because here perhaps as much as any way, the business community in America and your counterparts in Europe and Japan and elsewhere can make a very big difference.

I just met with the Macedonian ambassador and representatives of the Macedonian government to hear first-hand the impact that this crisis is making on their economy and their country. I thank them on behalf of the president and the American people for what they are doing.

CLINTON: Because think about what it must mean to be in small, poor countries and having to deal with the tens of thousands, now hundreds of thousands of displaced people coming across your borders seeking all manner of help and having all kinds of needs that must be met.

Macedonia, for example, is providing safe haven already for more than 100,000 refugees, but because of the conflict, its trade routes through Serbia have been severed. Foreign companies are canceling contracts, thereby putting people out of work, particularly in the textile manufacturing sector because companies are concerned about continuing to do business in Macedonia given the instability there.

Now when that happens that exacerbates enormously the strain on the government and the people of Macedonia. Oftentimes these contracts are being canceled at plants that are of considerable distance away from the refugee camps. They are often in plants that are in the center of the Albanian population in Macedonia which is attempting to being host families to take in a lot of refugees, but now people are losing the jobs that they had that supported in the meager way the caring of these people because of these kinds of cancellations.

We cannot let this conflict derail the social, economic and political progress that Macedonia and its neighbors have struggled so hard and for so long to achieve. We also want to be sure that in so far as possible existing contracts and even new investments continue in the region.

And in addition, if there are ways of buying supplies from local producers and suppliers to supply both military and civilian relief needs, I hope we will do as much as we can to continue to boost the local economies in both Macedonia and Albania.

CLINTON: I think that those governments and those people need our support now, and they will continue to need our support in the future.

Because as we work and pray for peace, we cannot lose sight of the fact that there will be a lot of work to do if we are eventually to realize our goals of returning the Kosovars to Kosovo and the rebuilding the economies there, as well in the neighboring countries.

So thank you, thank you for what you've done and what you will do. It is a unique public/private partnership that is one of the hallmarks of the America experience that is not matched anywhere else in the world and has never been matched in history.

It's now my pleasure to introduce someone who's working very hard every day on making sure that our relief efforts are effective on the ground, and that's USAID Deputy Administrator, Hattie Babbitt.

GUN-RELATED PROVISIONS OF OMNIBUS CRIME BILL, 4/27/1999

REMARKS BY PRESIDENT BILL CLINTON AND FIRST LADY HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

AND OTHER SPEAKERS

SUBJECT: GUN-RELATED PROVISIONS OF OMNIBUS CRIME BILL

OLD EXECUTIVE OFFICE BUILDING

WASHINGTON, D.C.

SECTION: WHITE HOUSE BRIEFING

MRS. CLINTON: (Applause.) Thank you all. Thank you. Please be seated.

And good afternoon. It's an honor to join the president in welcoming all of you to the White House this afternoon. We are especially honored to be joined by a very large number of senators and representatives from both parties who are here on the stage for this event; also Secretary Rubin and Attorney General Reno, Secretary Riley, Deputy Attorney General Eric Holder, Undersecretary of the Treasury Jim Johnson. And you will hear in just a few minutes from Senator Feinstein, Senator Chafee, Representative Conyers, Representative McCarthy. Also in the audience is Mayor Paul Helmke from Fort Wayne, Indiana, and Bob Walker, president of Handgun Control, Inc.

We have come together in the wake of a terrible tragedy that has put our entire nation in mourning and that was reminded all of us once again that everything in life pales in comparison to our ability to keep our children safe and out of harm's way. Today our thoughts and prayers remain with the families and friends and the citizens of Littleton as they bid emotional farewells to their beloved children and a dedicated teacher. Yet, even in the midst of this terrible tragedy, we also see the people of Littleton pulling together to pray and comfort and sustain each other, and many of the rest of us are gathering strength and hope from their example.

There are many people here today, out in the audience and on this stage, who have worked tirelessly to create the safe schools and communities that we all want for our children. I particularly want to thank Attorney General Reno and Secretary of Education Dick Riley and Secretary Bob Rubin because they have worked together tirelessly to try to create better conditions to provide for the safety of our children.

I also want to thank all the members of Congress who are here, who have proved that ending the violence and limiting access to firearms can be and should be a bipartisan goal.

There are many others in this room who are on the front lines in creating safer communities -- religious groups, advocates for gun control, victims' groups, child advocates, law enforcement, community, and parent organizations -- and we thank you all for coming. You represent literally thousands, if not millions, of your fellow Americans.

All of us here are searching for answers to what happened in Littleton. I don't know that anyone will ever be able to explain fully the events of a week ago. Nor, I doubt, can we create a perfect set of solutions that, if followed, would have prevented what happened at Columbine High School or would stop forever acts of violence that occur in our communities around our country.

But that does not mean that we are either hopeless or helpless in the face of this tragedy. Instead, we have to work together to come up with the best possible solutions that we can craft, that we believe will make a difference for our children. We come here to say simply that there are some tough things we must be willing to say and some tough steps we must be willing to take if we are to stop the violence.

Now I hope that everyone does know that the vast majority of America's schools are safe. But we also know that these schools in our country are not islands cut off from the rest of society. No school security system or metal detector can keep out the culture of violence that dominates the lives of so many of our children.

When our culture romanticizes and glorifies violence on TV, in the movies, on the Internet, in songs, and when there are video games that you win based on how many people you kill, then I think the evidence is absolutely clear; our children become desensitized to violence and lose their empathy for fellow human beings. Studies show what many of us have believed; that such exposures causes more aggression and antisocial behavior. So today we must fully acknowledge, once and for all, that America's culture of violence is having a profound effect on our children, and we must resolve to do what we can to change that culture.

It will take strong leadership. I remember well when the president convened the 1996 White House Conference on Children's Television, where television industry leaders joined him in agreeing to air more educational children's shows and also to work with the administration to establish a rating system to help parents navigate what's appropriate and what's not for their kids.

And soon we will have the V-chip available for every home in our country.

But it will take more than strong leadership from the media and entertainment world to stop the culture of violence that surrounds our children. Kids need more caring, responsible adults in their lives, yet when single parenthood and two working parents are on the rise, too many of America's children are growing up alone. Parents are the central figures in their children's lives, but parents need help. They need help from the larger community, and that means all of us -- teachers, police, counselors, community and religious leaders, elected officials. All of us have to help parents find the help they need, and we have to work together to keep our children and our communities safe.

We also know that we have to do everything possible to ensure that young people do not have easy access to weapons. We now know that includes not only firearms but bomb-making materiel.

Now any one of us who hasn't become completely amnesiac about our own growing-up years know that children will have disagreements and arguments. They sometimes will even have fights among themselves. Part of growing up is learning how to control one's impulses, which is often difficult for young people. But there is a very big difference between a schoolyard fight that many of us can remember and what happens today, with the access to the arsenal of guns, rifles, and bombs that the two young men in Littleton were able to bring into their school.

It is criminal how easy it is for children in America to obtain guns. Just last year 6,000 students were expelled for bringing guns to school, and Littleton is the latest tragic example of how the availability of those guns can turn a sense of alienation, of rage, of not belonging, of not fitting in into a deadly encounter. Every day in America we lose 13 precious children to gun-related violence. Every two days, therefore, we lose the equivalent of a classroom of students.

"Guns" and "children" are two words that should never be put together in the same sentence, and this president and this administration have been working hard and successfully to try to keep them apart. I think we all in America should take pride in the passage of the Brady bill, which has denied handguns to 250,000 felons, fugitives, and stalkers. And since the crime bill was enacted, 19 of the deadliest assault weapons are harder to find on our streets. We will never know how many tragedies we've avoided because of these efforts, but we do know how much more remains to be done.

Today we will hear about further steps that we hope all of us are willing to take to make our schools and communities places in which all citizens can live in safety, free from violence and fear.

In a few minutes, the people of Littleton, Denver and, indeed, all of Colorado will be stopping whatever they do for a moment of silence on behalf of those who lost their lives. I think it would be appropriate here in the White House that we join them, and that we not only use that moment of silence to remember the victims of this tragedy and the perpetrators, but that we think about all of the other children in America who tell us, often, that they're scared, they're scared to go outside, they're scared because they know people who bring guns to school, they're scared because of what they see happening around them. Our first obligation is to try to make our children free from that kind of fear. So if we could just take a moment, in solidarity with the people not only in Colorado who have suffered this loss but people throughout our country on behalf of our children.

Thank you.

It is now my great honor to introduce someone who has shown remarkable courage in standing up to the gun lobby, who has really put her strongest convictions on the line and become an outspoken advocate of gun control, who knows firsthand the terrible consequences of handgun violence. Please join me in welcoming Senator Diane Feinstein. SEN. DIANNE FEINSTEIN (D-CA): (Applause.) Thank you. Thank you very much.

Let me thank the first lady, I think, for her very stirring words.

And during that moment of silence, ladies and gentlemen, I thought that America really is at a very pivotal time in our history. If we don't stand up now and say, "Enough is enough," when will we stand up?

I think at this time we're all looking for answers, and I suspect that no one answer is going to be found to be all abiding. I think we're going to find, as the first lady just suggested, that it is a combination of a number of different factors. The difficulty parents have today in America. The difficulty in having any precise parameters to what is right and what is wrong. To have evolved into a culture of kind of instant gratification. And where we see the promulgation of a culture of violence surrounding us. And when the society is literally awash with guns.

Sure, there are some regulations. But are they adequate? Hardly. To get anything through this Congress is extraordinarily difficult. And I want to just thank the president and the first lady for stepping forward at this time and presenting to the Congress a package of very precise and very targeted statutes which could make a substantial change.

As for me, I have watched this issue for a long time. I have watched us lose leaders. I have watched us lose family members. And from the day that a man by the name of Patrick Purdy (sp) walked into a Stockton school yard some 20 years ago, I have seen the permeation of violence and guns down to a five-year old in Memphis, Tennessee, who last May took a gun to school to kill his teacher because that teacher had given him a timeout the day before. A five-year old, even before the so-called "age of reason," picking a gun off his grandfather's dresser and taking it to school to shoot his teacher. The way they found it is because they found some of the bullets and traced it to the weapon. And the arrest statement says he wanted to shoot his teacher, and other kindergarteners as well. That to me is the depths of societal woe, and we must begin to think very seriously about it.

For me, since I have been in the Senate, I have tried to concentrate on two issues, one of them being assault weapons and the other being bomb making, since of group of sheriffs in California met with me and said, "You know, it's possible to unload a handbook from the Internet and learn how to steal the equipment, break into the labs and build some of the most explosive bombs." Nothing therein has any legal application, all illegal application. For three years, we've gotten it passed in the Senate, to have it deleted in conference. And I hope that this year -- we've worked on it with the Justice Department -- that there will be a bomb-making amendment that will pass this that will provide an opportunity that when there is knowledge that this can be used in a criminal way, that it be illegal to post it on the Internet. (Applause.)

In 1994, with the president's support and the Justice Department's support, the Senate passed an amendment which would prohibit the manufacture of 19 specific types of assault weapons. The thrust of that legislation was to dry up the supply of these weapons of war over time, weapons of war because these weapons, unlike a pistol, you don't have to aim precisely, you can hold at the hip. They have light triggers. You can spray-fire. And they have big enough clips so that you can kill large numbers of people before anyone can get to you to disarm you.

These are the weapons that are the weapons of choice for the grievance killers, for the drive-by shooters, what the gangs use and what the drug cartels use. They were all made for military purposes, not for civilian purposes.

The fail-safe of that legislation was to prohibit the manufacture, the sale and the possession of clips, drums or strips of more than 10 bullets. That's in the legislation. And subsequent to passage of the legislation, it is illegal to manufacture these anywhere in the United States.

Aha, but there's a loophole, and that loophole is that it allows for the foreign import of clips, drums, or strips of more than 10 bullets made in some 20 different countries. Consequently, since 1984, these clips have been rolling into the United States. In the last six months alone, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms is approving permits for 8.6 million of these, some of them as big as 250,000.

Well, about a year and a half ago, we explored whether the president could use his executive authority to ban the importation, and the Justice said no, it will take legislation. So I've introduced legislation, which came to a vote in the Senate last year, got 44 votes. We will reintroduce it, hopefully sooner rather than later, because the thrust of this, again, is to dry up the supply of these big clips over time and make them less available to people.

Mr. President, I want you to know that I fully support the measures you've submitted to the Congress. I am hopeful that we will be able to take immediate action. I think the people of this nation deserve no less, want no less. And it is my very strong feeling that a dominant majority of the people of this nation will support your targeted measures, and I certainly know that's true for California. So thank you both very, very much. (Applause.)

And now, if I may, it's my great pleasure to introduce someone from the other side of the aisle that I deeply respect. Senator John Chafee has approached his career in Washington with one overarching goal: to operate through consensus and cooperation, wherever and whenever possible, in order to get things done.

And this is the case when it comes to enacting reasonable and common-sense measures to limit gun violence. He was an early proponent of the Brady law, which imposes a waiting period of three days for handgun purchases, and he sponsored laws also to ban a range of assault weapons. He is now an original co-sponsor of a bill to make permanent the Brady waiting period.

He is also an original co-sponsor, with Senator Boxer, of the Firearms Rights, Responsibilities, and Remedies Act.

This bill would provide that any person or entity harmed by gun violence, including city and county governments, has the right to sue gun manufacturers, dealers, and importers. He's also a sponsor of the Durbin-Chafee Children's Access to Firearms Prevention Act. This bill encourages adults to take steps to ensure gun safety in homes with children. It will provide penalties for parents who leave guns around the house without safety locks.

He's a man -- I think, a giant -- in the Senate; a very fine United States senator, and I am just delighted he's here today. Would you warmly welcome Senator John Chafee from the great State of Rhode Island.

(Applause.)

SEN. JOHN CHAFEE (R-RI): Thank you. Thank you. Well, thank you very much, Dianne, for that very, very kind introduction. And I think we all owe a big round of applause to Dianne for the work she's done in connection with these. (Applause.)

Mr. President and Mrs. Clinton, I want to first thank you for all the leadership you've given in this effort. And it's going to take -- we've got to be buckled down for the long haul here. It's not going to be easy, but with your leadership, I'm confident that we can achieve the results that we all seek.

I appreciate your asking me to be here with you today to talk about the shocking and deplorable problem of gun violence in our nation's schools. Reporters and commentators alike refer to "school violence." I can't help thinking to myself, this isn't about schools. It's about guns. This is about the insanely easy access Americans, including American children, have to guns. This is about the distorted interpretation of the Constitution that convinces otherwise rational citizens that it's their inalienable right to be armed to the teeth. It's the strangest way they've got that figured out. (Laughter.)

Too many of us shake our heads and say there's nothing we can do. Too many of us are quick to blame society or the media or Hollywood or the Internet, but too few of us are willing to do what needs to be done to ensure that guns stay out of the hands of children. Now is the time for passage of the Child Firearms Access Prevention Act, which Dianne touched on, which would hold adult gun owners liable if their weapons are used by a child to harm himself or someone else. (Applause.) Now is the time for passage of the Child Safety Lock Act, which would require a safety lock to be sold with each new firearm. Now is the time for a permanent waiting period before the purchase of a handgun and of legislation that forbids unlicensed sellers to peddle their wares at gun shows without conducting any background checks. (Applause.)

Let us not blame everywhere, but where it most belongs, with the gun industry and with the government that protects it. When we look at gun violence in other industrialized nations, listen to these statistics. They're shocking. Our culpability is clear. According to the Center for Disease Control, U.S. children are 12 times more likely to die from firearm injuries than our children in the 26 other industrial nations combined. In all those other nations combined, the child has one-twelfth of the chance of dying from firearms injury compared to a child in the U.S.

To those who say there's something terribly wrong with an American culture, a culture that breeds the sort of children who are capable of wreaking such carnage, I say it isn't our American culture that's wrong; what's wrong is our love affair with guns. (Applause.)

Now it's my honor to introduce John Conyers, the ranking member of the House Judiciary Committee. Among his many distinctions, which include being a founding member of the Congressional Black Caucus, Mr. Conyers is the second most senior member of the House of Representatives. He is now serving his 18th term. John Conyers.

REP. JOHN CONYERS (D-MI): (Applause.) Thank you very much.

I want to thank the president and the first lady for their courage and leadership in the wake of the Littleton tragedy. On all fronts, the president and the first lady and all of us here today, in the administration, and especially the Congress, continue to show us what leadership really means when the going gets difficult.

Now, the tragedy in Colorado was one of unprecedented proportion, but the sad truth is that each and every day, in every city and state, we experience firearm tragedies that snuff out lives that are just beginning. Each day in America, there are nearly two dozen firearm homicides. That amounts to a couple hundred a week. That's nearly 10,000 a year. And it doesn't include the 18,000 gun suicides that we experience each year.

That comes to a total of 35,000 gun deaths in the United States annually.

Ladies and gentlemen, it's got to stop. We can do better, and that's why we're called to this place today. Those numbers compare to two handgun murders in New Zealand a year, 15 in Japan, 30 in all of Britain -- all countries that have meaningful gun control.

Now the best guess is that there are over 250 million guns in America, nearly one for every citizen of this country. Our streets are swimming with these weapons of death and destruction. Handgun murders are the leading cause for the death of African American men ages 15 to 34. And overwhelmingly all the data shows that in non-recreational settings, firearms are almost always used aggressively, not defensively.

The major political impediment to passing meaningful measures to keep guns out of the hands of the criminals is the National Rifle Association, who, in my judgment, has a choke hold on so many of the members of the Congress -- the NRA, who makes a killing selling guns.

Tomorrow in the House we plan to mark up the juvenile justice bill, and in the Judiciary Committee we will use all of the procedural rules at -- that I have to try to get a vote on some of the issues that have been discussed here today. Let's start tomorrow trying to pass the measure that President Clinton has put forward. (Applause.)

The families of Littleton want to hear from us. The families of tens of thousands of murder victims in America want to hear from us. And it's an outrage, and I call upon the chairman of the Judiciary Committee and the speaker of the House to schedule this proposal for action on the House floor before the Memorial Day recess. We want action now. (Applause.)

Yes, we can mourn and honor the victims of Littleton with words, or we can mourn and honor those victims with action. I know which one of the two choices that I will make, and everyone here, and I think that if we don't move now, we're losing a tremendous movement, a feeling in this country that I don't think I've ever noticed before that now is the time for the feelings of most Americans to be actualized in federal legislation.

And now, my friends, I want to introduce a member who has distinguished herself, from New York, Carolyn McCarthy. We consider her to be the conscience of the Congress on guns, and we present her to you at this time. (Applause.)

REP. CAROLYN MCCARTHY (D-NY): Mrs. Clinton, President Clinton, thank you for bringing us all here together today.

Last Tuesday, I was sitting in the Educational Committee and someone from my staff came up to me and just tapped me on the shoulder, and said, "Congresswoman, another school shooting." You have to understand, when you are a victim, the feelings that go through you. I thought of when my brother told me that my husband was killed on the Long Island Railroad, and told me that my son was fighting for his life. I thought of Suzanne Wilson, who lost her daughter last year in Jonesboro. I thought of all the other school shootings that we've seen in the last year and a half. I thought of all the committee hearings that we've had in the last year on how to deal with this issue.

And then I thought of all the victims in the last number of years that have lost someone. And here we are, talking about what can we do.

I have to tell you it's extremely frustrating, because we are faced with silence all the time. We're hearing from the other side already: "There is nothing we can do." I'm sorry, you have heard of so many proposals; there IS something we can do. There has to be something that we can do. (Applause.)

All of us here, every single one of us here -- and, believe me, a lot more -- are willing to fight for the American people. We're willing to fight for our children.

But you know what's going to happen? We'll go to committee, and there will be silence as the shootings go on. When we go to the speaker of the House and beg for a debate on the floor, there will be silence, and the shootings will go on.

We will fight for you, but I have to tell you, the American public's voice has to be heard. We have to hear from you. (Applause.)

"It's not going to work." Is that what you want to keep hearing? "It's not going to work. You can't do it." Please.

We're burying our children in Colorado, and tomorrow we'll be burying 13 more, and the day after that we will be burying 13 more -- every single day. Do we have to have a larger mass of killings for America to say, "Enough is enough"? Please don't let that happen.

Please, I'm asking everyone out there, call your representative. Let's hear from you. Give us the strength to keep fighting. Give us the power to win, because I have to tell you something I've learned in the very short time since I've been here in Congress: When enough people outside of Washington start calling into Washington, wow, people start listening. "Gee, maybe we should look at this."

Think about HMOs. Why are we even talking about it in Congress? Because the American people are demanding it.

I'm a nurse. Let's talk about what it's costing our health care. Because we've seen homicides go down -- and that's wonderful -- can we talk about the billions of dollars it's costing us because more of our young people are surviving? I know Secretary Riley would like that money for his education. I know the president would like that money for health care.

We can do this, people. We can do this, but you got to help us. I don't want to hear at the next violent shooting, "We can't do anything." I've heard it too many times in the last two years. We have to have your voices. Don't say that Congress can't do anything. You can make Congress do something.

President Clinton was there for my family when my husband was killed, and he tried to make this a safer nation, and he has. And I want to thank him for calling me or taking my call the night of last Tuesday, because I have to be honest with you; I didn't want to hear about another shooting. And I said to the president, "We have to do something." When he responded, the pain that was in his voice was so real, because he does feel the pain of the families and the children that have died, and he has seen too much. And I want to thank him for his dedication.

This is not an issue that politicians really like to push, believe me.

But the president has been on the forefront, and I want to thank him for helping me to initiate all the bills that are here and all the initiatives that we're going to take. And I'm certainly going to be fighting for the Children's Safety Protection Bill, because that's my job. No, all of us.

The large-capacity clips, some say that wouldn't work. Well, tell that to the three young people that died on the Long Island Railroad if there was only 10 clips -- 10 bullets in a clip instead of the larger clips. Child safety locks. Tell that to Catherine Murphy (sp), who lost her daughter, son, because somebody didn't lock their gun.

Mr. President, it's my pleasure to introduce you. And thank you again for your leadership.

PRESIDENT CLINTON: (Applause.) Thank you. Thank you.

Thank you very much, Carolyn, John Conyers, Senator Chafee, Senator Feinstein, all the many members of Congress who are here. I thank the attorney general, the secretary of the Treasury and the secretary of Education. I'm glad to see my old friend Mayor Helmke and Bob Walker and others here. We have, I think, over 40 members of Congress here and two senators who went back to the floor to fight for this issue to be put on the floor today.

I would like to do two things. First, I want to tell you specifically what we are proposing, and I'll do that. But secondly, I would like to tie what we are proposing to all these culture arguments, and talk about, if you will, at least two cultures that exist in America, and say that I think this in the end is going to come down to what our conception of America as a community is and what our responsibilities to one another are.

I want to begin by saying that a lot of people have made remarkable contributions, I think, to this effort to get us to look at the violence of our culture and how it makes the most vulnerable of our children, without regard to their income or their social status, closer to the line of taking violent action, and how it complicates family life for everyone. I want to thank Hillary for what she's done. I also want to thank Al and Tipper Gore, who have done enormously important work on this for years to try to help us deal with the TV issues, the ratings, the V chips, and now the new efforts we've been making with the Internet community to give parents some more control over that, and the efforts we'll have to make to train the parents to figure out to do it, since their kids all know more about it than they do.

But this is very important stuff. In June, Tipper Gore's going to host our White House Conference on Mental Health, and the attorney general and Hillary and I were just talking about some of the things we can do to help to make sure that all of our schools have the adequate mentoring and mediation and even mental health services our kids need. All this is very important. And we have to deal with that.

But if you believe that we have special cultural challenges, it seems to me that that's an argument that we ought to bend over backwards to try to remove the opportunities for bad things happening if we have more kids that are vulnerable to doing those things, not an argument that we ought to say, well, we should walk away from that and just try to make sure everybody individually in the whole country never does anything wrong.

And what's the real problem here? The problem is we have another culture in our country that I think has gotten confused about its objectives. We have a huge hunting and sport shooting culture in America, and unlike many of you, I grew up in it. I was 12 years old the first time I took a 22 and shot it at a can on a fence post in the country. I know about this. We always talk about the NRA. The NRA has been powerful not only because they have a lot of money but because they can influence people who vote. And in that culture, people believe everybody should be personally responsible for their actions; if you just punish people who do wrong more harshly, fewer people will do wrong; and everybody tells me I've got a constitutional right to keep and bear arms, so don't fool with me; and every reasonable restriction is just the camel's nose in the tent; and pretty soon they'll come after my shotgun and I'll miss the next duck hunting season. And we smile about that, but there are some people who would be on this platform today, who lost their seats in 1994 because they voted for the Brady bill and they voted for the assault weapons ban, and they did it in areas where people could be frightened.

And the voters had not had enough time, which they did have within two more years, to see that nobody was going to take their gun away.

So we have more than one cultural problem here, and I want to make a plea to everybody who is waiting for the next deer season in my home state to think about this in terms of what our reasonable obligations to the larger community of America are.

Do we know for absolutely certain that if we'd had every reasonable law than the ones I'm going to propose here, that none of these school violence things would have happened? No. But we do know one thing for certain; we know there would have been fewer of them, and there would have been fewer kids killed in the last several years in America. We know that for certain. (Applause.) We know that.

And cultures are hard to change, and cultures should never be used to avoid individual responsibility. But we -- when we get to where we change, then we wonder -- we look back, and we say, "How could we have ever done it otherwise?"

Let me ask you something. Next time you get on an airplane, think about how you'd feel if the headline in the morning paper right before you got on the airplane was, "Airport metal detectors and x-ray machines abolished as infringement on Americans' constitutional right to travel." Think about it. That's the headline in the morning paper. Then right next to it there's another headline: "Terrorist groups expanding operations in the United States." And you read the two headlines, and you're getting on the airplane, exercising your constitutional right to travel, which is now no longer "infringed" by the fact that you might have to go through the metal detector twice and take out your money clip or take off your heavily metaled belt, and that somebody is x-raying your luggage as it gets on the airplane. It's unthinkable now, isn't it?

This will become unthinkable, too, that we should ever reverse these things, if we ever have enough sense to do them. (Applause.)

Now -- but we still have a cultural and a political argument that says to defend Americans' rights to reasonable hunting and sports shooting, we have to defend the indefensible as well. This is -- it doesn't make any sense at all unless you're caught up in this sort of web of distorted logic and denial.

But Carolyn McCarthy may have made the most important point here. You know, we're all in here preaching to the saved. You wouldn't be here if you didn't agree. But somebody needs to call these members that grew up where I grew up, that lived in the same culture I did, that belong to both parties, and say, "Hey, we've got to make this like airport metal detectors and x-ray machines. This is about our community. This is about our responsibility to our children. This is about protecting our children and the vulnerable children themselves from people who are about to go over the line, here." And this is crazy that we're living in a society that takes no reasonable steps to protect the larger community.

So it's not just the culture of violence that has to change; it's the culture of hunting and sport shooting that has to stop financing efforts to frighten their members who are good, God-fearing, law-abiding, tax-paying citizens out there into believing that every time we try to save a kid's life it's a camel's nose in the tent, you know? (Applause.)

I have had to go through those metal detectors as many as three times back when I had a real life -- (laughter) -- and I was traveling around because I had all kinds of stuff in there. You know, and every time I started to get a little aggravated, I'd think, "Boy, I don't want that plane to blow up." (Laughter.) You know? Make me go through a dozen times if you want to, and the person behind me.

Now, we've got to think about this in that way. These are the folks we have to reach. When there are no constituents for this movement, the movement will evaporate. When people from rural Pennsylvania and rural West Virginia and rural Colorado and Idaho start calling their congressmen and saying, "Hey, we can live with this. We can live with this. This is no big deal, you know? I mean, we're just out there doing what we do. We believe -- we'll gladly put up with an extra hassle, a little wait, a little this, a little that, because we want to save several thousand kids a year."

That is my challenge to you. (Applause.) That is what is going on.

Now here are the things we want to do. A lot of you won't think they're enough, but you remember the culture. You change the culture, we'll change the laws. You change the message, we'll do it. And none of them have anything to do with anybody's legitimate right to hunt.

First of all, we ought to strengthen the Brady law. (Applause.) It's kept 250,000 felons, fugitives, and stalkers from guns. The states now have the Insta-Check (sp) system, which is good. The mandatory waiting period has expired; that's bad, because we need it, in addition to the Insta-Check (sp) system, to give a cooling-off period to people who are in a fit of rage. It's important.

The law that we would present, the act, will also prevent juveniles who commit violent crimes from ever buying a gun. It would apply the Brady law's prohibition to juvenile violence.

It would require Brady background checks on anyone who wants to buy explosives -- very important. (Applause.)

And it would abolish, at long last, as Senator Feinstein said, a dangerous loophole that was likely exploited in Littleton, which allows people to buy weapons at gun shows without any background checks at all. (Applause.)

Now -- now you need to go make this case on this gun show deal. I don't know how many of you have ever been to one of these gun shows. I've been to gun shows in rural America, and people walk around, you know, and they got their -- they've got their cars, and they've got their trunk open, and people walk in and say, "This is nice, and that's nice, and this is a hundred-year-old rifle," and blah, blah, blah. And then they say, "Aw, this is just too much hassle, you know." And the people pay cash, and you know, nobody, you know -- so it's going to be a hassle for them. It's worth it.

AUDIENCE MEMBER: That's right.

PRESIDENT CLINTON: It's worth it. (Applause.) And we're sorry; it's worth it.

You don't have to pretend it won't be a hassle. Tell them you know it will be a hassle. It's worth it. People's lives are at stake here. AUDIENCE MEMBER: Amen.

PRESIDENT CLINTON: What they started -- what these shows started out doing, which was a good way for people who lived in rural areas -- started out in primarily rural areas, who enjoy hunting and are interested in different kinds of weapons, to have an interesting experience on a weekend afternoon, has turned out to be a gaping loophole through which criminals and deranged people and other people get guns they could not otherwise get.

And so we have to say -- we haven't asked you to abolish your gun shows, but we've asked you to undergo the inconvenience necessary to save more lives. We don't have to be insensitive, we just have to be determined. But I'm telling you, if we don't do something about this gun show loophole, we're going to continue to have serious, serious problems. And it's very important. (Appaluse.)

The second thing we've got to do is to strengthen the assault weapons ban, to close the loophole that allows dealers to sell older high-capacity ammunition magazines manufactured abroad. Now, I bet you when Senator Feinstein was talking about this, you thought, "Now, who in the world could be against this?" I actually had a conversation with a member of Congress who said to me -- serious, a good person, who's a really good person -- when we were doing this back in '94, a really good person, this person I was talking to, who told me -- (laughter) -- let me tell you -- I just want you to understand what the argument was -- he said, "But you've got to understand, we've got people who use these bigger magazines for certain kinds of sport contests."

And I said, "Well, so what?" (Laughter.) But he said, "They'll beat me if I vote for this." I said, "They'll beat you if they think all you're doing is making their life miserable because some Washington bureaucrat asked you to do it. If you can explain to them that it's worth a minor alteration in their sporting habits to save people's lives, they won't beat you."

But my point is, you've got to help these people. See, you hear this, and you think, "God, this is a no-brainer, this is a hundred-to- nothing deal, who in the wide world could ever be" -- you have to understand, there is another culture out there, and almost everybody in it is God fearing, law abiding, tax paying, and they show up when they're needed, and they don't like this because they don't understand that if they do what you're asking them to do, they can save a lot of lives.

And we have got to fix this. This is just pure mathematics you're going to have fewer people die if you get rid of these magazines.

So you need to go out there where the problem is and debate your fellow citizens and discuss it with them. It's important.

The third thing the legislation would do is to raise the legal age of handgun possession from 18 to 21 years. (Applause.) It would also strengthen our zero tolerance for guns in schools, which, as one of the previous members said, had led us to 6,000 suspensions or expulsions last year, by requiring schools to report to the police any student who brings a gun to school and requiring that the student get counseling.

That, I think, is very important.

The provision holding adults criminally responsible would only apply but -- this is quite important -- but it would apply if they recklessly failed to keep firearms out of the reach of young people. This would mandate a steep increase in penalties for adults who transfer guns illegally to juveniles; it would require child safety locks to be sold with all new guns. (Applause.)

Finally, it would crack down on illegal gun trafficking, doubling the number of cities now working with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms to trace every gun seized by the police. I know this is very important to Congresswoman McCarthy. (Applause.) It would require that dealers submit information not only on the guns they sell, but on used guns which are often very hard for law enforcement agents to trace. It would significantly increase penalties for gun runners caught trafficking large numbers of firearms. It would establish a national system, as soon as it's feasible, to limit handgun purchases to one a month, following the lead of Virginia. (Applause.)

You know, I've got to say, this is very interesting. When we were going over the list of things we wanted to propose, some people said, "Well, that might be a loser because it sounds to people who care about this like that's too many, and, you know, what is this?" You know, the states that have had big problems in the past with lots of illegal gun purchases and guns then being used for illegal purposes -- Virginia did this and it really helped them. This was a big deal. And, I just talked to Senator Robb about this a couple of days ago, and he said, "You know, all I can tell you is it's working in our state." So I would ask you to seriously consider what this might mean for our efforts to control the law enforcement aspects of this. So, these are the things that I wanted to say. But I hope you'll remember what I said to you about the culture. We do have to keep working on the culture. Hillary's right about it, Al and Tipper Gore are right about it. We've got a lot of responsibilities. We've got to keep working on the services that kids -- we've even got to work on making, helping parents actually communicate with their children.

One senator called me the night before last and said he'd had a town meeting in his state with children. And he asked how many of the school children had actually talked with their parents about what happened in Littleton, and only 10 percent of the kids raised their hand. And one child said, "I had to go and turn off the television and tell my parents we were going to talk about it." She said, "They're just scared. You know, they're scared. They didn't know how to talk about it." So there are all these cultural issues.

And then there's this big cultural issue of the gun and sport hunting culture.

And I hope that -- a lot of my folks at home might take offense at what I said today, but I'm trying to help explain them to you. And I felt comfortable taking on these issues, and I thought maybe I was in a unique position to take on all these gun issues all these years because of where I grew up and because I understand how people think who don't agree with this.

But I'm telling you, we've got to keep working until people start thinking about this stuff the same way they think about x-rays and metal detectors at airports. That's the goal. It -- we have to redefine the national community so that we have a shared obligation to save children's lives, and we've got to get out of this crazy denial that this won't make a difference. This -- it's crazy, it won't make -- just because it won't make all the difference doesn't make -- mean it won't make a difference. It will make a difference. (Applause.)

And so -- so I implore you to remember what these members have said. I implore you to go out and get people going at the grass roots, as Carolyn McCarthy said. We need help. We can pass all this if the American people want it bad enough. We can pass it all if the American people want it badly enough. And we don't need to go through another Littleton for the American people to want it badly enough. You can help make sure that happens. Thank you. (Applause.)

Hillary Rodham Clinton Discusses Her Trip to Macedonia

CHRISTIANE AMANPOUR, CNN SENIOR INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENT: As first lady, Hillary Rodham Clinton has made scores of trips overseas with her husband, President Clinton. But she has also made at least 60 solo trips, but not as much as known about that.

Now, in her first interview in nearly a year and a half, Mrs. Clinton joins us to talk about her activism in the role of foreign policy, and about her recent trip to Macedonia.

Thank you very much for joining us.

HILLARY CLINTON, FIRST LADY OF THE UNITED STATES: Thank you, and I'm delighted to be here.

AMANPOUR: You were at the camp today, one of the biggest camps in the region. What struck you about what you heard there?

CLINTON: Well, I think my overwhelming impression was that what had happened to these people, the Kosovars, is just unforgivable and unforgettable. We have to do everything we can to enable them to return home in peace and in safety.

And I heard a lot of stories. You know, it's very hard when you're talking with people who you never met before, and you feel almost like you're intruding, but they want to tell you about what it felt like when they lost their children -- their hands were pulled away in a crowd of people being pushed by Serb police to get on trains, or when they, all of a sudden, were pushed from their home, and a husband loses a wife because she was visiting her father.

I heard so many stories in such a short period of time, and they confirmed what I've already heard from refugees in the United States and in London, and what I knew to be the case from other reports.

So I was very much saddened by what I heard and what I see happening, but also very sure that we are doing the right thing to try to enable these people to have a life and to end this century on a note of commitment to human rights in Europe.

AMANPOUR: Many people are saying that success in this mission is basically what happened to those refugees; success will be defined by getting them back.

What can you say to those people who say that it's gone on for a long time, and we are really worrying now?

CLINTON: Well, first of all, that's not what they said to me. They thanked me and asked me to thank my husband, and they said they were very grateful to the United States and to NATO.

And I think many of them of course are frustrated. It would be awful living in a camp, having lost your home, your possessions and maybe even family members. And I understand that, and I feel terrible about it.

But they have been subject to Mr. Milosevic's ethnic cleansing campaign for a long time. It started in small ways about 10 years ago where the Kosovars were forbidden to go to the theater or to the sports stadium, and then the schools were closed, and then they were afraid to drive their cars on the road. And then a couple of years ago they started being pushed out of their homes. And then last year we saw thousands of them in the mountains.

So this has been a long-term, deliberate policy by Milosevic. And we are attempting to reverse a decade of deliberate, persistent ethnic cleansing that has of course come to a crescendo in the last weeks.

And I know that in today's world of instant news and 24-hour coverage, 50 days may seem like an eternity. But in the kind of concerted effort that NATO has undertaken to bring about these changes and return the refugees, I don't think that it is a very long time at all. And when we are successful, as I know we will be, it will be exactly what needs to be done to send a very clear message not only to Milosevic but to anyone in this region, and I hope throughout the world, that this kind of action will no longer be permitted.

AMANPOUR: You called Milosevic's policies evil today, and many others have as well. Do you think Slobodan Milosevic should be indicted on charges of war crime?

CLINTON: I think that's a discussion that will have to take place at some point. But right now I think the immediate goal is to persuade him or defeat him, whichever is necessary, that he must reverse this policy. And if our primary objective, as it is, is to return the Kosovar refugees and give them the security they need to live at peace in Kosovo, then I think we need to put our attention and all of our resources on achieving that goal first and foremost.

AMANPOUR: Many people say he's still there, he's hunkering down, he's basically taking this beating right now and that it won't happen -- the defeat or the roll back -- unless there are ground troops. I can't ask you about policy, because that's not your role, but I'd like to ask you about principles.

During the Bosnia war, the Bosnians said, if you're not going to fight for us, let us fight for ourselves. For a long time they never got weapons. In the end, the West realized that they needed weapons and it made a difference when they got them. The KLA now is saying the same thing. As a principle, do you think it's fair to deny them the ability to fight if NATO says that it won't fight on the ground for them?

CLINTON: Based on the intelligence and information that I'm aware of, it seems very clear that the bombing is having an effect and that Mr. Milosevic and those with whom he governs, who are a very tight circle, are beginning to feel that. You don't see the bravado and the rock concerts and the like because they are suffering. And I believe that, if we continue the pressure that we have been inflicting on him, that there will be a roll back, and there will be a return of the refugees.

And I think that we ought to keep, again, our focus on what is working -- and it is working -- and be prepared to see it through.

AMANPOUR: There are many who say, and who bemoan -- many outside of the United States -- what they believe is a political climate that makes it impossible for the United States to commit in any way other than a casualty-free way, in other words to commit from 15,000 feet up. Do you agree that the political climate is such that -- prevents going the whole way, so to speak?

CLINTON: Well, I think if you define the whole way the objective, which is to return the refugees with appropriate security, I believe that the strategy that we are pursuing is likely to work. So I don't know that it's useful to speculate on what might come next, or what might be necessary.

Now it is always difficult to obtain the kind of political support for any action off of one's shores. I know that, in Europe, there's a constant effort to keep public opinion and political support, and it is the same in the United States. But I've been personally very pleased to see that public opinion in the United States is supporting the president's policy, supporting the Kosovar refugees, and I think we can maintain that till we are able to see our way clear through this.

AMANPOUR: We're always told Americans don't care about foreign news, don't want to know about foreign news; do you think that's right, or do you think Americans do care about what's going on in the world?

CLINTON: Yes, there is always a tendency in American history as one goes back, not even very far, to before the Second World War for us to feel quite isolated from the world's problems with our two big oceans on either side of us. But it is becoming increasingly clear, and it surely should be with what is going on here in the Balkans, that we stay isolated or disengaged at great risk. Because when it comes down to making difficult decisions, the United States must be part of the solution, not only in Europe but in other parts of the world.

So I've spent quite a bit of time in the last several years talking with Americans and encouraging more American interests and support for international engagement.

AMANPOUR: We're going to take a short break. And when we come back, we'll ask Mrs. Clinton about her own political views and aspirations.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

AMANPOUR: You have had a great impact on a certain area of foreign policy. Along with the secretary of state, I believe you have made the issue of women's rights a U.S. policy objective. What have you achieved, and what does that mean exactly? For instance, take the Taliban, the repressive people who are ruling Afghanistan right now. What does that mean for them, for instance?

CLINTON: Well, let me answer that first generally and then specifically. Starting with the Beijing conference in 1995, we made it very clear that women's role and participation and rights were something that were important to democracy and economic advancement, and both of those were in America's interest. And certainly with Secretary Albright becoming secretary of state, she and I both spoke at the State Department and made clear that as a matter of American foreign policy, we wanted to support women's objectives and rights around the world.

Now what that has meant is that we have seen issues a little differently than we used to. We understand that if women are denied education and participation, it's less likely that the society in which they reside will be a stable one or a friendly one. If women do not have access to the full range of economic opportunities, then it's less likely their societies will be economically successful. That's something that's been proven time and again.

And on specific issues where we have encountered gross abuses of women's rights, such as the trafficking of women as though they were pieces of goods, or more sinisterly as drugs, we've spoken out against that as a nation -- that has been raised in bilateral conversations. And specifically with the Taliban and their very gross mistreatment and denial of rights to women, we've made it clear that that regime would not be recognized until it took steps to include women as citizens -- as human beings.

The secretary has memorably said, and I have repeated it on many occasions, that the kind of violence and discrimination against women that we see still too often around the world can no longer be excused as cultural, it needs to be called what it is: it is criminal. And it is something that the United States has a vested interest in recognizing and including as part of the way we evaluate our positions around the world.

AMANPOUR: There have been critics, most recently Michael Mandelbaum, I believe, in "Foreign Affairs," who said that American foreign policy has become, sort of, a social work versus pragmatism. Since you do so much of these democracy and civil society, activism, women's rights, do you -- is that a fair criticism do you think in today's world?

CLINTON: Well, I think that it is very practical to look at the human needs of people around the world and factor those into foreign policy. Certainly during our Cold War years we were forced to sweep a lot of human rights abuses and denial of development and other matters under the rug, if you will, because we had a very specific objective, and that was to protect ourselves against Soviet expansionism, and to do everything we could to prevent countries and societies from falling prey to that.

Now that we no longer face that kind of threat, I think it is practical to see the world in a different way. Certainly our values remain the same, but if we want to have the United States be respected and recognized, as it now is, as the leader of the world, if we want to have friends and partners in every area from commerce to strategic involvement, then I believe we have to recognize the legitimate aspirations of the people in the societies with which we wish to do business.

So I don't view that as impractical. In fact, I view it as a long overdue practical assessment. Realpolitik, of course, means that we look at how countries are strategically located, and what our interests with them are, and how we balance them, but we now know that with the explosion of information, and with a continuing clamor for individual rights from all different kinds of groups -- not just women, but many ethnic, religious, racial groups -- it would be shortsighted of the United States not to factor that into our calculations.

So when I go around the world and I advocate for girls education, for example, it is because we have evidence and reason to believe that well-educated populations are more likely to understand and deal with the challenges of today and tomorrow, and therefore more likely to be involved in relationships that are positive with the United States.

AMANPOUR: You seem so committed, and you seem to get so much professional and personal satisfaction from what you do abroad, and you have the freedom to do it as first lady. Why would you give that up to become a senator in New York?

CLINTON: Well, I'm not sure that I can answer that question completely, and I -- if I make the decision to run for the Senate, I will have a lot to say about that.

But no matter what I do in the future, whatever course my life happens to take, I'm going to stay interested and involved in these issues, because I care deeply about them, but I also think they matter greatly. So no matter where I go or where I end up, in the next century I'll be, I hope, speaking out on behalf of these matters.

AMANPOUR: Have you -- are you any closer to making your decision?

CLINTON: Well, I will have something to say about that when I am ready, and it isn't here, in Macedonia, that I would talk about that.

AMANPOUR: Will it be in the spring, the summer the fall? Can you give us a little timeframe.

(LAUGHTER) CLINTON: It will be sooner instead of later, I think it's fair to say. This summer is not too far away.

AMANPOUR: A lot of the people I talk to, a lot of the women that I meet from traveling overseas, are very impressed by you and admire your dignity. A lot of the people you meet are people who suffered, people you saw today, and who believe that they identify with you, because they have seen you suffer.

And in a speech in Africa last year, you spoke about living for hope and reconciliation, living for forgiveness and reconstruction, and living for a new life -- have you been able to apply that to your own circumstances? Have you been able to forgive your husband?

CLINTON: I believe deeply in forgiveness and reconciliation, on an individual basis and on a societal one, as well. And, I think forgiveness is an ongoing effort and challenge, and it is something that I think about and engage in nearly every day -- on little matters, as well as the obvious large ones. And I feel very committed to that kind of life. And so, for me, it is a choice that I make about how I wish to live my life, and I'm very gratified that my husband and I have a very strong relationship and a lot of understanding of one another and a great commitment to each other and that we both appreciate the role that forgiveness has to play in anyone's life. Part of it is our religious faith and part of it is just our experience of human nature and how one always has to be ready to forgive if one wants to go on and live without bitterness and hope.

I was thinking about that today in this refugee camp. I thought about it when I went to Bosnia. These people will confront much more difficult challenges to their capacity to forgive: seeing loved ones killed, losing track of children maybe never to see them again. And yet, I think they understands, as I do, that life is always unpredictable and often unfair, and yet we have to make the decision every day, will we live it with hope or not?

You know, a few weeks ago, Elie Wiesel spoke at the White House, and I'd asked him to speak more than a year ago -- long before we knew what would be happening here in the Balkans -- and he spoke on the perils of indifference. And in that speech, he, of course, reminded us of the worst atrocities of the century in the Holocaust, but he also spoke movingly about what was happening here in the Balkans. And certainly the message that I and many there took away came at the very end, when he was asked how on earth could he advocate hopefulness in the face of what he had experienced as a boy in a concentration camp and what he had seen happen in this century and what was again happening because of Milosevic.

His answer is what choice do we have? How does one live without hope unless one wants one's soul to wither and die. And I believe that. And, of course, you know, in one's personal life it's not nearly as cosmic or as horrific as what has happened to people on a yearly basis in this century and is still happening today, as we speak. But the same principal applies. I mean, every one of us has a choice. You know, at the seminar that we had at the White House last week in the wake of Littleton, Colorado, it was a very moving and somber occasion because people were not pointing fingers and placing blame, they were honestly looking for and accepting responsibility by and large. And at one point one of the participants said, you know, perhaps we should have a national day of reconciliation the day before Thanksgiving. We have so much to be thankful for in the United States. And he said, you know, there are people in my own family who need to forgive each other.

And now there may be some who think that's very simple and very far away from the Balkans, but I think it's all related. I think how we live our lives and how we deal with whatever life throws our way, is played out on our own individual stage. And then if you look at the life of someone like Milosevic and his wife, it can be played out on the national stage. I mean, one doesn't have to be a psychiatrist to think what has happened to this man who was the subject of being an orphan because both his parents killed themselves? And a wife whose mother was arrested by the Nazis and then released and killed by her communist colleagues because they thought she was an informer. We are seeing their psychological anguish and bitterness acted out in their incredible hatred of those who are different from them.

So I think that in everyday ways how you treat your own disappointments and whether you're able to forgive the pain that others cause you and, frankly, to acknowledge the pain you cause to others, it's one of the big challenges we face as we move into this next century. And it's something that I certainly have faced. But I look into the eyes of people all over my country and the world, and I know it's something all of us face.

AMANPOUR: On that note, thank you very much indeed for joining us.

CLINTON: Thank you.

AMANPOUR: That ends our special report from Skopje, Macedonia.

EVENT TO ADDRESS YOUTH VIOLENCE, 6/1/1999

REMARKS BY PRESIDENT BILL CLINTON FIRST LADY HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON ATTORNEY GENERAL JANET RENO AND ROBERT PITOFKY, CHAIRMAN, FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION
AT AN EVENT TO ADDRESS YOUTH VIOLENCE
THE ROSE GARDEN, THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON, D.C.
SECTION: WHITE HOUSE BRIEFING

MRS. CLINTON: Good morning, and please be seated. And thank you for joining us today in the Rose Garden as we continue a national conversation about how to address the problems of youth violence in our communities and schools.

I want to thank everyone for coming this morning. And I'd like to acknowledge Congresswoman Sheila Jackson-Lee, Mayor Deedee Corradini, Mayor Timothy Kane (sp), and County Executives Wayne Curry and Charles Rupersburger. In addition to the chairman of the FTC, whom you will hear from in a minute -- Robert Pitofsky -- we also have Commissioner Sheila Anthony and Commissioner Mozelle Thompson. I'm also pleased that Pamela Eakes, who led the very innovative group, Mothers Against Violence in America, has worked with us on this event, as she has on past events that are also part of our efforts to try to create ways in which every American can take his or her part in doing whatever we can against youth violence.

As a nation, we've reacted to the shootings at Columbine High School like almost no other event I can remember in recent memory. It has literally pierced the heart of America. Yet in my conversations with young people and parents over the past few weeks, I've heard less talk about people feeling helpless or hopeless and more about a growing consensus that finger-pointing doesn't lead to solutions and that we have to move forward together to take steps to end the violence, not only in our schools, but in our broader community, and that it is time, some might say past time, that we all play a role in making a positive difference in the lives of our children.

I want to thank the attorney general and the chair of the FTC for joining us today, as well as the many parents, educators, religious leaders, members of the media, and students who are here as well. I am pleased that we will be hearing from a fourth-grader this morning who will tell us how he became part of the solution in his home state of Washington.

I think all of us recognize that there is no single answer or solution to the problem of violence in our society, but that we must move on many fronts, from passing common-sense gun control efforts, to helping parents understand better how to exercise authority over the media that their children are exposed to, and enabling more parents to spend more time with their own children. We've come together to talk about some of the ways we can begin to reverse the culture of violence that is engulfing American children every day, particularly the role that the media plays in shaping the lives and values of our children and young people.

In 1972, a surgeon general report said, and I quote, "We know that children imitate and learn from everything they see -- parents, fellow children, school, the media. It would be extraordinary indeed if they did not imitate and learn from what they see on television." The report went on to say that violence on television causes children either to mimic directly the actions they see or to act generally in a more aggressive way.

Yet today, more than 25 years after this report was written, our culture is even more saturated with TV programs, movies and songs that romanticize and glorify violence. What kind of values are we promoting when a child can walk into a store and find video games where you win based on how many people you can kill or how many places you can blow up?

We can no longer ignore the well-documented connection between violence in the media and the effects that it has on children's behavior. One study has found, for example, that if an actor is rewarded for violent behavior, children are more likely to imitate it. Another tells us that media violence has a particularly negative effect on children who already have a tendency toward aggressive or anti-social behavior. According to the American Psychiatric Association, viewers of violence not only become desensitized and fearful, they begin to identify with an aggressive solution to their own personal problems.

America's culture of violence is having a profound effect on our children, and we have to resolve to do all we can to change that culture. One of the ways that we can do that is to give parents the tools they need to control what their own children are exposed to, and we've already moved forward in that direction. Today's announcement is another important step in the fight against violence.

We know there is a lot of work to be done, but I am encouraged that so many leaders and citizens are coming together and talking honestly, not only about the challenges we face, but what we have to do together to meet those challenges.

I am particularly heartened that as a result of the meeting the president convened at the White House a few weeks ago there was general agreement from a broad cross-section of Americans that we would launch a national grassroots campaign to prevent youth violence. We would model the campaign on successful national efforts, like Mothers Against Drunk Driving, which showed us that we can change the culture when enough people from all walks of life say, "Enough is enough." So I look forward to seeing everyone working together on this new nationwide effort to prevent youth violence.

Now, I'd like to introduce someone who cares deeply about the future of our children and who has fought tirelessly to create safe schools and communities, our attorney general, Janet Reno. (Applause.)

ATTY GEN. JANET RENO: Thank you, Mrs. Clinton. Thank you for all that you've done to speak out, so strongly and with such effect, to protect our children.

The impact of media violence on children is one piece of a larger concern: the reduction and prevention of violence in society. We have made very real and substantial progress in recent years in reducing violent behavior in children and adolescents, but we've got to do much more, and we must learn much more about the problem. Recent tragic events have focused the nation's attention on a few very violent children and adolescents.

Children should have a chance to grow and develop in strong and healthy and positive ways. Promoting healthy development will require us to protect children from certain violent images which they're not developmentally prepared to handle. Very young children are unable to distinguish fact from fiction. Too often today children are exposed to images and messages that glamorize violence and minimize its consequences. Numerous studies have shown that violent programming can promote violent tendencies in children. Media violence can increase children's aggression towards others. Such programming can have a particularly negative effect on children who already vulnerable.

Advertising which uses violent images or encourages children to seek out violent content can also be damaging. Research demonstrates that until the age of 7, children are unaware of the persuasive content of advertising. Even after age 7, children and adolescents are still vulnerable to peer and status appeals, without being able to determine whether responding to those appeals will result in healthy lifestyle choices.

We want to work with the entertainment industry and not against it. We hope to improve the industry's knowledge base so that it too can make better choices that are in the interest -- the best interest -- of parents and children. We encourage the media not only to protect children from negative content but also to help parents protect their children as well. The V-chip, in conjunction with content-based voluntary rating systems that informs viewers of mature content or themes, has been a breakthrough in this regard. In addition, the movie, recording, and video game industries all use content-based ratings to improve the choices that parents have.

We now need to know more about how children learn about the existence and the content of violent materials and why they are drawn to them, whether it be movies or video games. It is my pleasure now to introduce Robert Pitofsky, chairman of the Federal Trade Commission. In the coming months, our agencies intend to work very closely together to expand our knowledge about the role of advertising in exposing children to violent entertainment materials. (Applause.)

MR. PITOFSKY: Thank you, Madame Attorney General.

I think it should be obvious already that we are here, representatives of consumer groups, business groups and government, because of a shared concern, a perception that there are increasing instances of senseless violence involving young people -- recent events show that to be true -- and that something needs to be done about it. We can't just observe it and talk about it; we need to take some actions.

Our particular focus today is on concerns about the violent nature of too many video games, movies and recordings currently available to young people that have a violent content. In considering that issue, however, we must remember two points:

First, we must recognize that concerns about the content of these products arise in an area of artistic expression and that they border on areas protected by the First Amendment against government intrusion. And we would hope to keep that in mind.

Second, we recognize that the motion picture industry, the video game and recording industries have recognized these concerns and have each implemented voluntary systems to rate the appropriateness of products for their children. These ratings provide parents with valuable information to judge what products are appropriate.

But we all know that advertising and marketing also play an important role in influencing young people. Today, as never before, children and teenagers are subject to a steady barrage of commercial messages that influence their choice of what they see, wear, eat and buy. Like the entertainment industry, the advertising and marketing communities realize the value of self-regulation and have implemented self-regulatory approaches.

In fact, one of the best examples of self-regulation is the advertising community and the work of its Children's Advertising Review unit, which contains several provisions urging advertisers to present their messages in a way that recognize the important potential impact of their advertising on child behavior.

My agency, the Federal Trade Commission, has a history of working with responsible elements in the business community in an effort to reach common ground on what we all recognize is a shared problem. We hope we can do that again here and reach that kind of result again.

Now, we have learned in our various projects that, if you are concerned about target marketing, you ought to talk to the person who is a target. And our next speaker, Arthur Salway (sp), is part of that group. He is a 9-year-old from Seattle, Washington.

Like many of his peers, he likes video games and wanted to learn about them. The story he will share with you today clearly illustrates the problem; hopefully, it also points the way to a solution.

Arthur? (Applause.)

PRESIDENT CLINTON: Arthur, let me give you the speaker box. You can be even bigger -- (inaudible). How is that?

ARTHUR SALWAY (sp) (a 9-year-old student from Seattle): Good morning --

PRESIDENT CLINTON (?): Good morning.

MR. SALWAY (sp): -- Mr. President, First Lady and guests.

My name is Arthur Salway (sp). I am a fourth-grader at Villa (sp) Academy in Seattle, Washington. I am very honored to be speaking to this audience today about violent video games.

Last year, with a family friend, I went to a movie store to rent some movies and saw this magazine about new video games. I wanted to buy it because the first few pages had fun games, airplanes and car- racing games.

When I got home and flipped through the pages, I came across an ad that said, "More fun than shooting your neighbor's cat." Also, the ad said: "Bang, meow! Bang, meow!" "Come on already. It is time we moved up the food chain and take aim at something that sounds better when it explodes. And you can, when you grab your gun, included free, that will have you firing until your fingers fall off."

I was horrified and knew this idea was wrong. I was disturbed enough to show the magazine to my mommy, even though I knew I would get in trouble. She was very upset, not with me, but at what she saw in the magazine.

She showed it to Mothers Against Violence in America, who then shared it with the Seattle Times.

They wrote an article about my story and other violent video game ads in the magazine.

Representative Dickerson (sp), who is here today, saw the article and wanted to do something about it, too. She called Mothers Against Violence in America and, together with my mommy, started an action group about the impact of violent video games on kids.

I'm happy I showed the magazine to my mother and that she knew MAVIA, because she had someone to turn to when she needed support and action. Now there is more awareness about the negative influence of violent video games.

I have my mommy, MAVIA, Representative Dickerson (sp), and the community to thank for listening to me. Now we are all working together to make entertainment for kids nonviolent. I would like to thank the president for inviting me here today; Ms. Pamela Eakes, who is here today, for founding Mothers Against Violence in America; and my mommy -- (laughter) -- for not getting mad at me, but listening to me when I'm scared, troubled, confused, hurt, alone, and discouraged. I am thankful I know the (Lord ?). I am glad I had the courage to do the right thing. I thought I might get in trouble with my mommy, but instead I am here at the White House today. (Laughter.) I have learned, with courage, a lot of good things can happen. Thank you. (Applause.)

PRESIDENT CLINTON: Wow! Good for you.

ARTHUR SALWAY (sp): I am now honored to introduce to you the president of the United States of America. (Applause.)

PRESIDENT CLINTON: Give him another hand. He was great. Bravo! (Applause.) Thank you.

ARTHUR SALWAY (sp): Thank you.

PRESIDENT CLINTON: When I was listening to Arthur speak, I didn't know whether to offer him a job as a White House speechwriter -- (laugh) -- or just wait for the opportunity to vote for him someday. (Laughter, applause.) Let me say thank you very much. (Applause continues.) Thank you.

And we thank your mother for bringing you here. (Applause.) And congratulations. And Representative Mary Lou Dickerson (sp), thank you, and Pam Eakes, founder of Mothers Against Violence in America, thank you.

I thank the attorney general and Chairman Pitofsky for their remarks and their commitment.

I thank Mayor Corradini, Mayor Kane (sp), County Executive Curry and County Executive Dutch Rupesburger (sp) for the interest that our local government leaders have. I thank Representative Sheila Jackson- Lee for her passionate commitment to this issue and all of you, welcome to the White House.

And most of all, I want to say again how much I appreciate Arthur Saway (sp) for coming here and for sharing a child's perspective. We have other children in this audience today, and we are really here about them and their future.

As Hillary said, the tragedy at Littleton had a profound effect on America. It certainly had a profound effect on us and on our family, particularly after we had the chance to go to Colorado and visit with the families of the children who were killed and many of the young children who are still grievously wounded and the kids at the school with them, who are hurting still, and the teachers.

I do think that what Hillary said is right. We sense a determination, not only in that community but throughout our country, not just to grieve about this but to do something about it. The national grassroots campaign against violence against children is rooted in our faith that we can do better. We know we can prevent more youth violence if we work together across all the lines that divide us. We know we can do it if we are all willing to assume responsibility and stop trying to assign blame.

Of course, the responsibility begins at home. It must be reinforced and supported at school and houses of worship and the community as a whole. Those of us in public service must also do our part. There is broad and growing consensus for us to do more. Let me say I am also grateful -- (clears throat) -- excuse me. I am also very grateful that the gun manufacturers came here last month and voiced their support for common-sense restrictions to make it more difficult for guns to get into the hands of children and criminals. I'm encouraged that the Senate acted to close the deadly gun show loophole, to require safety locks to be sold with every handgun, to ban the importation of large-capacity ammunition clips, and ban violent juveniles from owning guns as adults. I hope the House of Representatives will pass these common-sense measures as soon as they return from the Memorial Day recess. (Applause.)

We have a lot to do this year, but this should be put at the top of the agenda, and not put on hold.

As you have already heard, members of the entertainment industry must also do their part. They, and the rest of us, cannot kid ourselves; our children are being fed a dependable daily dose of violence -- and it sells.

Now, 30 years of studies have shown that this desensitizes our children to violence and to the consequences of it. We now know that by the time the typical American child reaches the age of 18, he or she has seen 200,000 dramatized acts of violence and 40,000 dramatized murders. Kids become attracted to it and more numb to its consequences. As their exposure to violence grows, so in some deeply troubling cases of particularly vulnerable children, does the taste for it.

We should not be surprised that half the video games a typical seventh-grader plays are violent. Anyone who doubts the impact of the cultural assault can look at what now, over 30 years, amounts to somewhere over 300 studies, all of whom show that there is a link between sustained exposure -- hour after hour, day after day, week after week, year after year -- to violent entertainment and violent behavior.

What the studies say quite simply is that the boundary between fantasy and reality violence, which is a clear line for most adults, can become very blurred for vulnerable children. Kids steeped in the culture of violence do become desensitized to it and more capable of committing it themselves.

That is why I have strongly urged people in the entertainment industry to consider the consequences of what they create and how they advertise it. One can value the First Amendment right to free speech and at the same time care for and act with restraint. Our administration has worked to give parents more tools to protect their kids, to block violent programming from entering their living room, with the V-chip and the rating system. We have made progress on parental screening for Internet and ratings for Internet game sites. Still, when violent entertainment made for adults is marketed to children, it undermines the rating system designed to protect them. And if you look at some of these ads, it's hard to argue with a straight face that the games were made for adults in the first place, like the one Arthur mentioned.

Advertisements have a particular role here. They have the power to egg children on and lure them in. Every parent knows what response a commercial for sugar cereal or the latest "Star Wars" toy will get from their children. People advertise because it works. They want that product, and one way or the other, they're determined to get it.

So we ought to think twice about the impact of ads for so-called first-person shooter video games; like the recent ad for a game that invites players to, and I quote, "Get in touch with your gun-toting, cold-blooded, murdering side."

I was given today -- Arthur brought me the magazine with the ad that he mentioned, and he was kind enough to mark it for me. There really is a gun here it says, "More fun than shooting your neighbor's cat."

I was given another ad that says, "What kind of psycho drives a school bus into a war zone?" And here's a school bus heavily armed. This came out right after the incident in Springfield, Oregon.

Here's an ad that turns the argument I just made on its head: "Psychiatrists say it's important to feel something when you kill." And then it goes on to say you ought to get this technology because it "buffs and you feel it." It says, "Every sensation, every vibration, every mutilation. Nine programmable weapons buttons. Customizable feedback software. Push the stick that pushes back and feel your pain."

And here's one, the most unbelievable, it says, "Kill your friends, guilt free."

Now, obviously Arthur has the inner strength and the good upbringing to reject that kind of violent appeal. Most of our children do. But not all of our children do. We cannot be surprised when this kind of thing has an impact on our most vulnerable children. Is it 100 percent to blame? No. It's easier to get guns in this society. Parents, on average, spend 22 hours a week less with their children than they did 30 years ago because of the demands of work and commuting, the busyness of daily life. But when you put it all together, there are bound to be explosive, negative consequences.

That's why today I am asking the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission to study the extent to which the video game, music and movie markets do actually market violence to children, and whether those industries are abiding by their own voluntary systems and regulations.

To any company that sells violent products, I say, children are more than consumers. I understand nobody made anybody buy any of this stuff, but every day a responsible society declines to do some things for short-term gain that it can do, and that is what we have to think about.

These children are our future, our most precious resource. Raising them is any society's most important job. Don't make young people want what your own ratings systems say they shouldn't have.

I might say, again, as has already been acknowledged, many, many people in the entertainment industry have worked with us on this, on the rating system, on the V-chip, on the screening technology for the Internet.

I noticed one network executive a few days ago actually cancelled a program because its violent content was inappropriate, and I applaud that.

But I also read with concern the news that some of the new programming coming up for this fall on some networks will be even more violent than last year's. The time has come to show some restraint, even if it has a short-term impact on the bottom line.

I also want to challenge the owners of movie theaters and video stores, distributors, anyone at any point of sale, enforce the rating systems on the products that you sell. Check the IDs. Draw the line. If underaged children are buying violent video games or getting into R-rated movies, the ratings systems should be enforced to put a stop to it. (Applause.)

And if, as many of us suspect, there is still too much gratuitous violence in PG-13-rated movies, the ratings systems themselves should be reevaluated.

I want to thank Senators Brownback, Lieberman, Hatch, and Kohl for the bipartisan work they have done on this issue.

Again, I want to commend State Representative Mary Lou Dickerson (sp) from Washington, who read about young Arthur, helped to create a task force on video game violence. And thanks to her work with Pam and the Mothers Against Violence in America, and the Washington Retailers Association, all -- who are all represented here today, video game retailers in Washington state now voluntarily sign a pledge to parents, committing themselves to check IDs and block sales of violent games to minors. That's something that ought to happen in every state in the United States of America. (Applause.)

Again, I say, we can do something about this. It will take a grass-roots campaign. It will take everybody doing his or her part. This is a problem we face together, a problem America can solve together. There is no more urgent task for our future.

You were all looking at this young man speaking today, thinking, "What a wonderful thing that a person that young could speak so clearly, so confidently about things that are so right." You look around at the other young people here today, who are involved in this effort in some way or another, and you thank God that we have this legacy of children.

A lot of those kids that haven't made it through all these school violence incidents were just as good, just as fine, had just as much to give the world.

We have got to quit fooling around with this. We have got a chance. Our hearts are open, our ears are open, our heads are thinking. I know this stuff sells, but that doesn't make it right.

Thank you. And God bless you. (Applause.)

CONFERENCE ON MENTAL HEALTH, 6/7/1999

FIRST LADY DELIVERS REMARKS AT WHITE HOUSE CONFERENCE ON MENTAL HEALTH

JUNE 7, 1999

CLINTON: Thank you.

(APPLAUSE)

Thank you very much. Thank you. If I had any voice, I'd break into "You Are the Sunshine of my Life" and dedicate it to Tipper.

But I'm delighted to be here and so pleased to see not only this packed room with standing room only, but to know that nearly 6,000 sites around the country are sharing in this first hand. This is a historic conference, but it is more than that. It's a real signal to our nation that we must do whatever it takes, not only to remove the stigma from mental illness, but to begin treating mental illness as the illness it is on a parity with other illnesses, and we have to understand more about the progress that has been made scientifically that has really led us to this point.

I don't believe that we could have had such a conference even ten years ago, and I know we couldn't have had such a conference 25 or 30 years ago when I was a young law student working at the Child Study Center at the Yale University and taking classes at the med school and working at the Yale New Haven Hospital and very interested in the intersection of mental illness and the law and in the development of children and other issues that we were only then just beginning to address. And we didn't have a lot of evidence to back up what we needed to know or how we should proceed with the treatment of a lot of the problems that we saw.

Well, today we know a lot more, and it is really our obligation and responsibility, therefore, to begin to act on that scientific knowledge. And I'm very pleased to be talking with a distinguished group of panelists about the science of mental health and mental illness. END

DARYN KAGAN: This is obviously President Clinton and the first lady. They are there visiting some of the 17,000 refugees still at this particular camp. This part of a trip through the Balkans for the president. As we understand it. Mrs. Clinton is about to introduce the president and then it is his chance to talk to the refugees.

They are chanting, let's just listen in.

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON, FIRST LADY OF THE UNITED STATES: Thank you, I am very glad that I could come back to see all of you now that there is peace in Kosovo and I know that many of you will be returning home and we are very grateful for that and I wanted to bring my husband and my daughter to see the people and to hear the stories that I did just five weeks ago.

Let me introduce the president of the United States, Bill Clinton.

(APPLAUSE)

WILLIAM J. CLINTON, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: Thank you. Thank you very much.

First of all, I would like to thank all the people who have shared time with my family and me, all these children and their parents, and I would like to say a special word of appreciation to all the workers here who have come from all over the world to help you recover your lives. I thank them very much.

(APPLAUSE)

(CHANTS OF "CLINTON")

Thank you. Thank you. The second thing I would like to say is that I have brought with me a number of people who helped me make sure the United States and NATO did the right thing by the people of Kosovo, and they are also very proud to be here. And I want to thank them, and I hope you will thank them. Mr. Berger and all the other people on our team, because we're proud of what we did, because we think it's what America stands for -- that no one ever, ever should be punished and discriminated against or killed or uprooted because of their religion or their ethnic heritage, and we are honored to be here with you. (APPLAUSE)

Thank you. Thank you.

(APPLAUSE)

I just want to say a couple of more words before the rain comes down.

The first thing is that we are committed, not only to making Kosovo safe, but to helping people rebuild their lives, rebuild their communities, and then to helping Kosovo and all the countries of the region build a brighter, more prosperous future, based on respect for the human rights of all people.

(APPLAUSE)

Thank you. Thank you.

Now, I promised all these wonderful people from all over the world who are here working for you that I would also say this: I know a lot of people are anxious to go home; many have already left. But you know there are still a lot of land mines in the ground on the routes into Kosovo and in many of the communities. We are bringing in the best people in the world to take those mines up.

Every year the United States does more than half that work all around the world. It is hard work, it is dangerous work. You have suffered enough. I don't want any child hurt. I don't want anyone else to lose a leg or an arm or a child because of a land mine.

So I ask you, please be patient with us. Give us a couple of more weeks to take the land mines up if the people here ask you to do that because you are going to be able to go back in safety and security. I want to make sure it is a happy return.

(APPLAUSE)

Thank you.

You have given my family and me a day we will remember for the rest of our lives.

All we want is for you to be able to live your lives. But I ask you to remember that the United States did not act alone. All of our NATO allies felt the same way, in Canada and Europe, and the president of the United States never acts alone. It is the American people who care about you, who believe in you, who want you to be free, who want you to be able to go home.

Thank you, and God bless you.

(APPLAUSE)

KAGAN: A heart felt cheering from Kosovar refugees still at the Stenkovec refugee camp in Macedonia. President Clinton and Mrs. Clinton visiting there today. The President addressing the group saying that no one should have to suffer because of their ethnic heritage, that he was honored to be among the people and that the U.S.A. and NATO was committed to building a brighter future for Kosovo, a more prosperous future based on respect for all people.

Our Wolf Blitzer has been traveling with the president. Wolf joins us on the phone.

Wolf, a very important part of the president's message today encouraging these people to stay in the camps for now until land mines can be cleared from the countryside.

How likely are the people to take the message?

WOLF BLITZER, CNN SENIOR WHITE HOUSE CORRESPONDENT: Well, I have spoken with most of the refugee officials here, the relief workers, the Catholic Relief Services, the U.N. Human Rights Commission people and they say the message, while it will be warmly received, will probably be futile. The 10,000 or so refugees at the Stenkovec camp, they expect within a week or two almost all of them to have gone back to Kosovo. A lot of their hopes are going to be disappointed when they get back to their homes and find the devastation there.

But they do anticipate, this Stenkovec camp, as well as the second Stenkovec camp about two miles away, to be emptied out within the next week or two. And despite the dangers of land mines, unexploded ordnance, the booby traps and all of that. So, while the president made an appeal, it probably won't work -- Daryn.

KAGAN: Wolf Blitzer traveling with the president.

"World News Tonight," ABC, 7/7/1999

SHOW: WORLD NEWS TONIGHT WITH PETER JENNINGS (6:30 pm ET)

PETER JENNINGS: Just a brief review of our top story tonight. Scientist say they've developed a vaccine that may one day help prevent Alzheimer's disease. It affects one in 10 people over 65. So far only tested on mice, but they're encouraged.

Finally from us this evening -- a political adventure begins. In upstate New York today, Hillary Clinton unfolded her garment bags and embarked on a very carefully planned courtship. As the first First Lady to run for elected office, Mrs. Clinton, as you know, is already getting a great deal of attention from the media.

Now comes the long and sometimes painful process of trying to bond with New Yorkers. ABC's Dean Reynolds was there for the opening.

DEAN REYNOLDS, ABC News: (voice-over) On a sunny morning near the Catskill Mountains, Hillary Clinton took her first serious step on a very long road. Accompanied by the man she hopes to succeed, Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan, the First Lady began this courtship of a place she has never called home.

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON, First Lady: Now I suppose the questions on everybody's mind is why the Senate and why New York and why me?

DEAN REYNOLDS: (voice-over) She got the questions right and had a well-planned answer.

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON: I think I have some real work to do to get out and listen and learn from the people of New York and demonstrate that what I'm for is maybe as important if not more important than where I'm from.

DEAN REYNOLDS: (voice-over) She has her own "Hillary In 2000" Web site now, no primary challengers in view and universal name recognition. Her choice of upstate New York for today's events, including a stop at the Soccer Hall of Fame, was designed to build a bridge to this predominantly Republican part of the state.

SUPPORTERS: We want Hillary!

DEAN REYNOLDS: (voice-over) Some spectators were friendly, but others were not.

PROTESTERS: Go home, Hillary!

MAN AT RALLY: I don't think New York needs her. We've survived without her and will continue to.

DEAN REYNOLDS: (voice-over) Mrs. Clinton said she will spend the next few months listening to New Yorkers about issues, building up expertise in intimate settings that may deflect charges that she is an opportunistic outsider. Her first attempt at that today had at least the look of intimacy, though cameras from around the world foreshadowed the kind of scrutiny she had better expect.

(on camera) Mrs. Clinton did something on the campaign trail today that is completely new for her. She spoke about her beliefs and her issues, and all with hardly a mention of her husband. Dean Reynolds, ABC News, Oneonta, New York.

PETER JENNINGS: That is our report on World News Tonight. Don't forget 20/20 later. On Nightline, more about Alzheimer's disease.

I'm Peter Jennings. We hope you have a good evening and that we'll see you tomorrow. Good night.

PRESS CONFERENCE WITH FIRST LADY HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON AND SENATOR DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN (D-NY), 7/7/1999

RE: POSSIBLE CANDIDACY FOR U.S. SENATE
DAVENPORT, NEW YORK

:Good morning. Do you hear me properly? Is that all right? Hi, Gabe. Liz and I welcome you to Derrymoor?? Your arrival required us to get the hay in a week early, which turned out to be a good idea, so John Briggs (sp) thanks you and welcomes you, also.

Mrs. Clinton and I have been up in the schoolhouse just for a little bit, which you can see over there. The schoolhouse was built in 1854; stayed a schoolhouse till the school bus arrived in 1946, and I've been in there for the last 36 years, and I can tell you, it's a good schoolhouse.

We have the -- I showed some of the records we have from 1856; I think you'd agree. The school had three teachers, 13 students, and 71 books in the library. One, do you remember "Paradise Lost" --

MRS. CLINTON: Plutarch's "Lives."

SEN. MOYNIHAN: Plutarch's "Lives," "A Life in Essays," of Franklin, "A Pilgrim's Progress." We haven't necessarily advanced in some -- in our educational reading assignments since 1856, but then, they still help.

Now, I have the great pleasure to welcome Mrs. Clinton to the farm and to turn over the microphone to our candidate. Before you do -- before I do -- and my God, I almost forgot -- yesterday Hillary Clinton established an exploratory committee as regards candidacy for the Senate, United States Senate, from New York, a seat which I will vacate in a year and a half.

I'm here to say that I hope she will go all the way. I mean to go all the way with her. I think she's going to win. I think it's going to be wonderful for New York, and we'll be proud of our senator, and the nation will notice.

And so here is that very same person. (Applause.)

MRS. CLINTON: Well, I want to thank Senator Moynihan and my friend Liz Moynihan for welcoming me and a few of my friends and associates here to their farm. I'm very grateful for their friendship and their hospitality and their support. It means a great deal to me to stand here with someone whom I admire so much.

You know, I'm starting a listening tour of New York, and I thought it only proper that I start by listening to probably the wisest New Yorker that we can know of at this time. And -- (applause) --

SEN. MOYNIHAN: Neighbors -- (off mike). (Laughter.)

MRS. CLINTON: And his neighbors agree!

MS. : (Me, too ?).

MRS. CLINTON: And we started in the schoolhouse, which is appropriate, because it is a place where Senator Moynihan has written so many of the books and articles and speeches that have been so important and influential in our country and in the deliberations of the United States Senate.

The last few months have been quite extraordinary for me, and I must say that I'm very humbled and more than a little surprised to be standing here today. But when New Yorkers began talking to me, as they did shortly after the Senator announced that he would not run again, I listened very hard. And the more I listened, the more excited I became about the possibilities of what could be done on behalf of the people of New York. New Yorkers from all walks of life have called me and written me and e-mailed me and stopped me and visited with me. And I think that there is a great feeling in this state that there's a lot of work ahead in the future, but it's work that people are ready to roll up their sleeves and do together.

So I intend to be spending my time in the next days and weeks and months listening to New Yorkers.

Now, I suppose the questions on everyone's mind is, why the Senate, and why New York, and why me? And all I can say is that I care deeply about the issues that are important in this state that I've already been learning about and hearing about; that I am very much concerned that we work together to try to find answers to the challenges that face New York and the people of New York. And I'm going to be listening very hard and I'm going to be learning a lot.

And I'm going to be looking for ways to work together with people to help figure out how to meet those challenges of providing quality education, many longer in a one-room schoolhouse but in the various settings that exist around the state of New York. And providing good, quality, affordable health care, and making sure that the crown jewels of the health care system -- namely, the teaching hospitals -- are able to continue doing the work that is so important to all of us. And making sure that the economy is built in a way that creates good jobs in every region of the state of New York. And continuing the fight that the senator has championed to ensure that New York gets its fair share from Washington.

I've been a tireless advocate all my life on behalf of what I believe in, and I believe that the causes that are embodied in the political deliberations that the United States Senate will be facing in the future are ones that are very important. You know, the Senate when it's at its best is really there to represent what the people need and how best that it should be accommodated. So I would be, if I run and am honored to be elected, a strong and effective advocate on behalf of the people of New York.

I'm very excited about this. I'm looking forward to it. It's great to be out here on this beautiful day.

And over the next few days, I expect to meet with and hear from a lot of New Yorkers and to have a chance to learn even more about what's on their minds.

So thank you so much, Senator, for having me here.

SEN. MOYNIHAN: Thank you, Ma'am.

Q Mrs. Clinton, how do you address --

Q Mrs. Clinton, why do you --

Q Mrs. Clinton, how do you address the issue --

Q Mrs. Clinton, why would you go through this considering the last seven years --

MRS. CLINTON: Let me start with Andrea and then I'll come to you, sir.

Q How do you address the issue that Rudy Giuliani has raised that you're a "carpetbagger"? There was a protestor at the airport, just one person, but raising that issue as well up here? How do you answer them?

MRS. CLINTON: I think it's a very fair question, and I fully understand people raising it. And I think I have some real work to do to get out and listen and learn from the people of New York and demonstrate that what I am for is maybe as important if not important than where I'm from. I'm looking forward to living in New York. That is something that my husband and I had talked about and planned in any event.

But I take very seriously the very legitimate questions of New Yorkers about what I believe and what kind of skills and interests I would bring on their behalf, were I to run and be elected to the Senate. So I understand that, and I'm looking forward to talking with a lot of people and, hopefully, making it clear that if I were given a chance, I would be a very strong and effective advocate for the people of New York.

This gentleman was -- yes? Q Mrs. Clinton, why would you go through this after the seven years you've had in the White House including -- (off mike)?

MRS. CLINTON: Well, I've actually enjoyed my time in the White House! (Laughs.) I know that that may cause some real concern among some people. But when I look back on these years and what has been accomplished for our country, the experiences that I've had and the contributions I've been able to make on behalf of issues and causes that I care deeply about, I am very excited about the possibility of considering this run and continuing public service on behalf of the people of New York.

I have no illusions that it will not be a very difficult and challenging race, but that's what should happen in a democracy. I think that's to be expected. We need that kind of back and forth and exchange of ideas from people. So I am -- I'm very anxious to get out and listen to New Yorkers and learn from them, and I'm very excited about figuring out ways we can work together.

SEN. MOYNIHAN: We're going to be a little short, but Gabe (sp) there has been after you for some time.

MRS. CLINTON: Yes, Gabe (sp)?

Q Mrs. Clinton, what about those of your critics who say that it takes a lot of chutzpah to come to a state that you're not from and run for the Senate?

SEN. MOYNIHAN: Gabe (sp), we're in Delaware County. Now what was that word? (Laughter.)

MRS. CLINTON: Well, you know --

Q (Inaudible.)

SEN. MOYNIHAN: Good for you.

MRS. CLINTON: Good for you. Yeah.

Well, Mr. Pressman, you know, when people came to me and said why don't I consider this, that fact crossed my mind. I have to confess. I said, you know, that seems like a very strange idea.

But the more people talked to me and the more I listened, and the more encouragement I got, and the more I really understood about the kind of issues that New Yorkers are concerned about, from one end of the state to the other, I really thought that I maybe could make a contribution.

And I am going to leave that to the judgment of New Yorkers. You know, I am going to just get out there and listen and work and talk with people. And then eventually, New Yorkers are going to decide whether it is a good idea or not. But I am excited about it, and I am really looking forward to it.

And I am told that, you know, that characteristic is not all bad in certain parts of New York. So I may need a little of that, I think. (Cross talk.)

Q (Inaudible) -- Mrs. Clinton?

Q (Inaudible) -- the issue over the Peace Bridge and the relationship of trade between the U.S. and Canada, what specific design would you favor and why?

MRS. CLINTON: Well, I am going to let the expert speak on that. (Laughs.)

Q (Inaudible.)

SEN. MOYNIHAN: We are reviewing the prospect of the Signature Bridge or of turning the existing bridge -- a lot of good faith and energies going into the process. The prospects of military operations and repeat the Battle of Lundy's Lane, very slim, very slim. (Laughter.) Q Mrs. Clinton?

Q Why here? Why not --

MRS. CLINTON: Yes?

Q To what extent do you think you will have to forsake your duties as first lady? Will you be able to campaign and fulfill that role also?

MRS. CLINTON: I think so. You know, it is not so dissimilar from someone, for example, being in the Congress and running for the Senate or being a governor and running for another office. And I have some obligations in my present responsibilities that I intend to fulfill. But I am going to spend as much time as I possibly can, meeting with and listening to New Yorkers and learning about the issues facing New York. But I also want to be responsible and make sure that I fulfill the obligations of the position I have.

And I don't really see a contradiction to that. I think that we are a long way from the election. I must say that I think it will do everyone some good if we just sort of take this at a slower more relaxed pace.

That is one of things I am actually looking forward to. I am really excited about being able to take these long, beautiful summer days and, you know, kind of at a leisurely pace with, you know, a few hundred of you -- travel from place to place and meet people and stop and visit. That's very exciting to me.

I know it may not sound like, you know, the way many people would look forward to spending days, but I'm excited about it and I'm looking forward to it.

Q How will you deal with the critics who don't believe you when you're dealing with the White House billing records and turning $1,000 into $100,000, who have been part of a strong campaign concerning that?

MRS. CLINTON: Well, I think that New Yorkers will make their own judgments about that. I think we've moved beyond all of it. And I'm going to be talking about the future of education and health care and making sure that upstate New York gets the same kind of economic opportunities that the rest of the state has enjoyed. And I think that's what people are going to be talking to me about.

Q Mrs. Clinton, have you put the scandals behind you?

SEN. MOYNIHAN: How many more? Can we have two more questions?

STAFF: How about we take three. There, there, there.

MRS. CLINTON: All right.

Q Given your reputation as an advocate for children, and the senator's own very strong views on the issue, can you talk a little bit about the (1996 ?) Republican -- (technical problems with sound).

MRS. CLINTON: (Technical problems with sound) -- the bill that the president eventually signed. I had some strong concerns about some of the issues that were being pushed at that time by the Republican majority in the Congress. For example, I was very concerned when the Republican Congress attempted to de-link Medicaid from welfare. But eventually, the bill was in a state that I felt should be signed, although there were still problems with it that needed to be remedied.

I'm personally very gratified that we've seen the kind of progress that we have in the last several years in moving people from welfare to work. But I think we're going to have to remain very vigilant about the effects of these changes, and we're going to have to be ready to take action if for some reason people are severely disadvantaged in ways that can't be remedied in the market or through the means available to them. So I supported welfare reform, and I supported it because I believed that the system was so broken and that the political conditions were such that we had to make some dramatic changes in order to kind of clear the decks, provide opportunities for people who were able to become independent and self-sufficient, and really then take a hard look at what was left; who were the people that were truly dependent that were going to need some help? And we are learning more about that. We have a long way to go.

SEN. MOYNIHAN: One center. (Calling on questioner.)

Q A lot of people see you as the number-one victim of the Monica Lewinsky scandal. I wonder if you see yourself as a victim and if you think you benefit from the sympathy vote.

MRS. CLINTON: Well, I'm looking forward to meeting with New Yorkers, and I think they'll have a lot to tell me about what they think about me and the positions that I have. I see myself as someone who is ready and willing to get out there and find out what's on people's minds so that I can be responsive and make a decision about this race.

Q Do you think you benefit from people's sympathy? And --

Q About education and health care, the issues that you are addressing or listening to people talk about today, these are all issues that (poll ?) very strongly with women. I was wondering how much of that is a factor in your decision to focus on these issues.

MRS. CLINTON: Well, these are issues that I have worked on and been concerned about all my adult life.

You know, starting back when I was a law student, I began a particular interest in the well-being of children and what we needed to do to support families. And I have worked on that in many ways. I was involved in leading an effort to reform education when my husband was governor and have been very much involved since 1983 in working on behalf of improving education. And I've had many opportunities, both in the private sector, where I served on corporate boards, as well as in the public sector, where I worked with a variety of organizations, to think hard about how we create good jobs and how we provide people the skills in a changing economy to be able to take those jobs. So it's something that isn't new to me. It is what I've worked on and cared about my entire adult life.

What's new to me is being on this side of the microphone and talking for myself and talking on behalf of what I believe, and I'm looking forward to that.

SEN. MOYNIHAN: Okay. Can we --

STAFF: Thank you all.

MRS. CLINTON: Thank you very much.

(Cross talk.)

SEN. MOYNIHAN: We thank you. We're going to stop for a cup of coffee in the house. And I guess you're next down in Oneonta, at the Soccer Hall of Fame. (Cross talk continues.)

Hillary Clinton Takes Listening Tour Into Republican Territory

HIGHLIGHT: Hillary Rodham Clinton spoke out about the shootings and the gun issue during her latest political swing through New York. Gun control has been a recurring issue for the first lady on her listening tour, as she weighs a run for U.S. Senate, but this time she ventured upstate into solidly Republican territory.

JUDY WOODRUFF, CNN ANCHOR: Hillary Rodham Clinton spoke out about the shootings and the gun issue during her latest political swing through New York.

CNN's Jonathan Karl is covering Mrs. Clinton's unofficial Senate campaign.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

JONATHAN KARL, CNN CORRESPONDENT (voice-over): First lady Hillary Clinton wasted no time before using the Atlanta massacre to make a political point.

HILLARY CLINTON, FIRST LADY: And I think it does once again urge us to think hard about what we can do to make sure that we keep guns out of the hands of children and criminals and mentally unbalanced people. And I would hope that the Congress would take action on the legislation that is now pending before it as soon as possible.

KARL: Gun control has been a recurring issue for the first lady on her listening tour, as she weighs a run for U.S. Senate. This time she ventured upstate, into solidly Republican territory.

But aside from a few persistent hecklers, Mrs. Clinton has been treated more as a celebrity than an outsider. At an impromptu stop at Light's Coffee Shop in Elmira, she got a warm welcome from the town's former Republican mayor.

HOWARD TOWNSEND, FORMER ELMIRA MAYOR: I come here every morning for coffee, and this is a surprise to me, a good surprise. I'm glad to have her in town.

KARL: Polls show Mrs. Clinton in a dead heat with New York's Republican mayor, Rudy Giuliani, the other high-profile but undeclared candidate.

MAURICE CARROLL, QUINNIPIAC COLLEGE POLL: But there is no question that both of them, as far as upstate is concerned, are outsiders. She's from Arkansas -- or Illinois. Take your pick -- he's from New York City. And, you know, upstate, to be mayor of New York is like being mayor of Sodom and Gomorrah.

CLINTON: Do you all like to read books and have books read to you? What are your favorite books? UNIDENTIFIED CHILD: I do.

CLINTON: You do.

KARL: The first lady's forays into New York have had more photo opportunities than specifics, but on this trip she attacked the Republican tax cut plan and urged Congress to fund the White House plan for 100,000 new teachers.

CLINTON: Recently in the House it was voted to renege on that commitment to fulfilling the 100,000 teachers goal, and it's a shame.

KARL: Mrs. Clinton says she is encouraged by what she has heard on her listening tour.

CLINTON: I am interested in pursuing this very exciting possibility of considering a run for the Senate from right here in New York, and it is the only thing I'm interested in. And I get more interested and excited about it every day.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

KARL: Mrs. Clinton said she hopes New Yorkers will care more about what she is for than where she is from, but she continues to be dogged by the carpetbagger issue. In the most recent New York poll, more than 50 percent say they are concerned that the first lady is not a New Yorker -- Judy.

WOODRUFF: Jonathan, we notice the first lady is speaking out more during these campaign or pre-campaign swings. Is she still calling it a "listening tour"?

KARL: She's still calling it a listening tour and she's still saying she's not made up her mind to run. But as you heard her say today, she said that she is more convinced now than ever that this is an exciting possibility but still hasn't made that final step.

REMARKS BY FIRST LADY HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON AT COMPTROLLER'S ANNUAL STATE FAIR LUNCHEON, 8/30/1999

SYRACUSE NEW YORK STATE FAIRGROUNDS SKANEATELES, NEW YORK

MRS. CLINTON: (Applause.) Thank you. Thank you very much. Thank you so much.

Thank you for that wonderful, warm welcome to Bill and to our daughter, Chelsea, who is with us. We are so pleased to be here. And I want to thank you for letting us come to share the excitement that always is part of the New York State Fair.

I'm especially pleased to be here with the Comptroller and with Joyce. They are wonderful friends, but more than that, their public service, and particularly the comptroller's leadership and what he has meant to the state over the last year is really extraordinary and exemplary. Everywhere I go around New York State, there is certainly one thing that I hear over and over again, and that is how well-liked and how well-respected Carl McCall is. So it's an honor to be here with him. (Applause.) And I also want to thank Mike Bragman for welcoming us and for his many kindnesses. I recall so well being with him and Sue and their family in his backyard listening to people talk about education and the economy and other issues facing Syracuse and central New York. And I'm very grateful for his advice and his support as I go through the state listening to New Yorkers. And there isn't any better place to do that than at a state fair.

You know, Bill and Chelsea and I were reminiscing about the state fairs that we have known and visited and attended. And Bill will probably have more to say about that in a minute because, like the comptroller and like many of you who do attend the fairs, there's so much going on that it's hard to take it all in. And there's all sorts of contests and occasions for honoring different sorts of people. He was telling us as we pulled in that he recalls on Seniors Day, which I think is also today here at the State Fair -- right? So it's Senior Day and I think it's Dairy Day, as well as Comptroller's Day, so a triple header. (Laughter.) And we'll try to eat some cheese and see some seniors, too, as well today. (Laughter.)

But as we were pulling in, he was reminding Chelsea and me that he used to go to the state fair on Seniors Day back in Arkansas, and he used to give an award to the oldest man and the oldest woman and the couple that have been married the longest and the people who had the biggest families.

And he reminded us -- I can recall very clearly his just amazement when he met a woman and gave her the award because she was the mother, grandmother, and great-grandmother of 150 people. So, that kind of put things in perspective for us -- (laughter) -- as we came in.

But we are delighted to be here, and we're so looking forward to our days here. We're going to Skaneateles, we're going to have time as a family, we're going to get to meet a lot of people, we hope, and I think he's going to get to play a lot of golf and we're going to get to see more of this beautiful part of New York.

But one of the great joys that I've had in the last several months is to travel around this extraordinary, beautiful, diverse, dynamic, exciting state and meet a lot of different people in all different kinds of settings. I've been from one end of this state to the other, and I'm going to be back many times.

But what I'm especially pleased by is the way people are coming forward with ideas; ideas that they think would help to make New York an even greater state; ideas that would create more opportunities for jobs and good incomes and I know how important that is right here in central New York and throughout upstate New York; ways that we can do better to make sure every one of our children has a first-class education; to try to make sure that everyone can afford quality health care; to try to be sure that we really maximize all of the benefits and advantages that are here in New York.

And people have asked me time and time again -- I was asked in Buffalo, I've been asked in Jamestown, I've been asked in Long Island, I've been asked all over the state, Well, what am I learning? And certainly, I'm learning a lot about the diversity of New York, but I'm also learning about the common aspirations and hopes that New Yorkers have. And it's really kind of symbolized by something as great as this state fair, because when you think about it, people come from all over the state, they have agricultural interests and industrial interests, they're here for entertainment, they're here to have a good time. They're here to see what might be new and exciting in the future, and they come together for just a few days, but in a spirit that really does represent the best of this state.

And I hope that is the spirit that I'll be able to bring out and to see more of as I travel around and as I talk with people about their ideas. Because there's a lot we can be proud of as a nation.

In the last six and a half years, we have made a lot of progress. We have more blessings than any people have ever had in the history of humanity, right here in the United States at the end of the century. And New York has always been at the center of whatever was happening, not only in our country, but in the world.

Yet as much progress as we made, we know we have more work to do. I am not satisfied that we don't have good jobs for everybody who wants them. And I am certainly not satisfied that here in upstate New York, where so much of America's industrial and economic strengths started, right here in this part of this state, that there have been too many people who have had to leave, looking for opportunities elsewhere and that there are not enough good jobs for the good hardworking people who live here.

And so that's something we have to work harder on together. And I am not satisfied that, as much progress as we have made in appreciating the importance of education, we haven't done enough to work with our teachers and our principals and bring parents into the process so that every student understands what is expected of him or her in the future and works hard to achieve that.

And I'm not satisfied that, all too often, the challenges to growth and economic opportunity here are ones that we should be addressing and that Carl and others have addressed. There are the high transportation costs, particularly airfare, which we hope is going to be addressed with some of the new airlines coming in; the extraordinarily high power costs, which have kept many industries from expanding or even settling here; high state and local taxation -- the kinds of problems that people talk to me about.

So there is a lot of good work that has been done, and a lot more we can do together. And I'm pleased that I might have a chance to be part of continuing the progress that New York has always represented and that we have seen happen in our country in the last six and a half years.

And I'm very grateful to have been a part of what this president and vice president and administration have tried to do to give people more of a chance in the future. And I know that my husband is not satisfied either; he intends to keep working every day that is left to him as president. And I think that's the kind of support -- (applause) -- it's the kind of support for hard work and responsibility and progress that many of us in this room share, whether it's here, in central New York, or anywhere throughout the state or the country. We know that we can always do better. That's part of what it means to be an American and certainly what it means to be a New Yorker.

So it gives me great, great personal pleasure to be here. And it's a real privilege to introduce to this audience the third president -- (laughter) -- who has visited the New York State Fair, the president of the United States, Bill Clinton. (Applause.)

DAN RATHER, co-host:

First lady Hillary Clinton has spent the summer on what she calls a listening tour of New York, crisscrossing the state and talking with voters about their concerns. It's all part of the run-up to what now seems a virtual certainty, her candidacy for the Senate. But while she has been listening to New Yorkers, people around the country have been focused on something she said. In a recent interview with the new magazine Talk, she raised the possibility her husband's problems may be linked to his troubled childhood. But she has said little else except for when she talked to us back in May about her future, her marriage and how she made it through the scandal that almost cost her husband his job.

RATHER: (Voiceover) Even though the Clintons are on vacation, they are hard at work raising campaign cash, money that will be used to fund the first lady's expected run for the Senate.

It's an unprecedented move for a presidential spouse, but then Hillary Clinton has a history of making history.

Mrs. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON: (From previous video) I suppose I could have stayed home and baked cookies and had teas, but I--what I decided to do was to fulfill my profession, which I entered before my husband was in public life, and I've tried very, very hard to be as careful as possible, and that's all I can tell you.

RATHER: Once, a political lightning rod...

Unidentified Announcer: (From graduation video) Hillary Rodham Clinton!

RATHER: (Voiceover) ...today, she is political lightning, a crowd-pleaser and first-class fundraiser, a person under enormous pressure to step into the arena, this time on her own.

Mrs. CLINTON: You know, a--a year ago it had never crossed my mind. Even six months ago, it wasn't anything that I'd ever thought about, but I'm very committed to, you know, learning about a lot of different issues that I've worked on all my life, and how they affect people in New York, because I think that, you know, everything that happens in America happens in New York. And as I've listened to people and talked with them, the kinds of things I care about: education and health care, better jobs, better, you know, balance between work and family, the kinds of issues that I think are gonna be on the front burner in the years to come are ones that are of great concern to New Yorkers and of great concern to me.

RATHER: Question, Mrs. Clinton: With all that you've been through in politics, you know, virtually under siege for at least the last year and a half, why in the world would you want to go into that kind of campaign...

Mrs. CLINTON: Well, you know...

RATHER: ...particularly in a tough state like New York?

Mrs. CLINTON: Well, you know Dan, I--I'm someone who thinks that, you know, we are so blessed to live in this country. And, for me, having an opportunity to serve in the United States Senate, if that's what I were to decide to do and were fortunate enough for the people of New York to give me that chance, would enable me to work with people and bring people together and try to solve problems that were on people's minds.

(Footage of Clinton, president and Vice President Al Gore)

RATHER: (Voiceover) But what's on the minds of many Americans is her marriage and the personal troubles that have been played out so painfully, so publicly.

President BILL CLINTON: (From previous video) I did not have sexual relations with that woman.

(Footage of President Clinton)

RATHER: (Voiceover) In a year and a half of denials and details and DNA, she has maintained her silence.

Pres. CLINTON: (From previous video) These allegations are false.

RATHER: You know, you never met anybody who wants to respect your privacy more than I do...

Mrs. CLINTON: Thank you.

RATHER: ...but you're a very public person...

Mrs. CLINTON: Mm-hmm.

RATHER: And sooner or later in New York, they're gonna say, 'Why are you still with this man?'

Mrs. CLINTON: Oh, you know, we've been together for, I guess, 28 years. We've been married--we'll be married 24 years this year. And we have a deep and abiding commitment to one another. And it is something that has been part of our lives, really, almost from the time we met. And, you know, I'm--I'm old-fashioned enough not to talk about my private life, and I respect your respect for it, but I--I think that, you know, I look back on all of those years together and it's just something that means a great deal to both of us.

RATHER: Given what you've been through the last year and a half or two years, did you ever consider leaving him?

Mrs. CLINTON: I am not going to talk about that. I--I respect you, Dan, but I'm not going to answer those questions.

RATHER: (Voiceover) Seven years ago on "60 Minutes," she seemed to ridicule the idea of staying with a straying husband.

Mrs. CLINTON: (From 1992 "60 Minutes") You know, I'm not sitting here as some little woman standing by my man like Tammy Wynette. I'm sitting here because I love him and I respect him and I honor what he's been through and what we've been through together. And, you know, if that's not enough for people, then, heck, don't vote for him.

RATHER: (Voiceover) Today she doesn't talk about fidelity. She talks about forgiveness, and dealing with personal pain.

Mrs. CLINTON: Sometimes things come totally out of the blue, and something good or terrible happens to you, neither one of which you could have predicted, and--and probably certainly don't deserve. Life is not by any means fair or easy for anyone, but part of what I think we're challenged to do is to keep trying. And to keep trying not only on our own behalf, but on behalf of anyone whom we can touch and whom we can help.

RATHER: You mentioned you're a religious person. Did you find yourself praying more over the most difficult period?

Mrs. CLINTON: Well, I've--I've prayed a lot ever since we've been in the White House. It's been--it's been a circumstance that certainly requires a lot of prayer and a lot of people...

RATHER: You smile, but I--I sense you're serious.

Mrs. CLINTON: Well--well, I'm very serious about it. I have prayed a lot and I have been prayed for a lot. And I have been grateful for the prayers of people I know, and people I will probably never meet. And it has helped me enormously. And, you know, sometimes it's--it's--it's a way not only of pouring your heart out, but of really getting filled up again with, you know, some energy and some hopefulness and positive feelings that can carry you forward.

(Footage of Clinton addressing a committee)

RATHER: (Voiceover) She has always been more comfortable explaining health care...

Mrs. CLINTON: (From committee video) On the benefits package, we have priced that out very carefully, congressman.

(Footage of Clinton talking to press)

RATHER: (Voiceover) ...more effective fighting off financial questions...

Mrs. CLINTON: We went into Whitewater to make money, not to lose it.

(Footage of Clinton on "Today" show)

RATHER: (Voiceover) ...more at ease on national television blaming partisan politics for her husband's problems.

Mrs. CLINTON: (From "Today" show video) It's this vast right-wing conspiracy that has been conspiring against my husband since the day he announced for president.

(Footage of Clinton and the president at a public gathering)

RATHER: (Voiceover) Hillary Rodham Clinton's latest incarnation is probably the one she likes least: long-suffering wife; for some, an object of sympathy.

(Excerpt from Democratic Convention; Clinton with the president at Democratic conventions; Clinton sitting with the president; Clinton getting out of limo; Clinton addressing New York Democrats; Clinton with teen-agers; Clinton with Boys and Girls Clubs members)

RATHER: (Voiceover) But now the woman who has always been at his side and on his side may be about to step out on her own. She is once again on the brink of breaking new ground for American first ladies. But the agenda she lays out seems downright old-fashioned. She sees her work as focusing on children and families and the unique problems they face today.

Mrs. CLINTON: In some ways, I think we've been running kind of an experiment, if you will, in raising of children. It's not anything anybody planned. It's been unwitting. But we've been changing the way we live, and we've been tearing down a lot of our institutions, we've been undermining a lot of old values. We've allowed all kinds of influences in our front doors that we never would have before, to influence the lives of our children. We've worked in ways, and our families are structured differently than was ever done before. So there's just been many, many things that have changed within one or two generations, which we really have to pay attention to. And we--and we really have to start taking some action on--on behalf of our kids.

RATHER: Give me a specific one or two things, something concrete you think we could do and should be doing.

Mrs. CLINTON: We have to be better connected to each other and particularly to our children. We have to do more to build a sense of community. Now what does that mean? Well, it may mean that our high schools and our schools are too large for children to really feel connected to the adults who are there, for the adults to know them. You know, I was recently in a school in Queens, in New York City, and--and I was just stunned that in a school built for 1,500 kids, there were 2000 kids, and that there were gonna be 500 more because of overcrowding.

RATHER: You mentioned again children.

Mrs. CLINTON: Mm-hmm.

RATHER: It--it's been--you know--it's been your--your burning passion--it's just--to what you've been connected for most of your career. Did or did not the president, your husband, last year, did he communicate mixed messages to young people about right and wrong?

Mrs. CLINTON: Well, I--you know--again, I'm not gonna go back and, you know, talk about that in any public way at this time. I think he has, himself, spoken about the people he let down and the disappointment he caused. So I will let him speak to that.

But I think no matter who you are or no matter what you do or what's done to you, there's always the chance to try to make it better. That there's always the hope for forgiveness; to forgive and be forgiven. And that comes certainly out of my religious faith, but it also comes out of my personal experience.

RATHER: Do you believe in redemption?

Mrs. CLINTON: Absolutely. I've seen too much of it. I've not only seen it in the lives of other people, I've seen it in my own, and those I love around me. So I do.

(Footage of Rather and Clinton during interview; Capitol building at night; Clinton listening to president's State of the Union address)

RATHER: (Voiceover) She has set firm boundaries that she doesn't want broken. And whether she runs for the Senate or not, she is already on a campaign to make Americans define public and private the way she does.

Pres. CLINTON: (From State of the Union address) In her historic role to serve our nation and our best ideals...

RATHER: (Voiceover) But in the Clinton White House, public and private, his past and her future, are hard to separate.

If you were to run and if you would be elected, you would walk into the United States Senate, famous or infamous, depending on your point of view, being a pit of dealmaking compromise, and you'd be walking into a Senate in which a large number of the senators, or the same senators who had put your husband on trial and, indeed, tried to run both of you out of Washington, for all intents and purposes.

Mrs. CLINTON: But, you know, it is the United States Senate. It's part of the most important legislative body, I would argue, in the history of the world. And there are a lot of good things and there are a lot of good people who are working hard together. And, you know, after all the years that I've been in Washington and after all the difficulties and the challenges that you refer to, you know, I still really believe that we are blessed to be Americans and that public service is a privilege. So I'm not at all discouraged or pessimistic about the political process. I just know how tough it is. I know a lot more about that than I did before I got to Washington.

RATHER: Like it or not, I know you'll like it not, your husband is one of two presidents to have been impeached.

Mrs. CLINTON: Mm-hmm.

RATHER: Do you agree or disagree it's gonna be in the first paragraph of his obituary?

Mrs. CLINTON: Well, I--I don't know. I--that depends--I suppose it depends on who writes the obituary. I don't think that it is by any means the most important contribution of his presidency, which I consider to be filled with very significant progress for our country.

RATHER: He told me that he'd--in an interview...

Mrs. CLINTON: Mm-hmm.

RATHER: ...that he did not consider it a badge of shame. Do you?

Mrs. CLINTON: It was such a political process. It was--it was a tragically political misfortune for our country. And I think that when the history is written it'll be seen in a broader context and will be more understood.

RATHER: You've talked about that before, but--if--now have a chance to reflect on a little, of all the allegations, accusations, charges made, what do you consider to be the most--the--the most unfair attack?

Mrs. CLINTON: Well, you know, I think that the entire process was an unfortunate one, and I'm just glad it's behind us now. I'm glad that--that we survived that painful period. And it was painful. It was painful obviously for me and for my family and for our country.

(Footage of Clinton talking to Rather; Clinton walking in crowd; woman using camera)

RATHER: (Voiceover) It is the most she will share about the past year and a half, and for some in our confessional society, that may not be enough. But Hillary Clinton doesn't care.

She's intent on sharing something else: Not what she's gone through, but what she's come away with.

Mrs. CLINTON: You know, when you go through any kind of difficult experience, you have a choice. I mean, you can let it break you and embitter you, or you can take whatever you've experienced, whatever pain or suffering, and decide that you're still gonna have faith. You know, your faith in God, your faith in your fellow man, that you're still gonna believe that you can make a contribution to a better life. It's a choice. Every single day we wake up, you can choose to be cynical or hopeful. You can choose to be grateful or contemptuous. You can make all those choices. And for me, it's not a very hard choice.

WHITE HOUSE RELIGIOUS LEADERS PRAYER BREAKFAST, 9/28/1999

REMARKS BY HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON AND PRESIDENT BILL CLINTON AT WHITE HOUSE RELIGIOUS LEADERS PRAYER BREAKFAST
THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON, D.C.

SECTION: WHITE HOUSE BRIEFING

MRS. CLINTON: Good morning, and welcome to our annual Prayer Breakfast. And so many of you are here for the first time, but we have some old friends as well, and this is an event that is very important to the president and to me personally and to the life of the White House.

I am very pleased to introduce Reverend Han (sp) of the Korean United Methodist Church of Greensboro (sp), Indiana. He will give us our blessing and then the president will say a few words and then we will have breakfast, and then after breakfast we hope to have a discussion, as we've had in previous years. And then we'll close with a benediction from Sister Nancy Sylvester.

As I ask Reverend Han (sp) to come forward, I would just say that we've had, in this past year, an unfortunate series of incidents related to religious and racial hatred. Reverend Han's (sp) congregation suffered a tragedy on July 4th when one of his parishioners was murdered leaving church, and I know that many of us have prayed for his congregation as we have prayed for all of those who have encountered and suffered from acts of violence or bigotry because of their religious faith this past year. And we will not only pray, but resolve to work against any such actions in any way that any of us can in the year to come.

Reverend Han (sp), please join us.

REVEREND HAN (sp) (Pastor, Korean United Methodist Church, Greensboro (sp), Indiana): Let us pray. Our Heavenly Father, we thank you for giving us this opportunity to share our experiences with others, including President and Mrs. Clinton. We give you thanks for this meal and the benefits of your bounty. We give you thanks for the hospitality of your house and for the companionship of the way that we have experienced around these tables. Give us wisdom and power and strength to overcome any evildoing like hate crime. Give us grateful hearts, our Father, for all your mercies. Make us more critical of ourselves and more tolerant of others. Make us mindful of the needs of others and make us your instrument for your peace.

May God bless America and the whole world. In the name of the Lord, we pray. Amen.

RESPONSE: Amen.

NEWS CONFERENCE ON THE MINIMUM WAGE, 9/28/1999

FIRST LADY HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON HOLDS NEWS CONFERENCE ON THE MINIMUM WAGE WITH SECRETARY HERMAN, SENATORS KENNEDY AND BOXER AND OTHERS WASHINGTON, D.C.

BONIOR: Well, good morning to you all, and thank you all for coming.

Last week on the Capitol steps we announced a discharge petition to bring up a vote on the minimum wage, and we have yet to hear from the House Republican leadership. Last week Senator Kennedy tried to bring up the minimum wage in the Senate, but the Republican leadership there blocked it. So we are back here again today. We are not going away. We are not going to give up, and we are not going to stop until this Congress takes action to give 12 million working Americans the raise that they deserve.

I want to offer a special welcome to the first lady, Hillary Rodham Clinton. There is nobody who has been more committed, more passionate about helping America's working families. And this study backs up what she's been saying all along, that working families deserve a raise. No mother can raise a family on $5.15 an hour.

There are those who say that raising the minimum wage cost jobs. Well, the evidence proves them wrong. And to them I say, look at the data. Check the statistics. Read the studies. After the last increase, there was no job loss. Employment actually went up in the minimum wage sector.

In yesterday's Washington Post I read that a certain Texas governor might support an increase of the minimum wage, but only if the states can opt out. Well, that's like saying all drivers have to stop at a red light, unless they want to opt out. Or that chemical factories can't dump waste in our rivers unless they want to opt out. Or that states have to abide by civil rights acts unless they want to, of course, opt out.

I hope this doesn't come as any news to Mr. Bush, but 12 million Americans who work for the minimum wage can't opt out. They can't opt out of paying rent. They can't opt out of their electric bill, and they can't opt out of buying groceries for their children. We need to raise the minimum wage, and we need to do it now.

We have the votes in the House of representatives. We have the support of the American people. We have a discharge petition at the clerk's desk, and the clock is running. When -- when will the Republican leadership stop blocking the minimum wage increase? When are they going to start to listen to the American people? When are they going to do for working Americans what they did for themselves? The clock is running.

I would now like to thank two people who have made a great contribution to our understanding of this issue, Jared Bernstein of the Economic Policy Institute, and Heidi Hartman of the Institute for Women's Policy Research. They have teamed up to do a remarkable bit of research for this report. We are grateful to them for their insight, and we thank them for joining us today. Please welcome Jared Bernstein.

(APPLAUSE)

BERNSTEIN: Thank you. When Francis Perkins, who became the first female cabinet member, was offered the job of labor secretary, she told President Roosevelt that one of her conditions for taking the job was the introduction of the minimum wage. She told FDR to be sure he wanted the wage floor, because, quote, "because you don't want me for secretary of labor if you don't."

Like Secretary Herman and our first lady today, Miss Perkins understood the vital importance of the minimum wage to women workers. Because of their low wages, female workers are overrepresented among those who will be affected by the increase to $6.15. And among this population, minority workers and single moms are also overrepresented.

If Congress wants to help make work pay for working women, and to help close the gender pay gap, this increase is a key part of the package.

Those who oppose raising the minimum wage will forever trot out the argument that the increase will force low wage employers to fire or to hire fewer of those workers affected by the increase. The evidence, however, clearly contradicts this claim. Since the last increase in 1996, the low wage labor market has been stronger than ever. In recent months, the unemployment rates of African Americans, Hispanics and 16 to 24-year-olds, all of whom are likely to be low earners, hit 30-year lows.

But nowhere is the myth of disemployment more clear than in the case of single mothers. These women have sharply increased their participation in the labor force as reflected by their booming employment rates. After stagnating for many years, these rates rose steeply from 62 percent in '95 to 69 percent in 1998, directly over the period when the minimum wage was increased.

For women leaving the welfare rolls, employment rates grew even faster, and now stand at their highest record on level. It is trends like these that have taught us one of the most important economic policy lessons of the current robust recovery: The macro economy is the key determinant of the employment opportunities for low wage workers, most of whom are women. But the wage that these women receive once they enter the labor market is very much a function of where Congress decides to set the minimum. Disregarding this reality can only serve to swell the ranks of the working poor.

BERNSTEIN: It's now my pleasure to introduce a tireless advocate for working women and for the minimum wage, our Labor Secretary Alexis Herman.

(APPLAUSE)

HERMAN: Good morning, and thank you Jared.

I also want to thank this morning Senator Kennedy and Congressman Bonior for their fight for working families in our country today, but especially for their efforts to help raise the minimum wage.

And of course I'm honored to be here today with America's number one advocate for working families in this country, America's number one advocate for children: our first lady.

I recognize that we are here today to talk about Jared Bernstein and Heidi Hartman's important study. But this really is not an academic debate. It is about paying the rent, it is about buying food, it is about making sure that we can take care of our children. In fact, this is really about the reality of paychecks and reality checks.

And the reality is, is that for too many working families in our country today, you cannot make ends meet on simply the minimum wage as it exists. We need to recognize that 75 percent of those who are on minimum wage today are in fact adults. Three out of five are women, and they are the sole breadwinners for their families.

And we cannot talk about raising families in this country today if we are not prepared to talk about raising the minimum wage.

Now, you know the last time around all of the critics said that if we raise the minimum wage that we would wreck havoc to the economy, and in fact, the sky would fall. Well, the sky didn't fall, but unemployment did. And it literally fell for virtually every group in this country.

It's true, for teenagers, we are at a record low. For African- Americans, we are at a record low. For Hispanics, for high school dropouts.

If you look at every economic indicator in our country today, the fundamentals of our economy are solid, they are strong. And what raising the minimum wage will help us to underscore is the fact that we have to also make sure that the values that underscore our country will also be strong, and that we can make sure that everyone has a fair shot and a fair chance to share in our nation's prosperity.

And there's someone that champions every day the right of workers in this country to share in that prosperity. She is someone who truly honors the values on which this country was built. Our first lady recognizes that work is not just a source of income, but it is also a source of dignity.

Please welcome the number one champion for children and working families in this country, our first lady, Hillary Rodham Clinton.

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: Oh, thank you, thank you very much, thank you.

Well, I am delighted to be here with all of you to support the increase in the minimum wage and to highlight yet again another study that demonstrates how important raising the minimum wage is. And I certainly recommend this study to anyone who needs to study this issue because we now have proven once again through analysis of the economic data that the minimum wage is a good deal. It's a good deal for the economy, it's a good deal for workers, it's a good deal for our country.

There are a number of people here who have been stalwart champions of the needs of working families, particularly working women. I want to thank Representative Bonior and Secretary Herman. I also want to thank Jared and Heidi and their colleagues, who have done such a great job.

In the audience there are a few other people who I have recognized who I know have been on the front lines of fighting for the needs of working people, and I particularly see our good friend Evie (ph) here, and I want to thank you, Evie (ph), for being here and for all the work you've done.

Now when we come again to ask the Congress to give working Americans a raise, it's fair to ask just what does this mean and who does it affect?

CLINTON: Well, the work that people on minimum wage do is vital work. It's the work of caring for children, it's the work of ringing up the food at the supermarket, it's the work of cooking and serving our meals. It's the work of cleaning our offices, of cutting and sewing our clothes, of caring for our aging parents and grandparents.

The wage increase that Congressman Bonior and Senator Kennedy are urging would mean a direct raise of $2,000 a year for these working Americans.

Now, I have met a lot of people, particular women, across our country who have detailed to me the difference $2,000 a year would make in their lives and the lives of their children, how that could mean seven months worth of groceries or five months worth of rent or ten months worth of utility. That extra dollar-an-hour might mean they would no longer have to worry about whether they had to try to find a second job and take time away from their children.

There will be no better time to raise the minimum wage. Frances Perkins was right all those years ago; our economy is stronger when everyone shares in the benefits of economic growth and prosperity.

Because of this administration's fiscally sound and socially responsible policies, we do have a record 19 million new jobs, the lowest unemployment rate in a generation and record-breaking home ownership rates. And the earned income tax credit has been the single biggest anti-poverty measure in our country's history next to Social Security.

So we have done a lot in the last six and a half years, the administration and members of Congress working together to try to give working Americans a fairer chance and to make sure that work pays. But there are still millions of Americans who are not realizing the full benefit of this economic prosperity.

You know the value of the minimum wage dropped more than 25 percent during the 1980s. I just want you to think about that. If you had been working for the minimum wage and you had been getting up every single day and you'd been going to work to clean those offices or serve those meals, every year you worked the value of what you brought home dropped.

By 1998 we know that the comparison of just 20 years before meant that in -- well, even 20 years before, a woman or a man working at a minimum wage full-time wouldn't be living in property. Twenty years later that was no longer the case. I don't think it's right that any person in our country works full time and brings home wages that leaves that person and that person's family in poverty.

The proposal pending before the Congress to increase the minimum wage would simply restore the real value of the minimum wage to what it was in 1982. We're not asking for special favors for these millions and millions of people who do a lot of the work that keeps this country going. We're asking for fairness and for respect and for economic security and for the chance to share in the prosperity that so many of the rest of us have enjoyed.

American can afford to raise the minimum wage. The last time it was raised in 1996, 10 million Americans got a raise and the economy continued to create jobs at an unprecedented pace.

Now, raising the minimum wage is certainly an American issue and a human issue, but it is particularly a woman's issue.

CLINTON: It is also a children's issue and a family issue.

So I would hope that every member of Congress the next time they visit a parent in a nursing home, sit down at a restaurant for a meal, see someone cleaning their office, or know what goes on in so many other settings where people work hard every day, would want every American to share this kind of prosperity and would vote to raise the minimum wage.

If I'm not mistaken, we have voted to raise the congressional wage -- haven't we, David?

And I would like to see members of Congress do the same for these 12 million working Americans.

And there isn't anyone who has championed this cause more or worked harder to make sure that working Americans did get a fair shot and that they're contributions to our country and our economy were respected and recognized than a man who has been a great champion and a great spokesman for a lot of the important issues of the last half of this century -- does that scare you a little bit, Ted...

(LAUGHTER)

... and that is the senior senator from Massachusetts, Ted Kennedy.

(APPLAUSE)

KENNEDY: Thank you very much, Mrs. Clinton. We're honored by your presence here because, as you have noted here today and reminded us so often, that with the greatest economic prosperity in the history of this country, there are men and women who have been left out and left behind.

On every single issue that we have faced in the Congress over the period of the last seven years that have involved children and the well-being of children and the neediest of children, you have been there speaking for them, not only here in Congress but all across this nation.

And for every time that we have addressed the issue of decency and fairness in the workplace, and particularly for women and mothers in the workplace, you have been an articulate and forceful spokesperson for those causes.

And on the issue of the minimum wage, you have written about this, you've spoken about this, you have urged the members of the House of Representatives and Senate to go ahead and advance this cause. We're proud to have you here. We welcome you in this battle.

And at the time that we do sign -- the president signs the increase in the minimum wage, there will be no one who has made a greater contribution to advancing that time than Hillary Rodham Clinton, and we're honored to have you here as part of the team to raise the increase in the minimum wage.

Mrs. Clinton has pointed out who the workers are that receive the minimum wage. They're in the schools across this country today as teacher's aides, helping and assisting teachers to try and educate the children and the future generation.

They are assistants in nursing homes trying to take care of our parents and grandparents, either in nursing homes or in home care facilities.

They are the men and women that toil long and hard in the buildings and where great decisions are made in order that our economy be strong.

And they are hard working men and women.

This is an issue that is a women's issue since 70 percent of all the minimum wage workers are women.

It's a children's issue since families where millions of children are living will be affected by the increase in the minimum wage. They'll have better lives, they'll enjoy better quality time with their parents. It's a children's issue.

It's a family issue so that families can live in dignity and in peace and stability with their children. It's a families issue.

It's an issue of civil rights since the great numbers of those individuals at the bottom rung of the economic ladder are men and women of color. It's a civil rights issue.

It's a fairness issue. Just about a week ago, the roll call was taken in the United States Senate, and it was virtually no opposition -- read the record -- by any of our Republican friends for $4,600 a year increase in their pay scale.

KENNEDY: Read the record. No opposition to increasing their own wages -- $4,600 in one year. What we are asking is that same Republican leadership that supported the increase for every member of Congress for $4,600 to let us go to the floor of the United States Congress and Senate of the United States and let the people speak on the issue of the increase in the minimum wage. And we are satisfied that we will win that vote in the Senate of the United States, in the House of Representatives.

We do not believe that anyone who wants to work, will work 40 hours a week, 52 weeks of the year, should have to live in poverty in America. We believe that Americans believe that.

(APPLAUSE)

This above all is a fairness issue. And the American people understand fairness.

Senator Lott, Speaker Hastert, let the American people speak. Let us vote on increasing the minimum wage.

(APPLAUSE)

BONIOR: Well, we thank you all for coming and we appreciate your attendance here today, and we look forward to working with you in this battle as the weeks and days go ahead. Thank you.

The First Wives Conference, CTV National News, 9/30/1999

LLOYD ROBERTSON: And finally for us tonight. Proof positive that behind some of the western world's most powerful decision makers are some very decisive women. Aline Chretien and Hillary Clinton won the hearts of all Ottawa today without having to win a vote. The wives of the Canadian Prime Minister and the US President showed that the making of public policy can begin at home. CTV's Jim Munson has more.

JIM MUNSON [Reporter]: Looking very much the politician she wants to be, the wife of the President of the United States was the star attraction at this spouses summit.

ALINE CHRETIEN [Canadian Prime Minister's Wife]: To introduce our next speaker, Mrs. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

MUNSON: And she charmed her old friend Aline Chretien, reminding the Prime Minister's wife of skating together five years ago on the Rideau canal.

HILLARY CLINTON [US First Lady]: And my piece of advice is do not ice skate with Aline who is a graceful, beautiful ice skater. But she does everything that way.

MUNSON: A graceful public speaker in her own right, Clinton quickly reminded sceptics of just how much influence she and other wives have had in shaping public policy over the past five years. She gave an example.

CLINTON: Because we set a goal of eliminating measles by the year 2000, measles cases have fallen 76 percent in our region.

MUNSON: To have Hillary Clinton get messages like that across has set the tone for this gathering.

HUGETTE LABELLE [Conference Moderator]: If you consider who the First Spouses are, they are people who have a tremendous opportunity because of who they are.

MUNSON: And because of who she is, Hillary Clinton was also asked to dedicate a sculpture at the new American embassy.

CLINTON: Are you ready?

UNIDENTIFIED MAN: One, two, three, cut.

MUNSON: Six hours on the ground, and the woman who some believe wouldn't mind having her husband's job one day was off to Washington.

CLINTON: Thank you all. Bye, bye.

MUNSON: Jim Munson, CTV News, Ottawa.

ROBERTSON: And that's the kind of day it's been on this September the 30th. I'm Lloyd Robertson. For all of us here at CTV News, good night.

NEWS CONFERENCE WITH SENATE MINORITY LEADER DASCHLE AND OTHERS ON EDUCATION, 10/22/1999

DASCHLE: Good morning, everyone. Negotiators will be working through this weekend to try to finish next year's budget for the federal government, so we wanted to take this opportunity to say again what our bottom line is concerning education. These are the things the administration and Democrats in Congress must be in the final budget or there is no deal.

In addition to my colleagues, Senators Tom Harkin, Ted Kennedy, John Kerry and Patty Murray and Byron Dorgan, we're honored to have with us two very special guests, First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton and Krystal Wells, the first grade teacher from Hammond, Indiana.

Earlier this week, the day after congressional leaders met with the president at the White House to talk about how to finish the budget, our Republican colleagues suddenly announced that they wanted to spend more money on education than they originally proposed. We consider that a real sign of progress. It's a sign they understand how important good schools are to America's children and parents and to all of our futures. Unfortunately, the Republicans apparently still don't understand that it's not just how much money you spend on education, it's also how you use the money that matters.

Republicans want to give states a blank check with no accountability. We want schools to invest in things we know work. We want to help communities repair and replace old schools, because children can't learn and teachers can't teach in schools that are crumbling or overcrowded.

We want to expand after-school programs so parents don't have to worry when they're at work. They'll know that their children are in a safe place with responsible adults doing constructive things.

Most of all, we believe this Congress must keep a bipartisan commitment that we made last year to reduce the size of classes by putting 100,000 new teachers in America's classrooms. Ask any teacher -- any teacher -- and they'll tell you 35 students in a classroom isn't teaching, it's crowd control.

Over the next decade we're going to have to hire two million new teachers, two million new teachers to keep up with the increasing enrollment and teacher retirements. Yet the Republican education budget doesn't include one dime -- not one nickel -- to hire new teachers. Even worse, it doesn't include any money to re-hire the nearly 30,000 teachers who were hired last year under the president's 100,000 new teacher plan. There's no guarantee in the Republican budget that any of those teachers will be back next year. That pink slip should not be a reality for those 29,000 teachers, but that is the reality unless we win this fight.

So we're saying to budget negotiators that that has to change. The administration's budget includes enough money to keep the 30,000 teachers who were hired this year, plus enough money to hire 8,000 additional ones. It's the right plan for America's children and for our future.

The president has promised to veto any budget that fails to keep the bipartisan commitment we made last year to hire 100,000 teachers, and we have 38 senators who will sustain that veto. In fact, we have signed a letter that I have with me this morning that will do just that. Thirty-eight signatures on a letter that says, you send us a bill that is not meeting that goal, we will sustain a veto, any veto the president makes on that basis alone. This letter says it. These senators will do it.

Because it's not just how much money you spend, it's what you spend money on, there is no better investment in our children's education than new teachers.

It is now my pleasure to introduce one of those new teachers, Krystal Wells. Krystal is one of the 30,000 teachers hired this year under year one of the president's 100,000 new teacher initiative. She teaches first grade at Morton Elementary School in Hammond, Indiana. We're delighted to have her this morning.

Krystal.

(APPLAUSE)

WELLS: Thank you, Senator Daschle, and good morning. On behalf of all new teachers who were hired through the class size reduction initiative, I would like to thank all of you who had the foresight to invest in the learning of our children. From the perspective of a new teacher or any accomplished teacher, a smaller class size affords us the time to give quality attention to the needs of our students.

WELLS: As a teacher, I see your efforts to reduce class size as confirmation that you truly value education; that you understand the complexity of learning; and that you believe in learning for all, not just some.

In Hammond, Indiana, we have 16 elementary schools with approximately 150 first and second grade classrooms. Our school district, in conjunction with the Hammond Teachers Federation, chose to use all of its class size funds for three elementary schools in desperate need. I was hired in a collective effort to improve math and reading skills. With a small class, I can have one-on-one time with all of my kids, and I can have a close relationship with their parents.

I am proud to be a part of this initiative and to give back to the children of Morton (ph) Elementary, where I actually attended school as a child.

I am here today to say that reducing class size is critical. As a fourth-generation teacher, I have heard the horror stories of crowded classrooms and I know how fortunate my students are to have a teacher that can give them the attention that they need and deserve.

In fact, in addition to smaller classes, all of Hammond's newly hired elementary teachers participated in more than 70 hours of professional development programs. Our goal is to ensure that all students perform at or above grade level in reading and math by the third grade. Last year's class size funds brings us closer to that goal and brings Hammond's children closer to achieving their own dreams.

Reducing class size is more than an administrative luxury for teachers. It's an essential component for educating children. It has been commented that the problem with education today is that it lacks committed teachers. I ask you this morning: How does not protecting class size funds show a commitment to education? How does placing my job and thousands of teachers jobs in jeopardy and compromising the future of children in Hammond and millions of children across the nation show a commitment to education?

I implore you to protect the class size reduction initiative and to reject proposals that do not guarantee that teachers will be hired to reduce class size.

Teaching is an honorable profession, and I feel a great deal of pride and responsibility in joining the ranks. I deeply appreciate your recognizing its profound significance and fighting for the important resources that teachers need.

I thank you. My kids thank you. And we ask that you continue to increase the federal investment in learning.

Thank you.

At this time, it is now my great pleasure to introduce the first lady of the United States, HillaryRodham Clinton.

(APPLAUSE)

H. CLINTON: Well, Krystal, you ended with a lot of thank yous, but I'd like to thank you for being a teacher and for bringing your commitment to teaching and to the children who are entrusted to you to this room today, and speaking so eloquently on behalf of your profession and the students that you teach.

I'm delighted to be here with Senator Dorgan and Senator Daschle and Senators Murray and Harkin and Kennedy and Kerry to speak up on behalf of the great need we face in our country of lowering classroom size and putting qualified professionally trained teachers into our classrooms on behalf of our children.

You know, in poll after poll, the American people have spoken with one voice. Education is America's top priority. We know from parents and teachers and students that all of us want safe schools. We want modern schools that are wired so our children can be part of the information age. We want smaller classes. We want more after school programs. And we want to, just in general, make sure that our public schools are equipped well to do the job that our children need.

Now, the president and the administration have been listening to the American people, and they presented Congress with a plan to do just what the American people want in prioritizing the needs of education. And yet the Republican leadership and the Republicans in Congress have consistently voted against what America wants in education.

H. CLINTON: They have denied thousands of children the chance to learn in smaller classes and are even putting at risk the nearly 30,000 teachers that have already been put into the classroom, like Krystal.

You know, Krystal I think has already said how important it is that she as a teacher have the opportunity to interact with all of her children. Well, I think we ought to give every teacher that same opportunity, and I know all of us sitting here have been in and out of classrooms all over our country and inner-city neighborhoods and rural areas and suburban areas that are just absolutely cramped.

They are overwhelmed by the numbers of children. We have more children in school today than at any time in our history -- bigger than the so-called baby-boom generation. And as a result, we have classes of 25, 35, 38, 40 children, and we cannot expect children to learn and teachers to teach in that kind of environment.

We've also denied children the chance to participate in safe and enriching programs after school. This year 400,000 children were able to attend after-school activities supported by 21st century community learning-center grants. But twice as many children still have no safe place to go when they get out of school. I believe we need more after-school programs, and that's what the American people are asking for as well.

The president's budget would have tripled support for after-school programs, but again, we don't have that kind of response from the Republican leadership and the Republicans in Congress. In fact, Congress, under their leadership of the Republicans, have denied hundreds of schools the resources that they need. Today, just half the schools that need help are actually getting the extra help that they require for preparing some of our most disadvantaged children.

I hope that through efforts like this, but through the words of teachers like Krystal, particularly, we will see finally the kind of action that the president and the Democrats in Congress have been requesting.

And I particularly hope that after five years of struggling for it, we will begin to make movement on behalf of constructing and modernizing our schools.

You know, the General Accounting Office has estimated that our schools are in desperate need of more than $112 billion in repairs and construction. But the Republican leadership and the Republicans in Congress continues to ignore the president's proposal for the kinds of help that states and districts need: additional tax relief that will enable them to modernize schools which is so desperately required.

So I would call on Congress to stop delaying and pass a school construction measure.

And one of those people who has been on the front lines advocating on behalf of reducing class size and making it possible for teachers to teach and children to learn is the distinguished senator from the state of Washington, Patty Murray.

(APPLAUSE)

MURRAY: Well, thank you very much. I'm very honored to be here with the first lady. I hope you do decide to run for the Senate. We have been able to put education on the national agenda; with you here, it will become the national agenda.

It is really an honor to be here with a teacher who is one of the teachers that is in a classroom today because of the dollars we put in the budget to reduce class size last year. She is able to do the job we want her to do as a teacher, but more importantly, the students in her classroom are going to have the best education possible.

She is why we are here today, along with a number of other teachers in our audience who also have been hired this year and have class sizes that are workable because of the work we did last year.

We're here today to send the message that smaller class sizes help to restore discipline to the classroom and allow our children to learn the basics, and we need to keep that commitment in this budget and beyond so that those kids can get the education they deserve.

I can tell you, as a former parent and a teacher, that reducing class sizes works. But don't just take our word for it. National studies show that reducing class size in the early grades makes more -- allows more kids to graduate, they have higher grade-point averages, and they are more inclined to pursue higher education. It works. We need a national commitment to keep it going.

I was able to visit a classroom just a few weeks ago in Tacoma, where they have used our class-size money to reduce the classes -- the class sizes in first grades.

MURRAY: I was in a first grade classroom with a teacher with 15 students, and she was so elated. She said to me that this is the first year I will be able to guarantee at the end of the year that every single one of my students will be able to read. I've never been able to do that before. That's the difference that this class size money makes. We have a responsibility to continue that commitment.

Now the Republicans are telling us that they're going to block grant that money and allow local flexibility. Let me tell you as a former school board member that without the national commitment for this money to be there to reduce class size, this money won't be able to be there to hire our teachers. They need to know that we're going to be there behind the class size money for the seven years we promised in order to hire those teachers and know that they will be there year after year after year. Otherwise, they won't be able to use this money for reducing class size.

The Republicans are offering school districts a false choice. We are here to tell you we will stand behind the president's veto of this bill if it does not include the class size money, because it is the right thing to do not only for today, but for 12 years from now when those first graders graduate and become economic partners with all of us in this great country.

It is my honor to introduce to you a leader in this battle, the ranking member on the Appropriations Committee, Senator Tom Harkin, whose been at the table day after day after day insisting that class size reduction remain in the bill so that we can do the right thing for all of our children. Senator Tom Harkin.

(APPLAUSE)

HARKIN: Thank you, Senator Murray. First of all, I want to thank Senator Clinton -- I mean -- the first lady for being here...

(LAUGHTER)

... it has a nice ring to it, though, I think -- for her great leadership in this area, and I look forward to working with her in the future on the issue of education and many other things. I want to thank Senator Daschle, our Democratic leader, for making education the number one issue here in the United States Senate. Were it not for Senator Daschle, it truly would have been put on the back burner.

I again also want to thank the person who has worked the longest, who has fought the hardest, and led us through all these battles for so many years, Senator Kennedy. He truly is our leader on the issue of education; to Senator Dorgan and Senator Murray and Senator Kerry also -- all of our -- all of those who have fought so hard to not only increase the funding for education, but to focus on the true needs of our schools.

Since Jonathan Kozol wrote his landmark book, "Savage Inequalities," the gap has not narrowed. In fact, it has been getting worse. The General Accounting Office estimates that 14 million American children attend classes in schools that are unsafe or inadequate. They estimate it will cost $112 billion to upgrade existing public schools just to good condition. Forty-six percent of our schools lack adequate electrical wiring to hook up to the Internet. Enrollment in elementary and secondary schools is at an all-time high and will continue to grow over the next 10 years, making it necessary for the United States to build an additional 6,000 schools.

And the American Society of Civil Engineers reports that public schools are in worse condition than any other sector of our national infrastructure. We send a sorry message to our children when the nicest things they see are shopping malls, sports arenas, and movie theaters, and the most run-down place they see is their public school.

In 1980, the federal share of the education dollar that went to elementary and secondary education in the United States was just about 12 percent -- 1980. In 1999, going into the new millennium -- the new century -- the federal share of elementary and secondary education is now down to about seven percent. We're going in the wrong direction. We can and we must do better. We must rebuild and modernize our nation's crumbling schools. As we reduce class size, get teacher training, qualifications up, we have to rebuild and modernize our schools.

HARKIN: And those schools mainly are in our poorer areas. In the final days of this session, we'll be working to force the Republican leadership to keep their promise first to reduce class size. But we must also redouble our efforts to secure funds for school modernization. The president's budget provides tax credits to finance $25 billion in new construction. These tax credits should make it possible to build up to 6,000 new schools when that money is leveraged.

We need to supplement, however, these tax credits with direct grants for the nation's neediest school districts. Some school districts are even too poor to float a bond issue. So this comprehensive two-prong approach, one on the tax credit side and the bond issue that the president's pushing, the other one to give direct grants to schools that we have pending legislation here to do, is necessary to address this pressing national problem.

So again, I'm proud to be here with my colleagues and with the first lady to focus more attention on this. We cannot let up. We are in the final days of our negotiation on the appropriations bills, and I am afraid that once again, education will not be on the front burner as it ought to be.

And now let me introduce a colleague of mine who has worked very hard on some innovative new approaches on education, who has worked very hard on early intervention programs so necessary to get our kids started on the right path, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts.

(APPLAUSE)

KERRY: Tom, thank you very much. I'm delighted to join my colleagues, and I'm very, very grateful to Tom Daschle for his leadership in helping to put education where it ought to be, the number one issue in America. And like my colleagues, I'm thrilled to be here with the first lady, whom we all look forward to having join us for her remarkable passion and commitment and the eloquence that she will bring to this debate, and most importantly, the vote that she will bring to this debate.

And I'm delighted to be here with my colleagues and my leader in Massachusetts, Senator Kennedy.

Ninety percent of America's children go to school in public schools. And yet we keep seeing the debate in the United States Senate reduced to a discussion over alternatives to the public school system. The Republicans essentially focus on a voucher, on putting $7 into the pocket of some Americans, usually Americans who already have money, and that's been their plan.

The stark truth is that you cannot deal with America's problem of education. There aren't enough alternative schools. There aren't enough places to put people with vouchers. There aren't enough parochial schools, there aren't enough private schools. The only way to deal with the problem of America's education system is to fix the public school system and to support it. And the fact is that it's not just a question of 100,000 teachers. We've heard the statistics of the need for 10 -- over the next 10 years, for two million. Five million of them needed in the next five years.

Unfortunately, because of the lack of support, lack of mentoring, lack of ongoing professional education, lack of adequate class size, we lose 30 to 40 percent of our new teachers within the first three to four years.

So, if we're going to make real all the impassioned speeches on the floor of the Senate about transfer of values to our children, about the next generation of citizens, about a democracy that has the ability to manage all this information that comes at us in the modern age; if we're going to do all these things and have a workforce that can grow our businesses and grow our tax base, we have only one choice, and that is to invest in our children.

It's inexcusable that the Republicans -- I mean you can find an excuse maybe they can hide behind a reason to not pass a test ban treaty. They can hide behind a reason, the First Amendment, not to pass campaign finance reform. But there's nowhere to hide and there's no rational explanation to give the American people for not guaranteeing that the children of this country have the opportunity to learn and that teachers have the opportunity to teach to the standards that we've put into place.

KERRY: And that's what this fight is about. And we Democrats are absolutely committed to making this budget the stand and the ground on which we're going to fight so teachers have the ability to teach, kids have after-school programs, they're not turned out into homes that have no parents in the afternoon until late in the evening, that they have safety, that they have the capacity to have the remedial efforts, and that we change our value system.

That's what this fight is about. And it is a fight worth engaging in.

No one has understood that better, all these years, and no one has achieved a greater record of accomplishment, no one has been a stronger voice in this nation for all of these changes than my senior colleague from Massachusetts, Senator Kennedy.

(APPLAUSE)

KENNEDY: Thank you very much. Thank you very much, John Kerry.

Every one knows across this country that the real leader for children's issues and education issues over the last seven years has been the first lady of the United States. She has championed children's issues, she's championed education issues, and when she comes here to the Senate of the United States, she will be the education senator, and we thank her for joining with us today, Hillary Rodham Clinton.

(APPLAUSE)

We thank Tom Daschle. As Tom Harkin has pointed out, the reason that the education issue is on the front burner for the American agenda is because Senator Daschle has placed it here. We are all very much in his stead for the leadership that he has provided.

Tom Harkin will be leaving this meeting here today and returning to the conference which will be allocating resources. That is why today is important. Those appropriators are going to be making decisions on the issues that have been presented by Krystal, the first lady, and others here today. And Tom Harkin has been fighting and making that fight. We wish him well when he leaves here today.

We thank John Kerry, who's been a valued ally in raising the whole questions of education and provided enormous creativity in finding new ways to meet that challenge.

And it's a pleasure to be with Byron Dorgan, who is our floor manager and done such a job.

And to be especially glad to be here with Krystal, and listening to her words and heeding those words. We want you to know, Krystal, the best way we can thank you is by heeding those words and fighting on these education issues.

Very simple and fundamental question, and that is: Are we going to carry forward what teachers and parents want -- teachers and parents want -- and that is the smaller class size.

And a year ago, the Congress of the United States made a commitment to families all across this nation that we were going to have smaller class size, and that was with the leadership of Senator Murray. It's the Murray amendment: smaller class size. And the Congress went on record and said yes, we are going to do that. And the question is in these final weeks: Are we going to be the Congress that breaks our word to these families? Are we going to become the anti-education Congress? It is as simple and plain as that.

Money can't solve all the problems in education, but it's a reflection of the nation's priorities in education. And it's not only important to have the resource but to commit the resources. And the question now that is before the Congress in these last days is will we continue that commitment that has placed 30,000 teachers in classrooms across the country?

We have seen what the action of Republican leadership has been in the House of Representatives: It's been a thumbs down.

We have seen what Republican leadership has been in the Senate of the United States: It is thumbs down.

We are here today to commit to the families across this nation that we -- that is not a satisfactory answer, and we are going to fight it every step of the way, and we know we have a president that will support that effort and lead that effort. That is what today is all about. Thank you.

(APPLAUSE)

DASCHLE: We all want whatever he had for breakfast.

(LAUGHTER)

DASCHLE: Mrs. Clinton has to depart to attend a conference at the White House. But on behalf of the entire Democratic caucus, Hillary, we are just delighted that you could be here. We appreciate your leadership. We appreciate your commitment. And we want you back fulltime soon.

H. CLINTON: Thank you all. Thanks, Tom.

(APPLAUSE)

DASCHLE: My colleagues and I would be happy to entertain questions for a period, if there are questions to be asked.

QUESTION: Yes, Senator Daschle, on another subject, could you define the difference between racial bias and racism?

DASCHLE: I'm sorry?

QUESTION: Define the difference between minority bias and racism?

DASCHLE: Define the difference between minority bias and racism. Well, racism I think is a -- we all recognize racism in many occasions. It's a hatred. It's a disease. It's a sickness that has to be rid from our society. I think lack of sensitivity to minorities and to race sometimes is far more pervasive and maybe just as problematic in some cases, but clearly ought to be something we attempt to address each and every time the situation occurs.

We have seen a pattern of a lack of insensitivity that creates the perception that those who find themselves in the minority, whether it's race, women -- an array of different options -- find greater difficulty, greater challenge and less opportunity. We want to rid ourselves of that.

We as members of Congress have made progress in the last several decades in doing just that. My colleagues here and others have made a great effort to rid ourselves not only of racism, but of the lack of opportunity that exists today for minorities. I hope we can continue to do that. I believe in many cases in recent weeks the perception has been created by some of our Republican colleagues that that lack of sensitivity is still a serious problem in the United States Senate.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE) in general or the leadership -- who are you blaming for it?

DASCHLE: I'm not blaming anybody. I'm simply saying that a serious problem exists with regard to the perception that when it comes to opportunities for Hispanic Americans; opportunities for African Americans -- that there appears to be a double standard. It takes longer for an African American or Hispanic American nominee for a judgeship to be confirmed. The CRA was the last issue resolved last night in the financial modernization bill. The bilingual education bill languishes in large measure because of a lack of sensitivity of the importance of language to some of our minorities.

I'm not blaming anybody. I'm simply pointing out that we've got a job to do in ridding ourselves of that perception.

Yes.

QUESTION: Senator Daschle, you all have touched on a couple of times during the -- in the course of the presentation, but I'd like you to take another bite at the block grant apple, if you would. The other side would say, I'm sure, that block grants are better because it gives local districts who might know better where money needs to be applied, the chance to do so, and that sending money in the way you all are doing it tends to hamstring them -- to tie their hands. They aren't able to do what they really need to do. Why is that erroneous?

DASCHLE: I'll let some of my colleagues answer that.

MURRAY: Well, let me answer you in two ways. First of all, one year ago in a bipartisan effort, Republicans and Democrats stood up together after the budget negotiation and said: Our accomplishment, whether we're Republicans or Democrats, is reducing class size. Today, one year later, Republicans are saying: We're not going to use that money for reducing class size; we're going to block grant it.

If I'm a school board member or somebody trying to allocate money at the local level, I'm going to ask myself: Well, what are they going to do to me next year? If you look at the history of block grants, you're going to guess, probably rightly, that that block grant will be cut. If you're a school board member trying to hire teachers, you are not going to hire a teacher knowing that that money is going to be taken away in a year. That's one answer and a very important one.

But secondly, we know that reducing class size makes a difference for the education of our young children, whether it's teaching them the basics, reducing discipline in a world where we're concerned about violence, and making sure that our children stay in school and go on to get a higher education. We know that that is a commitment that we need to make at the federal level, state level, and local level. And we at the federal level have to be part of that partnership to make it happen.

MURRAY: That's the commitment we have. We agree with our Republican colleagues that our school districts need more resources. We agree that they need more money. But we're not going to take it away from the commitment we have made on this important effort to reduce class sizes.

QUESTION: Senator Harkin, I wondered, what do you think of the proposal for an across-the-board cut as a way to end these negotiations? They impact on education. It's about $500 million it looks like of a cut.

HARKIN: Well, that's sort of the brainless way of doing things. It's -- I hope that we don't have to resort to that. I find it unacceptable to have those across-the-board cuts. It just would cut some of our basic programs that we have been trying to get funds up for.

The president's budget had the necessary offsets. I have also come up with some offsets of my own that would fully cover these, but the Republicans seem intent on not having those offsets and just having big, deep cuts.

This across-the-board cut could be devastating in a lot of our programs. So, again, I hope we don't have to resort to that. But that may be what they're going to try to force on us.

QUESTION: Senator, as we all know, Mrs. Clinton is looking at running for Senate in New York. Many of Mayor Giuliani's Democratic opponents in New York City say that he hasn't done enough or failed to do much to improve education in New York City. Do you or your colleagues agree with that assessment?

DASCHLE: Yes.

(LAUGHTER)

QUESTION: Could you elaborate on that?

(LAUGHTER)

DASCHLE: No. Thank you all.

NEWS CONFERENCE WITH OTHER DEMOCRATS ON PRESCRIPTION DRUG COSTS FOR SENIORS, 11/9/1999

GEPHARDT: Good morning, everyone. I am surrounded by a number of members of the Democratic caucus of the House, all members of the House of Representatives, and we thank them all for coming out today.

I also want to thank the first lady for joining us. Give her a big hand.

(APPLAUSE)

We're going to hear from her in just a moment.

I know that in her travels around our country she faces some of the same questions all of us face as we talk to our neighbors and friends. I'm asked again and again, why doesn't Congress address the issues that families really care about? Improving education; making our schools and neighborhoods safe; and addressing the rising costs of health care. Unfortunately, we now have a Congress that puts the special interests ahead of the public interest.

We have a Republican leadership whose number one goal is to get through the year without addressing the important issues the American people sent us here to do. They've succeeded once again this year providing a $1 trillion tax cut for corporations and special interests but not one sent to extend the life of Social Security or to modernize Medicare with a prescription drug plan.

Democrats have tried to do the people's business. We tirelessly worked to get our top priority, a Patients' Bill of Rights, on the floor of the House. We wanted to take medical decision-making away from the HMO bureaucrats and return it to the doctors and patients where it belongs.

But our efforts have been bottled up and frankly buried in a conference committee by the Republican leadership that puts the needs of insurance companies ahead of the needs of America's families. A narrow extreme view in Congress too often stands in the way of real progress, preventing us from enacting the strong yet sensible reforms that are necessary to ensure that the quality of health care that Americans receive goes up, not down.

Seniors are feeling the impact of the status quo on their pocketbook and on their health. Medicare has served seniors well over the last three decades. This program really works. But changes in the marketplace are pricing quality health care out of the reach of more and more seniors. A Medicare prescription drug plan and help for seniors in obtaining the best price for their drugs are now an absolute necessity to millions of seniors who are currently put in the position of choosing food or medicine or rent or medicine or heat or medicine.

GEPHARDT: The pharmaceutical industry and their allies in the Republican leadership are committed to making sure that this legislation never sees the light of day, but Democrats are not going to accept their obstructionism.

(APPLAUSE)

We won't stop until we break down the walls of resistance and succeed in bringing a prescription drug plan up for a debate in the next session next year in Congress. We forced HMO reform onto the agenda. And believe me, it wouldn't be there without these members and Democrats like them and some Republicans who said we've got to have this reform. And we forced it on with a discharge petition, and we're going to do the same thing next year for prescription drugs.

(APPLAUSE)

With the leadership of people like the first lady, who brings unparalleled passion and knowledge to health care issues, Democrats are going to win this very fundamental battle for the quality of life for America's seniors, our most important citizens, who've given us the quality of life in the great country that we have.

Now it's my honor to introduce a courageous woman who's dedicated her career to the well being of people: children, seniors, people of every walk of life. She's been a magnificent first lady for our country, and I believe she's going to make a magnificent senator from the state of New York. Hillary Clinton.

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: Thank you. Thank you. Well, I want to thank Leader Gephardt for his leadership on this and so many other important issues that are facing our country.

CLINTON: You know, we are now entering the closing days of the first session of the 106th Congress, and I am confident that when the 107th Congress convenes, we will have a new speaker and his name will be Dick Gephardt.

(APPLAUSE)

And we'll have a new majority leader and his name will be David Bonior.

(APPLAUSE)

Now, this will happen because, under the leadership of the president, the vice president, Democrats in Congress and allies throughout the country, the Democratic Party is the only party fighting for issues that the American people really care about that are close to our hearts; whether it is the economy or health care, Social Security, education, the environment or prescription drugs for our nation's seniors. And it is a privilege to join so many Democratic members of Congress in making this commitment to our seniors as strong as we possibly can.

There are many people here I would like to recognize but let me just mention a few: Henry Waxman, through his leadership of the Government Reform Committee, has produced over 100 reports highlighting just how difficult it has become for seniors to afford essential life-saving drugs. If you need any evidence that this is a critical issue, then just look at the report that Henry Waxman has created based on evidence from throughout our country.

John Dingell, Pete Stark, Sherrod Brown and the Democratic colleagues on their committees have worked hard to develop Medicare prescription drug policies. Tom Allen and Jim Turner and Ronnie Shows and Marion Berry have taken a leadership role in addressing the differential pricing issue. And just last week Karen Thurman sponsored an amendment to help seniors get discounts on medication and on a straight party-line vote it was rejected by the Ways and Means Committee.

CLINTON: Now -- yes, appropriate sound effects.

(LAUGHTER)

All of these members, plus the others who stand here today, have made a commitment to doing everything we possibly can to ensure that our seniors have the medical coverage and the prescription drugs that they need to stay healthy and to have the quality of life that we want our older men and women to have.

And we come together today for a very simple reason: Millions of older Americans cannot afford the prescription drugs they need to live their lives in dignity.

Now there are many groups represented in the audience: The National Council of Senior Citizens; the Older Women's League, known as OWL, very wise; the National Committee to Preserve Social Security and Medicare; the National Community Pharmacists Association; and many others that have joined with the Democrats in Congress to make as clear as we can that this is an issue that is not going away, that it is an issue that will be with us this year and next year.

(APPLAUSE)

And that's because the facts are so compelling. More than two-thirds of all Medicare beneficiaries have no coverage or inadequate Medigap coverage. This is not just a problem for low-income beneficiaries. Over half of Medicare beneficiaries without drug coverage have incomes greater than 150 percent of the poverty level.

And the problem is getting worse. The number of firms offering health insurance for retirees have dropped 25 percent over the past four years. And Medigap premiums -- which increase with age -- have been rising at double-digit rates.

CLINTON: Now the drug industry can buy all the ads they want to provide cover for their inaction, but the one thing their ads cannot deny is that the problem is real and the time for action is now.

(APPLAUSE)

I wish these companies running the ads would respond to the kind of letters that I receive and the president receives and I know every member of Congress standing here receives. We've heard from a couple in Georgia who said their prescription drug costs are now their biggest expense -- more than food or even housing. They said they didn't care if their Medicare premium went up, it wouldn't come close to the bill for their drugs.

A woman from Indiana told us she has been cutting her medication dosage in half because she cannot afford the full cost of her prescriptions. And right here in Washington, I met Judy Kedo (ph), whose mother moved in with her because she could not afford to buy her medications unless she stopped paying her rent.

Now the president in his comprehensive Medicare reform plan has proposed a prescription drug benefit that has no deductible and pays for half of all drug costs up to $5,000. It uses private sector buyers to negotiate discounts for Medicare beneficiaries, including those who have exceeded the cap. It is a sound plan. And the more I travel and speak with Americans about their hopes and concerns, the more I understand that the Republicans in Congress and Republicans throughout the country just don't get it.

You know, the Republican-led Congress, as Dick said, can pass a huge tax scheme that Americans don't want and that would undermine our economy, but for some reason, they put off even having a debate over prescription drug cost and coverage. Providing access to affordable prescription drugs should not be a Democratic or Republican issue. This is an American issue. And...

... I don't know what the Republican leadership is afraid of. The time for waiting has ended and the time for debating has come. And I know that if we follow the lead of the Democrats gathered here today, we will succeed in meeting this challenge, and we cannot afford to fail.

CLINTON: Now, we will not fail in obtaining this kind of support for older Americans because we have the commitment of leaders like Henry Waxman. Now, he has given himself to issues like this for decades. He's won so many legislative victories because he's never given up fighting for the people he was elected to serve. And as long as we follow his lead in representing the people's real interests, and not the special interests, we cannot go wrong and neither can the American people.

It's now my honor and pleasure to introduce a great leader, Congressman Henry Waxman.

(APPLAUSE)

WAXMAN: Thank you very much, Mrs. Clinton.

It's a great honor and an extraordinary help to have the first lady come here and speak about this important issue. We all know her as a champion for health care for seniors and all Americans. She brings great knowledge and passion to this fight. And with her leading the way, I hope we don't have to wait until you get into the Senate to pass this bill. But if necessary, we will have her fighting for us and for this legislation.

For too long, our nation's most vulnerable citizens have faced intolerable price discriminations when it comes to pharmaceuticals. The sad reality is that those in greatest need of life-saving medicines are often those who have the least ability to pay for those drugs. And for them, the drug companies are charging the highest possible prices. It's inexcusable; it's unconscionable.

The nationwide report that we're releasing today shows that seniors from California to Maine are paying over 130 percent more for their prescription drugs than for those who are in HMOs or have support from the federal government, those that the pharmaceutical companies consider their best customers, the ones they give the discounts too. But for the seniors, they raise the prices as much as 130 percent.

And in fact, for some drugs, the markup has been 1,500 percent more than those favored customers of the drug companies.

Many of our uninsured seniors face this cruel dilemma, a dilemma of deciding whether to take their scarce resources and pay for their food, or pay for their drugs, or pay for other necessities of life.

WAXMAN: And that's made even crueler when they know that the identical drugs that they're having to pay so much to buy are being offered at a half-price sale to those who are covered by the federal government or large HMOs or even consumers in Mexico and Canada, and even to veterinarians who often buy these very same drugs to use for animals.

Well, the unconscionable gouging of our seniors is unacceptable and it must end.

(APPLAUSE)

Thanks to the leadership of Dick Gephardt, David Bonior, Tom Allen, Jim Turner, members from the Democratic caucus from all parts of the country, and the first lady, we're going to fight to pass legislation to stop discrimination in pricing against seniors and to cover what is a very important basic health need for all of the Medicare population.

We've got to fight to break the stranglehold the drug companies have on the Republican leadership. This shouldn't be a partisan issue, but yet the Republican leadership, as they did on HMOs, Patients' Bill of Rights, and they're doing now on pharmaceutical coverage, won't let their members vote with us to stop the drug companies from gouging seniors.

We're battling to have prescription drug legislation debated now, and if we have to, we'll continue this fight next year, because we're not going to quit until there's an end to discriminatory pricing and there's coverage for all seniors that need it.

I'm pleased now to turn over this platform to Ed Dillon (ph) of Grubb's Pharmacy, a pharmacist who deals with these issues every single day.

(APPLAUSE)

And he's here to share his experiences with us.

(APPLAUSE)

Mr. Dillon.

(APPLAUSE, CHEERS)

ED DILLON (PH), PHARMACIST: That's a great welcome. I hope I don't disappoint anyone.

(LAUGHTER)

(UNKNOWN): Tell the truth.

DILLON (PH): I do want to thank Democratic Leader Gephardt, the first lady, Ms. Clinton, and Chairman Waxman for this opportunity.

DILLON (ph): I'm delighted and really honored to have the opportunity to talk today, really because I have deep feelings about this and because it's an issue that I do deal with every single day.

I'm not an elected official, I'm not a member of the media, I'm not on the board of directors of a major pharmaceutical company. I'm just a community pharmacist that's done this for 25 years.

Like thousands of other pharmacists across the country, every single day I meet with patients face to face, literally hundreds of patients a week. We answer their questions, we address their concerns, we talk about interactions and possible harmful side effects, we try and pass along general medical information. We really believe we provide a valuable service.

We love to answer questions, and we feel that's an important part of our job. But there's one question that all of us, whether you're working in an independent pharmacy, a chain pharmacy, any community pharmacy: Why do my medications cost so much? Why does my prescription cost so much?

Now no one understands or appreciates the accomplishments of the pharmaceutical industry more than I do. Every day I see lives literally saved and people's health dramatically improved. But nothing is more frustrating than trying to explain how pharmaceuticals are priced in this country.

When you try and talk to a person and tell them the details about the complex system of multiple discounts and rebates and cost-shifting to HMOs, where discounts are given to HMOs and price increases are passed on to the private sector, people -- people have a hard time understanding it.

The truth is, none of it makes sense. And after a minute or two, invariably people look at you with a funny look, they scratch their head and they say: That's just crazy.

But the reality is, it is crazy. It's a fact that virtually every one gets cheaper prices than community pharmacies and the patients they serve. Survey after survey has demonstrated that special pricing arrangements for seniors in this country to pay more than just about every one else in the world.

And pharmacists like myself, both chain and independent, are faced with the task of explaining that on a day-to-day basis, how this crazy system works and why they are sometimes forced between buying food, paying their rent, or purchasing their prescriptions.

DILLON (ph): These aren't luxuries or options we're talking about, but they are necessities required for people to maintain their health.

I can explain the cost of research and development, I can explain all the good that the pharmaceutical industry has accomplished, but I can't explain why their prescriptions cost so much.

I can't explain why a senior citizen like my 85-year-old mother, who struggled all her life to raise six children and lives on an limited income, is forced to pay two or three times as much as an HMO or a billion dollar insurance company, or even worse, twice which she would pay if she lived in Germany or Mexico and Canada. And that's for products that were developed by American industry and produced in this country. It doesn't make any sense to me.

If someone understands the fairness of this, please explain it to me or better yet, explain it to my mom and all the other senior citizens in this country.

I'm not a believer in big government or federal interference in the marketplace, but I do believe that when there is a real injustice, the role of government -- in fact, the responsibility of government -- is to step in and level the playing field and to protect those who are in need. I believe this is one of those times.

Just in closing, I really don't believe that this is a political issue. Like the first lady said, this is an American issue.

You know, sometimes we should just do the right thing because it's the right thing to do. I think this is one of those times.

(APPLAUSE)

Thank you. And now it's my honor to introduce the Democratic whip, Mr. Bonior.

Mr. Bonior?

BONIOR: Thank you, Ed, and thank you for your very informative and passionate remarks.

I happen to actually just live -- or did live, up until just a couple of years ago, very close to Grubbs Pharmacy where Ed practices -- just about two doors away and spent a good deal of time in there for a variety of different reasons. And I want to tell you that I have seen him have to explain to people, on a regular basis, why these costs are so astronomically high.

I've watched and talked to people who come in there, and they look into their wallet, and they pull out a few dollar bills and they'll ask, what can this buy me?

BONIOR: I mean, this is real stuff, and you can see it every day on every corner in every drugstore in the country. And it's important that we do something about it.

The American people are frustrated with this Congress. There's a lot of sound and a lot of fury, but very little is getting done here. And the country is asking themselves, well, why? They see the Republicans push for, as the leader said and the first lady said, a $1 trillion tax cut; a trillion dollars. And then they turn around and they say, the Republicans, that they can't afford to help people cope with the rising cost of prescription drugs, and it doesn't make any sense to them.

A majority of Americans support a prescription drug benefit, and they expect actions from this Congress, not excuses. A majority of Americans want to put medical decisions back into the hands of doctors and patients, and they support a Patients' Bill of Rights. They expect progress from us, not procrastination on this important issue.

A majority of Americans are worried about violence in their children's schools and in the workplace. They expect the Congress to make decisions on these important issues and not delay. And the list goes on and on. Campaign finance reform -- nothing. School construction and modernization -- nothing. Protecting Medicare -- nothing. Strengthening Social Security -- nothing coming out of this Congress.

So it's no wonder the American people are frustrated. It's no wonder that they're cynical. The majority in Congress is deliberately ignoring them on issue after issue that matter to them in a very personal way. It touches their lives every day, all of these issues. And that's why we have had to resort to discharge petitions to force these issues onto the calendar of the House of Representatives.

We've introduced strong, common-sense legislation to address America's prescription drug crisis and to help seniors avoid having to choose between buying groceries or taking the medicine their doctors prescribe. Yet the Republican leaders refuse to schedule a vote.

Well, here to talk about our efforts to help older Americans get prescription drug coverage is Congressman Pete Stark. Pete Stark has been a champion, a champion of comprehensive Medicare reform, and he has been a passionate advocate, a very passionate advocate for older Americans on a variety of issues, not only health care but other issues that affect their lives.

Pete Stark.

(APPLAUSE)

STARK: Today we're going to file a discharge petition on a bill written by Senator Kennedy and myself and Mr. Dingell to provide access to affordable medications in the Medicare Act.

STARK: There will be other discharge petitions, but we're going to have a benefit that's comprehensive; it has a $200 deductible, 20 percent co-insurance for seniors up to $1700 a year and after $3,000 out of pocket, there is a catastrophic benefit to pay for 100 percent of the drug costs after somebody has spent $3,000. The president has proposed a plan that's similar with no annual deductible. It's different, but it's similar.

These are bills that are all variations. We're going to have the Turner-Allen-Waxman bill, which is another way to help seniors get drugs at a discount at no cost to the federal government. And I might remind the people that we -- this was brought up -- Karen Thurman introduced this amendment in the Ways and Means Committee where they're over talking about helping Social Security today, and where we just passed out a bill for $800 billion in tax cuts.

Every Republican on the Ways and Means Committee voted to deny senior citizens a discount on their prescription drugs at no cost to the federal government.

Now, what do you have to give them to make them do what's right? We're going to give them a discharge petition for all of us...

(APPLAUSE)

... and it should be the rallying point to show America and our colleagues that we intend, in the Democratic Party, to keep reminding people that we can do this.

We have the greatest economic boom of all times. We have everything going for us; and, yet, we can't find the money to help seniors get a reasonable price on their prescription drugs? Nonsense.

If the Republican mayor in New York can go to a fund-raiser today to get money from the pharmaceutical industry, if the Republican leader in the Senate can be taking pork home to Mississippi but not give us five cents to help seniors, then we know where the trouble lies. It lies in a political solution and I want to...

I've said enough. I think that Ronnie Shows, who came here from Mississippi, has got to tell us what he's going to do because he's going to march over to the House floor today with another bill and lead the fight from the South. We come from the West. We're coming from New England and New York. We're going to surround them and we're going to do what's right.

Ronnie Shows from Mississippi.

SHOWS: Thank you. I want to thank Pete for that great introduction, and I thank Mrs. Clinton. We appreciate you being here, and my colleagues, Mr. Gephardt, Mr. Bonior and Mr. Waxman and other distinguished members of the press and other special guests.

This is a very important day for me. I've been a representative from the Fourth Congressional District of Mississippi almost a year now, and we've debated large and small items, I guess you might say. But our nation is continuing to grow in the greatest expansion of our economy that we've ever known. But can we really, truly move forward and leaving some people behind? Can we actually turn our backs on the elderly and seniors of our country? The very people -- think about it -- the very people that Tom Brokaw calls the greatest generation, that fought a Depression and fought a war and now you know what they're fighting? Another war. A war on drugs, you might say, or maybe the drug companies.

The people who ought to be benefiting from the most important times of their life are being asked to sacrifice and to give up other things like food, paying their rent, their electric bill. I tell you, I'm from Mississippi, and that's not right, and I don't believe it's right with any of these people here or they would not be here.

(APPLAUSE)

And I can -- and believe me, I can give you some examples from Mississippi. I represent the Fourth District, and we're not the wealthiest district in the state, believe me. And I can tell you stories of a lady named Lucille Bruce (ph) from Clinton. She lives on a fixed income and she pays in excess of $200 each month for prescription medicine. But she does have some salvation because her daughter offsets that expense. So she has some family to take care of her. But you know what Mrs. Bruce (ph) worries about? What about the people who don't have family support? We have millions of them out there that do not have this support, and that's what Mrs. Bruce (ph) worries about. That's what I worry about, and that's what everybody in this room worries about.

H.R. 664, the Prescription Drug Fairness for Seniors Act, was introduced by my friend and colleague, Tom Allen from Maine.

(APPLAUSE, CHEERS)

This legislation will lower the cost of what seniors pay for prescription drugs. Seniors pay much more for prescription drugs than the drug companies or their favorite customers. You know, my favorite customers are seniors.

(LAUGHTER)

Such as the federal government and large HMOs. This legislation will allow the pharmacists, like Mr. Dillon (ph) back here, to purchase drugs for Medicare beneficiaries at the same rate as the government and large HMOs. In other words, make our parents and grandparents favored customers as well.

(APPLAUSE)

Our seniors should not have to be forced to make these decisions they're having to make. I've absolutely got people in my district that I've talked to and pharmacists I've talked to that have to buy their medication, take their medication every other day, and this is something that's not unusual. It happens every day. They should not have to make this choice. Yet today, many seniors are put in that very position. And it's also a shame that we've got over 150 co-sponsors on this bill. I don't think we've got one Republican on it. Over 150 co-sponsors, and we have not got one Republican on it. If there's one, I beg his pardon, but I don't know it.

Today I'm going to offer a resolution to bring H.R. 664 to the floor for a vote. If no action is taken within seven days -- seven days to do the right thing -- I will file a discharge petition to take my resolution from the Rules Committee and bring H.R. 664 directly to the floor for a vote.

Just think about it. Seven days for the leadership to do the right thing and for people to enjoy a decent standard of living at the end of the American century. I choose to stand with our senior citizens. I choose to fight for their values and principles, and I know that we all hold closely. Help us move H.R. 664 forward today for our seniors and for all of us.

Thank you.

(APPLAUSE)

GEPHARDT: We want to again thank the first lady for being here with us. She has a schedule that requires her to leave now, but before she does, we want to tell her as a group again how proud we are of her and how much we thank her for her efforts for senior citizens in this country.

(APPLAUSE)

I'd like to also recognize a representative who is the ranking member of the Health Subcommittee of the Commerce Committee and has worked prodigiously to get this legislation across.

GEPHARDT: And it's also his birthday today. Sherrod Brown of Ohio.

(APPLAUSE)

Questions? Yes.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

GEPHARDT: Well, as you know, this session this year may end in the next few days or few weeks, we're not sure when. But we've decided that the only way we're going to get a vote on these bills is to force them on to the agenda. If we're still here next week, we could have a vote on this if the Republican leadership would decide to do it.

As you know, the leadership here decides the schedule every day, we have no power, other than through the discharge, to get something to be voted on. So we are resorting to the same tool we've had to use on minimum wage and on Patients' Bill of Rights and on a whole range of issues because they simply won't bring it up.

And I'm worried that they won't bring it up for the same reasons they didn't want to bring those other bills up. The special interests, who stand to make money from the system the way it is, don't want these bills brought up. And so they have influenced, I'm afraid, the leadership not to bring these things up.

And the only way we can overcome that special interest is through the discharge petition process, and that's what we're going to do. And I predict, if we can get it on the floor, we'll get not only most Democrats to vote for it, we'll get a lot of Republicans to vote for it, just like they did on Patients' Bill of Rights.

(APPLAUSE)

Yes.

QUESTION: Could you or Congressman Stark elaborate on this criticism of Mayor Giuliani for meeting with the pharmaceutical companies today?

GEPHARDT: Well, it's our understanding that meeting is occurring. Look, pharmaceutical companies have done a good job in this country, they have developed a lot of drugs using the NIH research, the basic research that the public has paid for. They've taken that research and developed it further into specific pharmaceutical items which are very important to our people. And I salute the industry and I think they've done a good job and I think they have very smart scientists and business people who help them develop these products.

What we're seeing here, though, is that simple fairness is required. And we had a press conference a week ago that showed that these companies, while they spend a lot on research and we give them a research and development tax credit to do that, and I'm for that and so are all these members, they have the largest profit margins of any industry group in the country.

Now, I understand their desire to make profit, that's the desire of anybody in business. They have every right to try to do that. But when the victim of their desire to make more profit is the senior citizens of this country and they're being dealt with unfairly, then, as many of the speakers said, it's the duty of the government and the responsibility of the government to come in and level that playing field so that seniors are treated like everybody else. And that's what we're trying to do.

(APPLAUSE)

Anything else? Well, thank you very much. Let's get it done.

(APPLAUSE)

REMARKS AT EVENT IN GREECE, 11/20/1999

Athens, Greece

CLINTON: Well, I am so pleased that I could be here this morning. I do hope some day to be able to come back and actually see my tree growing and make sure that it, along with literally hundreds of thousands of other trees, are helping to reforest this extraordinary, beautiful and important country.

I want to thank Efi (ph) for those much too kind words. She has been a friend and adviser and supporter, and cheerleader for me through good times and not so good times. And I want publicly, in the country she loves so much, in front of so many of her friends and colleagues to thank her publicly for her tireless commitment to Greek- American relations, to both of her countries and that is how she sees it.

It is always possible to love more than one child and Efi (ph) loves more than one country with the same passion and intensity. And we are certainly grateful that America is her adopted land. And we are very admiring of the continuing devotion she shows to Greece.

I'm also pleased to be here with the mayor, whom I have had the great personal pleasure of dealing with on my previous trip when my daughter and I came. We were so fortunate to be able to spend a good deal time and to really see more of the country and meet so many wonderful people.

And although this visit is far too short, I'm looking forward to the opportunity to return with my husband and my daughter and in a more leisurely way -- see more of the country. I'm continuing to learn more about Greece and I know that we would look forward greatly to a return visit.

And, Mr. Mayor, I said it privately and I would say also publicly just on our ride in from the airport and our short time back and forth to the presidential palace last night, the city looks fabulous.

And I know that you're getting ready for the Olympics and the entire world will be able to enjoy the hospitality and the beauty of Athens and of Greece.

I want to thank the deputy minister of foreign affairs and so many other friends who are here with us today. And I particularly want to acknowledge the new leadership of the foundation and to thank all of you who will carry on and continue this important work.

You know, we could not have made the progress that we did make with this project and with the foundation had it not been for the dedication of so many Greeks and so many Greek-Americans.

I'm particularly pleased that the mayor allowed the symphony orchestra of Athens to come to the United States and have such a very successful tour across America. And I don't think it would have been successful without your participation Nadyia (ph) and I thank you for commitment to this project which I know means not only so much to your mother, but so much to your mother personally.

This combines several things that I believe deeply in. First I do believe in honoring one's past and in respecting one's roots. You know we have a saying that a child needs two things -- roots and wings.

And without both, you're not giving a child or a person the kind of support that anyone needs, both to understand from where he or she came from and also where their destination might be.

As we are celebrating the millennium in the United States, the president and I started a Millennium Council. And we adopted as our theme, "Honor the Past, Imagine the Future." And that is indeed what this foundation is doing here in Greece.

You are honoring the past that gave so much to so many, not only to Greek-Americans, but to Western civilization and the entire world.

But you're also imagining a future, a future that is not just symbolized and represented by trees, but by the linkages, the connections, the deep feelings that are created by enlisting the support of all Americans, not just Greek-Americans, in this very important effort.

You're also making clear that in this new century that we're about to enter, our environment is critical. It is after all what we live in. It is what the memories that so many of us have of places we love, are made of.

When I think my trip to Olympus or Delphi I think of landscapes. I think of the beauty of the God-made terrain as well as the built terrain that has stood the test of time.

So there is so much richness in what you do here today and I was very honored that Efi (ph) asked me to participate in a very small way in encouraging this project.

This year this tree, and we hope 1.5 million others, will be planted. That is a very tangible symbol of the friendship between our countries and our people.

It is a friendship that just like a tree, needs to be nurtured, and watered and taken care of but like a tree can grow strong and stand the test of time if proper attention is paid.

I look forward to returning to Greece not only in the future to see my tree, but on many different occasions, and to see also the extraordinary progress that is occurring here in Greece, continue and to see for myself the deepening the ties and friendship between our countries and our peoples.

This Greek-American friendship like this tree, will grow and blossom in the century to come and represent our very strong belief that roots and wings -- the past, the present and the future -- are not just something that passes us by, but what we create and what gifts we give to our children, as we pass on our traditions and our values.

So, I came this morning to thank Efi (ph) and to thank all of you for in a very tangible way making a wonderful gift for the 21st century.

Thank you very much.

(APPLAUSE)

“CBS Evening News,” CNN, 11/23/1999

DAN RATHER, anchor:

Hillary Clinton says she's in--just not quite yet officially. She said so today, after supporters told her she needed to fight back and stop talk that in the end, she wouldn't run for the US Senate seat from New York. Republicans supporting Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, and some Democrats, were thumping her with words such as 'ineffective' and 'blunder-prone,' especially after her trip to the Middle East. The first lady chose a friendly forum of teachers in New York today to try to blunt the critics and questions.

Mrs. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON: The answer is, yes, I intend to run.

RATHER: A carefully crafted answer to a carefully scripted question. Almost officially announcing, but still not quite.

Mrs. CLINTON: I should add that--that I will make a formal announcement after the first of the year.

RATHER: It was the least she could on her first New York visit since her Middle East trip. While Mrs. Clinton was away playing the role of first lady, a whispering campaign by Republicans and worries among New York Democrats centered on whether she was failing as a candidate.

Ms. RONNIE ELDRIDGE (Democrat, New York City Council Member): ...felt that she has the knowledge of Rudy Giuliani that she should have in order to be able to oppose him. He's an aggressive, hard-hitting candidate. And she so far has not been aggressive, hard-hitting or positive.

Mr. CHARLES COOK (Editor, The Cook Report): They've had so many misfa--mishaps the last few weeks that there was so much doubt out there, she had to move, and she had to move very decisively. She didn't have any choice.

RATHER: The worst trouble? Mrs. Clinton sat silent as the wife of Palestinian leader Yasir Arafat unloaded a verbal attack on Israel.

Mrs. CLINTON: I was there on an official trip representing the president and our government. And I thought that was my primary obligation.

RATHER: Only after criticism did Mrs. Clinton respond. It took just hours for one Jewish group to get out this political commercial.

RATHER: Democrats see this as a clear case of a well-orchestrated bit of negative campaigning by Giuliani's forces.

Mr. HANK SHEINKOPF (Democratic Consultant): The timing is too good. The attack is too smart. It's just too impossible to believe that there wasn't some kind of collusion.

RATHER: Mrs. Clinton trails in the polls with unusually few voters saying they're still undecided, which is why her supporters are urging her to move to New York immediately, stop trying to be so much first lady and be more of a fighting candidate.

Lost in much of the coverage today is that Mrs. Clinton hammered Mayor Giuliani hard over the conditions of New York City schools and that, as she sees it, they've gotten so much worse under his leadership. Thus, she signaled today that improving schools is her major campaign theme.

By the way, the most conservative estimates of what the combined cost of this New York Senate race will be are $ 50 million or more.

(JOINED IN PROGRESS)

HILLARY CLINTON, FIRST LADY OF THE UNITED STATES: ... that people talk to me about and the issues that are on people's minds, and they're the ones that I've worked on for nearly 30 years now. And I just became more and more convinced that this is a campaign that needs to be made; that the issues at stake are important ones, and that I have a lot that I want to say about it. And so I'm looking forward with great anticipation to it.

QUESTION: Mrs. Clinton, isn't it going to be very difficult? Haven't the last few weeks shown, particularly your trip to the Middle East, that it's going to be very difficult to juggle these balls? How are you going to divide being first lady with being a candidate?

CLINTON: Well, you know, I had always intended to scale back my duties as first lady, and that is what I'm doing. And I will be more and more focused on the campaign and becoming a candidate, and that's what I intend to do in the next months so that I'll be able to get out and see as many people as possible and meet with them, and I'm looking forward to it.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

CLINTON: Well, I have tried not to take on any new responsibilities after the first of the year. I've tried to set my schedule in such a way so that I would be free to campaign as vigorously as possible, which I intend to do.

Yes?

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

CLINTON: Well, I'm going to be moving into my house as soon as the Secret Service tells me that it's ready and available to moved into. Obviously I will still be in Washington from time to time. I have to be. There are many things that I will still have to attend to, but I'll be living in Westchester and I'll be traveling around the state and campaigning.

Yes?

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE) CLINTON: Well, I know there are people who have said that, and there are people who said if they'd been in the position I found myself in they would have created an international incident of some kind.

But you know, I was there on an official trip representing the president and our government. I went there to further the peace process and to demonstrate our strong commitment to Israel and Israel's security and future. And I thought that was my primary obligation. And I was gratified when Prime Minister Barak said over the weekend that my trip to Israel had been successful and had furthered the peace process.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

CLINTON: Well, I'm going to look forward to the campaign and to continuing to have the kind of support that I've been able to obtain from people like Senators Moynihan and Schumer, and the congressmen and many local officials. And that is going to, you know, motivate me to try to make sure that people know where I stand and what I believe in, and eventually will support me.

(CROSSTALK)

QUESTION: Did what happened in Israel have anything to do with the timing of your announcement today?

CLINTON: You know, I don't believe so. I believe that this is -- it's time for me to answer a direct question that Randy posed to me, and I did so because I believe that this campaign is about the issues that people talk to me about, and that I think are of great concern to the voters that I have met over the last several months. And you know, it is a year out, and I think that there's going to be a lot of time between now and then. But it's time to get moving and get started.

(CROSSTALK)

QUESTION: Up to now, you have been having difficulty pronouncing Rudy Giuliani's name.

QUESTION: Is your concern in not only in New York state and New York city is under -- the -- what he has done to the poor. Are you going to be talking about how good or bad he is?

CLINTON: I think as this campaign moves forward, we're going to be talking about a lot of issues in New York City. Because I'm concerned about a lot of what is happening in the city. I think everyone of us was just heart sick at what happened to the young woman who was hit with a brick, standing at the street corner in the middle of the afternoon. And obviously, we have to be alert to doing everything we possibly can to prevent, you know, violent crime and to prevent people who are mentally ill from committing violent crimes.

That's a real problem and it deserves real solutions, and I will have more to say about that as we go forward.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

CLINTON: Well, we'll certainly have plenty of time for that.

QUESTION: Could you correct any (OFF-MIKE) how difficult is Mayor Giuliani? I'm talking about how much he attacked you after (OFF-MIKE). (OFF-MIKE) any lessons about how difficult this campaign is going to be (OFF-MIKE)?

CLINTON: This is going to be a very hard-fought campaign. I have absolutely no illusions about it, but it doesn't concern me. I think a hard-fought campaign about the issues that concern the people of New York, is what the people of New York deserve to have. So there are going to be a lot of contrast between both of us. And I'm going to be drawing those contrasts out. I'm going to be responding whenever I can.

But ultimately, this election is not going to be about me or Rudy Giuliani. It's going to be about the issues that concern the people of New York, and particularly, the children and families of New York. And what I'm hoping is that we can have a really good debate about those issues and what each of us would do if we were privileged to represent this state in the Senate.

Yes?

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

CLINTON: Well, I'm not going to go back. I'm going forward.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

CLINTON: No, because I will make a formal announcement that lays out, you know, my positions and what I'm going to be talking about in the campaign after the first of the year.

But when Randy (ph) asked me her question, you know, I felt compelled -- you know, I felt like her pupil; there was the teacher asking me the question.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

CLINTON: Well, she, you know, she sort of mentioned to me as we were walking in that, you know, there are people who are asking about whether you're going to do this. And you know, I may want to know and so, sure enough, in front of all of you and everybody else in the room, she asked me.

Just a minute. Yes?

QUESTION: Is there any ambiguity now that you are or are not running? Are you putting that totally to rest?

CLINTON: I will have a formal announcement after the first of the year that will lay out the campaign's position and what I intend to talk about.

Yes?

(CROSSTALK)

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

CLINTON: Yes. Yes, it is.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE) at this point?

CLINTON: Well, I've said what I'm going to say on it.

Yes?

QUESTION: Looking forward, do you think that there is a vast right-wing conspiracy...

CLINTON: You know...

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

CLINTON: Oh, perish the thought. I think there's going to be an interesting amount of activity around this campaign that will bear watching, which I expect all of you to do.

Yes?

QUESTION: Are you worried about your relationship with Jews in the city and the state in light of what's been happening over the past couple of weeks?

CLINTON: You know, I am a strongly committed advocate for a safe, secure, peaceful Israel.

I have been for 20 years, ever since I was fortunate enough to go with my husband to Israel and see for myself what had been done there, what the obstacles and challenges that the people of Israel face. I have worked in every way that I knew how to further the interests of Israel.

And I also have a lot of concern about the issues here at home that many people of every ethnic background also share concerns about.

So I believe that this campaign and, as people get to hear me and meet me and don't see me through a filter of somebody else's perspective, will settle a lot of these issues that have been raised in the last couple of days.

Yes?

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE) advantage over you? Or will that further politicize (OFF-MIKE)?

CLINTON: I don't know. We're going to have to see how that develops.

QUESTION: Mrs. Clinton?

CLINTON: Yes?

QUESTION: How will you distinguish between official expenditures and campaign expenditures. You have some advantages. You've got advance people and security people, and you've got the planes and the cars and all the rest. How will you charge that against your campaign? Or will you not use some of the security to which you are entitled in order to level the playing field and ensure the taxpayer they're not paying for this?

CLINTON: You know, Libby (ph), I follow the rules that were laid down by the Congress that are in effect for anyone in any position that is in the White House. And that's what I intend to do. Whatever the law is, I am going to follow the law.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

CLINTON: I am, aren't I?

(LAUGHTER)

You know, I have -- I have -- I have...

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

CLINTON: Well, I think that I will do whatever is required, and part of what I have to do is listen to the Secret Service and follow their direction. It would be irresponsible for me to do otherwise.

So, that's what I'm going to try to do, and I'm going to try as hard as I can to make it clear that I'm not going one inch beyond what is legally required and that, you know, everything else is paid for by my campaign.

Yes?

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

CLINTON: There's a little bit of that in this campaign, a little virtual reality.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

CLINTON: There will be a lot of time for that. And I will be, you know, developing positions and setting forth the contrasts, which any election is about. I mean, ultimately elections come down to choices. And I will be talking a lot about what I believe I could do were I fortunate enough to be in the Senate for the state of New York and the issues that I would work on and the kinds of concerns that I would take with me to the Senate.

So, we do have a year to go, and there will be a lot of time to develop those contrasts.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

CLINTON: You know, I have always taken a very strong position on behalf of teachers, and that includes ensuring that teachers are given the respect and the compensation that they deserve to have to do one of the most important jobs in society. And in different settings there are different kinds of steps that need to be taken in order to ensure that. And I will intend to speak out about that.

LOU WATERS, CNN ANCHOR: Hillary Rodham Clinton in New York today for a teachers conference, making the announcement. She says it was time for me to answer the direct question. The question to her, less than an hour ago, was, is it yes or is it no? The answer was: Yes, I will announce formally that I intend to run for the Senate seat being vacated by Daniel Patrick Moynihan in New York after the first of the year.

She says she intends to scale back her duties as first lady. She will campaign vigorously, will be living in Westchester, traveling the state and campaigning.

CNN's senior political analyst has been with us throughout the early stages here of this announcement. Bill Schneider is in Washington, and Bill, why was this the time to say yes, I will make a formal announcement?

WILLIAM SCHNEIDER, CNN SENIOR POLITICAL ANALYST: Because she was under a tremendous amount of pressure. Her ratings had been slipping. She's now running seven points behind Rudy Giuliani.

After the flap over the incident in the Middle East with Yasser Arafat's wife, a lot of people were wondering is she ready for prime time. And some Democrats, including Democratic office holders, were standing up and saying she should not run because it doesn't look like she's really going to do it, it doesn't look like she's ready for this race.

So there was a lot of pressure on her to either run or not run, but tell us soon.

WATERS: The question was asked of her, how do you intend to balance the campaign for a Senate seat with the duties of a first lady? She had an answer ready for that one.

SCHNEIDER: Yes, she did. She said I'll be in Washington from time to time, were her words, which means that her duties as a Senate candidate are going to come first.

WATERS: All right, Bill Schneider in Washington, on Hillary Rodham Clinton's announcement that she will announce formally that she intends to run for that Senate seat in New York

PRESS CONFERENCE WITH FIRST LADY HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON FOLLOWING HER SPEECH TO THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF TEACHERS, 11/23/1999

TOPIC: HER PLAN TO RUN FOR THE SENATE
NEW YORK, NEW YORK

Q (In progress due to feed) -- weeks with your campaign motivated you do to what you did today?

MRS. CLINTON: Well, you know, I have been traveling around the state now, and I have just been so encouraged and excited by what people talk to me about and the issues that are on people's minds, and they're the ones that I've worked on for nearly 30 years now. And I just became more and more convinced that this is a campaign that needs to be made, that the issues at stake are important ones, and that I have a lot that I want to say about it. And so I'm looking forward with great anticipation to it.

Q Mrs. Clinton, isn't it going to be very difficult? Haven't the last few weeks, particularly your trip to the Middle East, shown it's going to be very difficult to juggle these roles? How would you divide being first lady with being a candidate?

MRS. CLINTON: Well, you know, I had always intended to scale back my duties as first lady, and that is what I'm doing. And I will be more and more focused on the campaign and becoming a candidate. And that's what I intend to do in the next months, so that I'll be able to get out and see as many people as possible and meet with them. And I'm looking forward to it.

Q But in the past -- (off mike).

MRS. CLINTON: Well, I have tried not to take on any new responsibilities. After the first of the year, I've tried to set my schedule in such a way so that I would be free to campaign as vigorously as possible, which I intend to do.

(Cross talk.) Yes?

MRS. CLINTON: Well, I'm going to be moving into my house as soon as the Secret Service tells me that it's ready and available to be moved into. Obviously, I will still be in Washington from time to time. I have to be. There are many things that I will still have to attend to. But I'll be living in Westchester, and I'll be traveling around the state and campaigning.

Yes?

MRS. CLINTON: Well, I know there are people who have said that, and there are people who said that if they'd been in the position I found myself in, they would have created an international incident of some kind.

But, you know, I was there on an official trip, representing the president and our government. I went there to further the peace process and to demonstrate our strong commitment to Israel and Israel's security and future, and I thought that was my primary obligation, and I was gratified when Prime Minister Barak said over the weekend that my trip to Israel had been successful and had furthered the peace process.

MRS. CLINTON: Well, I'm going to look forward to the campaign and to continuing to have the kind of support that I've been able to obtain from people like Senators Moynihan and Schumer and the congressmen and many local officials. And that is going to, you know, motivate me to try to make sure that people know where I stand and what I believe in and eventually will support me.

Q Did what happened in Israel have anything to do with the timing of your announcement today?

MRS. CLINTON: You know, I don't believe so. I believe that this is -- it's time for me to answer a direct question that Randy posed to me, and I did so because I believe that this campaign is about the issues that people talk to me about and that I think are of great concern to the voters that I have met over the last several months. And, you know, it is a year out and I think that there's going to be a lot of time between now and then, but it's time to get moving and get started.

Rafie (sp)?

MRS. CLINTON: Yeah.

Q Up till now, you have been having difficulty pronouncing Rudy Giuliani's name.

MRS. CLINTON: (Laughs.)

Q Are you going through this issues concerning not only -- (inaudible) -- the mayor in New York City is -- (inaudible), the -- what he have done to you before. Are you going to be talking about how good or bad he is -- (off mike)?

MRS. CLINTON: I think as this campaign moves forward, Rafie (sp), we're going to be talking about a lot of issues in New York City, because I'm concerned about a lot of what is happening in the city.

I think every one of us was just heartsick at what happened to the young woman who was hit with the brick standing on the street corner in the middle of the afternoon. And obviously we have to be alert to doing everything we possibly can to prevent, you know, violent crime and to prevent people who are mentally ill from committing violent crimes.

That's a real problem, and it deserves real solutions, and I will have more to say about that as we go forward.

MRS. CLINTON: Well, we'll certainly have plenty of time for that.

Yes, Marsha.

Q (Off mike) -- did you learn any lesson from how difficult Mayor Giuliani, how tough -- (inaudible) -- how much he attacked you after -- (inaudible.) Did it teach you any lessons about how difficult this campaign is going to be -- (inaudible.)

MRS. CLINTON: This is going to be a very hard-fought campaign. I have absolutely no illusions about it. But it doesn't concern me. I think a hard-fought campaign about the issues that concern the people of New York is what the people of New York deserve to have. So there are going to be a lot of contrasts between both of us, and I'm going to be drawing those contrasts out. I'm going to be responding whenever I can.

But ultimately this election is not going to be about me or Rudy Giuliani. It's going to be about the issues that concern the people of New York, and particularly the children and families of New York. And what I'm hoping is that we can have a really good debate about those issues and what each of us would do if we were privileged to represent this state in the Senate.

Yes.

MRS. CLINTON: Well, I'm not going to go back. I'm going forward.

Yeah, Tish.

Q (Off mike) -- that, you know, what he told you about the -- (inaudible) -- was really long, it's artificial, it's not good for us. (Inaudible) -- January and February is (plenty time enough ?), and so on. Now, you've just dropped (a sack ?) a little bit on that. Do you worry a little that your opponent is having -- (inaudible.)

MRS. CLINTON: No, because I will make a formal announcement that lays out, you know, my positions and what I'm going to be talking about in the campaign after the first of the year.

But when Randy (sp) asked me her question, you know, I felt compelled. You know, I felt like her pupil. There was the teacher asking me the question. (Cross talk.) Well, she -- you know, she sort of mentioned to me, as we were walking in, that: "You know, there are people who are asking about whether you are going to do this. And, you know, I may want to know." And so sure enough, in front of all of you and everybody else in the world -- (laughs) -- she asked me. (Laughs.)

Just a minute. Just a minute.

Yes?

Q Any ambiguity now that you are, or are not, running? Are you putting that totally to rest?

MRS. CLINTON: I will have a formal announcement after the first of the year that will lay out the campaign's positions and what I intend to talk about.

Yes?

Q Is there anything that would make you not run at this point?

Q Is that -- (inaudible) -- up or down?

MRS. CLINTON: Yes. Yes, it is.

Q Is there any -- (inaudible) -- to not run at this point?

MRS. CLINTON: Well -- (pauses, reflects) -- I have said what I am going to say on it.

Yes?

Q Looking forward, do you think that there is a "vast right- wing conspiracy" that might --

MRS. CLINTON: (Laughs.) (Laughter.) You know -- (cross talk, laughter) -- oh, perish the thought. I think there is going to be an interesting amount of activity around this campaign that will bear watching, which I expect all of you to do.

Yes?

Q Are you worried about your relationship with the Jews in the city and the state in light of what's been happening over the past four weeks?

MRS. CLINTON: You know, I am a strongly committed advocate for a safe, secure, peaceful Israel. I have been for 20 years, ever since I was fortunate enough to go with my husband to Israel and see for myself what had been done there, what the obstacles and challenges that the people of Israel face. I have worked in every way that I knew how to further the interests of Israel. And I also have a lot of concern about issues here at home that many people of every ethnic background also share concerns about.

So I believe that this campaign -- and as people get to hear me and meet me, and don't see me through a filter of somebody else's perspective -- will solve a lot of these issues that have been raised in the last couple of days.

Yes?

Q (Inaudible) -- the fact you can have -- will he hold an advantage over you? Or will that further politicize his actions as mayor, as some people have charged he did with the homeless issue?

MRS. CLINTON: I don't know. We are going to have to see how that develops.

Q Mrs. Clinton?

Q How will you distinguish between official expenditures and campaign expenditures? You have some advantages. You have the advance people and security people and the planes, the cars and all the rest.

How will you charge that against your campaign? Or will you not use some of the security to which you are entitled, in order to level the playing field and assure people the taxpayers are not paying for this?

MRS. CLINTON: You know, Andrea, I follow the rules that were laid down by the Congress that are in effect for anyone in any position that is in the White House, and that's what I intend to do. Whatever the law is, I am going to follow the law.

MRS. CLINTON: I am, aren't I. (Laughs.) You know, I have -- I have --

Q (Off mike.)

MRS. CLINTON: Well, I think that I will do whatever is required, and part of what I have to do is listen to the Secret Service and follow their direction. It would be irresponsible for me to do otherwise. So that's what I'm going to try to do, and I'm going to try as hard as I can to make it clear that I'm not going one inch beyond what is legally required, and that, you know, everything else is paid for by my campaign.

Q Mrs. Clinton?

MRS. CLINTON: Yes?

Q (Off mike.)

MRS. CLINTON: There's a little bit of that in this campaign, a little virtual reality.

Q (Off mike) -- contrasts and differences that you are likely to be -- (off mike).

MRS. CLINTON: There will be a lot of time for that. And I will be, you know, developing positions and setting forth the contrasts, which any election is about. I mean, ultimately, elections come down to choices. And I will be talking a lot about what I believe I could do were I fortunate enough to be in the Senate for the state of New York and the issues that I would work on and the kinds of concerns that I would take with me to the Senate. So we do have a year to go, and there will be a lot of time to develop those contrasts.

Q (Off mike) -- with the teachers banner behind you. When you were in Arkansas, you supported competency testing for teachers. Do you support that here? And will you tell that to Randy -- (off mike)?

MRS. CLINTON: You know, I have always taken a very strong position on behalf of teachers, and that includes insuring that teachers are given the respect and the compensation that they deserve to have, to do one of the most important jobs in society. And in different settings there are different kinds of steps that need to be taken in order to ensure that. And I will intend to speak out about that.

Q You still support competency testing for teachers, though, as you did in Arkansas?

MRS. CLINTON: Well, that was a very different situation. And I will be talking more about my education policies in the future.

Q Mrs. Clinton, just to clarify, what did you say yesterday -- (off mike)?

MRS. CLINTON: What -- I'm sorry?

Q What did you say yesterday? What is the question you believe you answered?

MRS. CLINTON: I think she asked me if --

Q (Off mike) --

MRS. CLINTON: -- yes or no. (Laughter.) I think that's what it came down to, and I said yes. (Laughter.) So we're engaged. (Laughter.)

(Laughs.)

Q Mrs. Clinton, most people believe this is going to be one of the most exciting races in the history of the state, politically. And most people also believe it is in fact because of your personality and the personality of your presumed opponent. Do you really believe personalities are not going to be involved here?

MRS. CLINTON: Well, personalities are going to be involved because, you know, we have people with personalities running. But at the end of the day -- and what you will hear me say over and over again is that I do not believe, ultimately, this election will be about either me or my opponent. Instead, it should be about the people of this state and what they want in a senator, and what those issues are that they think really matter to themselves and their children. And I believe that the issues that really matter are the issues that I've worked on and have a lot of ideas about for a very long time.

So at some point, personality is fine. But ultimately you have to ask yourself, "How is this person going to vote?"

You know, I was very relieved when we finally got a budget after the president had to veto the Republican budget, which I thought was so irresponsible and which was supported by the Republicans in Congress and the mayor and a lot of other Republicans, which would have been the beginning of a U-turn back to where we came from in the 1980s, of fiscal irresponsibility, of the failure to invest in our children and our future, in taking care of the needs that people have, in meeting challenges, like Social Security and Medicare. So I was very relieved.

And that, to me, has little to do with personality. It has to do with conviction, with what you believe in, with how you see this country and this state, and the vision you have for the kind of future we can build together. So I think all of it goes into a mix.

But at the end of the day, I will be asking the voters to vote for themselves, not for either one of us. And I think if people vote for themselves, then it will turn out fine.

Q What do you think about the fact that most New Yorkers, 53 percent, don't want you to run for the Senate? What do you think about that, and how do you plan to win them over?

MRS. CLINTON: I don't pay attention to those polls.

(Cross talk.)

Q Mrs. Clinton --

MRS. CLINTON: There's somebody way back there who hasn't been called on.

Q The reaction of President Clinton and your daughter to your announcement today?

MRS. CLINTON: Well, they're in Kosovo, and they don't know about this. (Laughter.)

But they're getting home tonight, and I don't think my husband or my daughter will be surprised.

Q Mrs. Clinton --

Q What do you make of the fact --

Q -- question. When you will announce a campaign manager? And B, will your husband campaign for you, and do you want him to campaign for you in New York?

MRS. CLINTON: Well, the answer to the first question is in the next couple of weeks we will announce a campaign manager, but again, I think that that's something that most people aren't very concerned about. They don't vote for a candidate based on who the campaign manager is. And would I want my husband to campaign for me? Absolutely. I think he has been a great president for New York and for the country and the progress that we've made in the last seven years is progress that I think has been good for the people of New York, and he would say -- and I agree with this, and I'll be talking about it in the campaign -- we have unfinished business. So I want to build on the progress.

I want not only to do what I think will make a difference positively for people in this state, but I want to be able to prevent the u-turn that the Republicans are always trying to make, you know -- to give up on the investments, to try to undercut education or health care or the environment; turn their backs on solving the Social Security and Medicare challenges. So I think that he has a lot to say about that. He has a proven track record that's been good for this state, so I would look forward to that, you know, later in the campaign at some point.

Q Do you want Al Gore to campaign for you?

MRS. CLINTON: Absolutely. Absolutely.

Q How do you reconcile your position on campaign finance reform with the ads running in western and northern New York right now?

MRS. CLINTON: Well, you know, I believe in campaign finance reform and I intend to fight very hard for it. You know, the Republicans started running soft money ads against me last summer.

And they ran, actually, two sets of ads -- one from the Republican National Committee and one from a so-called independent committee and then they started another ad against me using soft money, just yesterday. So, you know, we've seen a lot of soft money ads that they started and that they are continuing.

The Democratic Party here in the state of New York cares a lot about these issues, and when the Giuliani campaign started running ads in upstate New York, the Democratic party believed that it was important for them to speak out on behalf of issues that I support, on behalf of issues that all Democrats support. And I think that, you know, that's something that is within the law as it currently is written, and I believe we ought to change the law, but certainly they were doing it first and with great vigor and none of us want to see the issues get a one-sided perspective.

So that was the decision they made.

MRS. CLINTON: Well, look, there's a lot of things you don't believe in that you wish weren't the case. Like, I don't believe that we should have the kind of television advertising driving campaigns in the first place. I don't think it's good for our democracy. Does that mean I'm not going to advertise on television? Well, that would not be a wise decision to make. I believe we ought to have, you know, more public financing of campaigns. We don't have it yet. Does that mean I shouldn't raise money?

You know, these are -- these are difficult issue, but from my perspective, we're going to need to be as competitive as possible, because the other side has always -- and will continue into the future -- raised a lot of more money than the Democrats will. And in order to be competitive, the Democratic Party in New York chose to run ads in order to get Democratic issues out. And I know it's legal and appropriate, and that was their decision.

Q Mrs. Clinton, what do you make of this -- what do you make of the fact that no woman has ever won statewide office in New York on her own?

MRS. CLINTON: That is a very interesting question. I didn't know that until I started going around the state and meeting with people. And actually someone told me that New York has the second- worst record in the entire country in electing women to statewide office. Now I was amazed by that, with all of the extraordinary women in New York and the great contributions that they've made.

But I think that, you know, that's history. And I'm going to do everything I can to convince a majority of New Yorkers that they should join California and Illinois and Texas and Florida and Maine and Washington and a lot of other states in sending a woman to the Senate.

Q Do you have any thoughts about why that might be?

Q Mrs. Clinton, could you clarify, since it is an issue that is so important to voters in New York, what is your position on the future of a Palestinian state?

MRS. CLINTON: That is an issue that is a final-status issue that is to be determined in negotiations between the parties.

Q How long, though, do you think that you can, so to speak, dodge that question by using that answer?

MRS. CLINTON: Well, because it is the appropriate answer right now. You know, Prime Minister Barak was here over the weekend, and he is engaged in extremely difficult and delicate negotiations. I have sat and talked with him, and I have watched how hard he is working. And the issues that the parties are, you know, working on are ones that need to be negotiated between them. And, you know, I believe that that's what we should support. The United States has to be supportive of the peace process and has to provide the support that Israel needs to make the decisions that are in Israel's long-term interests insofar as security and peace go.

And I think all of us should be supportive of that process.

Now, I know that there were some here in New York who wished that I had, you know, created some sort of international incident when I was abroad. But that would not be useful for the peace process or for the prime minister's position. And I greatly appreciated the prime minister saying that my visit to Israel had been a success and that what I had done there had furthered the peace process, because at the end of the day, I believe, along with Prime Minister Barak, along with Prime Minister Rabin, along with the leaders and the people of Israel, that a peace that can be enforced is the strategic option that is in the best interests for Israel's security. And that's what we ought to be looking to support.

Q Mrs. Clinton, you were asked a similar question about the status of Jerusalem recently. And you also declined to answer it because you -- on the same grounds -- that it would damage the peace process. But in July, you didn't shy away from writing a letter to the Orthodox Union on your preferences and such.

MRS. CLINTON: Right.

Q If it wasn't -- if it's not appropriate now to have a position on that, why was it appropriate then?

MRS. CLINTON: Well, I have the same position. You know, my position is that Jerusalem, an undivided Jerusalem, is and should be the capital of Israel, but that is also to be negotiated between the parties. So I have personal opinions that -- I hold and that I believe are in the interests of Israel and Israel's security and the peace process.

But you know, when the parties met recently in Oslo, one of the agreements that came out of that meeting was for people not to engage in rhetoric or make inflammatory statements, or look for ways to unsettle the negotiations that are going on. And I believe that, when I was asked that question in -- wherever we were -- Petra, I think, as an official representative of the United States government at that point, that I said what needed to be said; that this is something that, ultimately, will be decided by the parties. I have my personal opinion, and I have stated that.

MRS. CLINTON: (Laughs.)

Q Mrs. Clinton, when you were in the West Bank with Mrs. Arafat -- can you clarify this for us? When she was making her inflammatory statement, was the translation such that you understood what she meant, and you were the first lady so you kept your cool and were diplomatic -- (audio break).

MRS. CLINTON: (Resumes in progress following audio break) -- and I issued a statement, later, saying that they were inflammatory and baseless. And then I later saw even more inflammatory interpretations. And I just would repeat that they were false, baseless and inflammatory, and it should not have happened.

Q Why did you kiss her afterwards?

MRS. CLINTON: You know, there is -- there are customs. Again, I'm not going to get into the business of, especially in my official capacity, being someone who tries to score political points at the expense of the job I was there to do and the position I was in. And so I did what I believed was the appropriate thing to do and then left. And then when the reports started coming out about a much -- much harsher and more offensive, outrageous translation being made available, you know, I was very concerned about that and issued the statement, and then, you know, talked with the press that was traveling with me.

Q Mrs. Clinton, were you at all surprised at the level of criticism that rose up about your handling of the Arafat moment, the criticism that arose here? Were you surprised by that?

MRS. CLINTON: Well, I think there were people who believed that I should have caused an international incident over whatever it is she said. I just respectfully disagree with that. And I knew that there were people who thought that I could have scored political points for myself in New York by, you know, doing something that would cause such an incident. I did not think that was the right thing to do. And so I chose to fulfill my obligations and to behave in what I saw as an appropriate manner for the role that I was in there at that time. And, you know, I know that there are people who disagree with that. And I would just say to them that, you know, I had to make a call based on why I was there and how I was proceeding, and I did. That doesn't take anything away from my commitment to standing very strongly on behalf of what are the best interests of Israel for long- term peace and security.

Q Is Rudy Giuliani one of those people?

Q In 1980 --

MRS. CLINTON: Yes?

Q In 1980 your husband got -- in 1996 your husband got 80 percent of the Jewish vote. A poll last week showed you with 46 percent. That's 13 points less than Bob Abrams lost with in 1992. Why are you having a problem with the Jewish electorate?

MRS. CLINTON: Well, I'm going to be working very hard in the months ahead to meet with as many people as I can and let them, you know, see me personally and not have me represented to them by somebody else. And then people will be able to make an informed decision. And I'm looking forward to that.

Thank you very much.

"Special Report with Brit Hume," FOX, 11/23/1999

SNOW: Hillary Rodham Clinton has announced that she intends to run for the New York Senate seat and will make an official announcement some time in January. Our FOX NEWS correspondent Molly Falconer talked to Mrs. Clinton one on one about her announcement.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

FALCONER: Mrs. Clinton, thank you for being here. Since you said today you intend to run, are you leaving some sort of loophole there?

CLINTON: No.

(LAUGHTER)

CLINTON: No. I am going to run, and I'm looking forward to it. I'm very excited about what I think the issues that are on the minds of New Yorkers are and what I can contribute to a campaign about those issues. And I'll have a formal announcement after the first of the year, but I'm running.

FALCONER: Some say you and Rudy Giuliani are very colorful characters, and they also say this could be an expensive, nasty race, the nastiest ever. What do you think about that?

CLINTON: Well, I hope not. I'm really hoping that this campaign's going to be about issues because that's what really counts. You know, I care deeply about whether or not we have better schools for every child and whether we have affordable, quality health care for every family in New York, and whether this economy keeps going and spreads its prosperity to everybody in every corner of the state.

And those are the kinds of issues that people talk to me about, and those are the issues that I'm going to be talking about. I hope it's going to be an issue-oriented campaign because come next November, when people go to vote, I hope they're going to be voting for themselves and their futures on these issues.

FALCONER: Now, you said you're going to ratchet back your activities as first lady at the beginning of the year, but you are first lady.

CLINTON: Right.

FALCONER: So how are you going to do that?

CLINTON: Well, I've tried to schedule myself so that I don't take on any new big responsibilities in the year 2000 because this campaign and New York and the issues that are important are going to be my focus. But there will be some things I will have to continue to do, obviously. But I'm scaling back my duties, and I'm really moving full-fledged into a campaign come the year 2000.

FALCONER: So when a voter goes to the polls and looks down at the ballot, there's going to be your name under "Democrat"?

CLINTON: Yes. I hope that's right. I hope that's right because I think that -- you know, I'm doing this for a lot of reasons. I'm doing it because I want to see the progress that we've had in our country continue. And I think the last, you know, seven years have been good for New York, and yet we have a lot that we can do to make it even better.

And I want to bring people together to work hand in hand about how we solve our problems. We've got some big challenges facing us in this next century. And in addition to the work that I think we can do positively, we don't want to make a U-turn and go back to where we came from with, you know, big deficits and no investments in our kids and not trying to solve our big problems, like Social Security and Medicare. Those issues are on the minds of the people I talk to around the state, and that's what I'm going to be talking about.

FALCONER: Just quickly -- people use to say "carpetbagger." Now they don't seem to be saying that as much. Why?

CLINTON: Well, you know, I'm now a resident of New York. I have a house that I'm very anxious to move into, once all the security is taken care of. And I intend to be as fully involved in New York as I possibly can, and I'm looking forward to it.

FALCONER: OK. Thank you very much for joining us.

CLINTON: Thank you.

STATEMENTS BY PRESIDENT CLINTON AND FIRST LADY HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON AT THE OPENING OF AMERICA'S MILLENNIUM CELEBRATION, 12/31/1999

LOCATION: CONSTITUTION AVENUE, WASHINGTON, D.C.

TIME: 11:50 A.M. EST

PRESIDENT CLINTON: Thank you. Thank you very much. Thank you. Thank you. Thank you. Good morning. Happy New Year!

Thank you, Senator Daschle, to other members of the Congress who are here.

Thank you, Mayor Williams, for your kind comments to Hillary and to me, and your outstanding leadership in this city.

Thank you, Robert Pinsky, for being here today, and for opening the ears and eyes and hearts of so many young children to the wonders of poetry.

Thank you, Dean Baxter.

I want to thank the children's choir and the military band -- they were wonderful today -- (applause) -- and the Singing Sergeants, who have left.

I want to thank Ellen Lovell (sp) and the members of our Millennial Council, and Terry McAuliffe and all those who made it possible for us to have all these wonderful events today. (Applause.)

I also want to thank the Lord for this wonderful weather -- (laughter, applause) -- so we all feel good being out here.

The New Millennium Choir sang "Rising Like the Sun." Their vitality and their voices are living proof that the light may be fading on the 20th century, but the sun is still rising on America.

Even though this is an opening ceremony, what we celebrate did not begin today, and it won't end tomorrow.

Two years ago Hillary and I created the White House Millennium Council to bring Americans together, in her words, "to honor our past and imagine our future." Since then, she has hosted Millennium Evenings at the White House with some of our nation's most gifted scholars and artists, and people all over the world have participated on the Internet. She has crisscrossed America to save our historical treasures, from Harriet Tubman's home to Thomas Edison's factory, to Native American pueblos.

This morning we kick off not only a weekend of celebrations, but a whole series of events throughout the coming year that will further mark our new millennium.

This is more than a unique moment for our calendar; it is also a unique moment for our country.

Our economy is strong, our social fabric is on the mend. We are moving forward on America's remarkable journey of creating a more unified nation, a more just society, a more perfect union.

There is no better moment to reflect on our hopes and dreams and the gifts we want to leave our children; no better opportunity to open a new chapter of progress and possibility for all people; no better time to join hands and build the one America of our dreams; no better time to be a truly good neighbor to the people of the world who share this smaller and smaller planet of ours.

So as we honor the past, let us truly imagine the future. I hope every single one of you sometime today, and everyone within the sound of my voice, will take just a little time to dream about what you want for your grandchildren and their grandchildren and what you would like the story of the 21st century to be.

Now, it is my privilege to present the person who has done more than anyone else in America to help us appreciate and properly celebrate the dawn of the new millennium. Ladies and gentlemen, the first lady of the United States. (Applause, cheers.)

MRS. CLINTON: Good morning! (Continued applause.) Thank you all for being here this morning on this glorious day, to be part of the millennial celebrations. I, too, wish to thank our poet laureate, Robert Pinsky, and Reverend Baxter for their beautiful, wise and inspiring words. And it has been a delight to hear the voices and music of so many generations -- a World War II veteran, our current servicemen, and the New Millennium Choir. I look forward to hearing from Washington, D.C. native Denyce Graves, who always sounds magnificent.

I thank Senator Daschle for joining us here today and for his extraordinary remarks, and I also thank the other congressional co- chairs of America's Millennium, Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott, Speaker Dennis Hastert, and Minority Leader Dick Gephardt.

My thanks also go to the Kobler (sp) Family Foundation and the Smithsonian Institution, and Rashid Chadrey (sp) and Camrun Khan (sp) for hosting this opening ceremony. (Applause.)

I also thank Terry McAuliffe and the America's Millennium Leadership Committee, particularly InfoUSA.com., Slimfast Foods Company, and Cisco, who have done so much to make these days possible. (Applause.)

I particularly thank Mayor Williams and the city of Washington for the extraordinary effort they've put into making this celebration one that is accessible and free to all of the residents of the greater D.C. area. And I thank the members of the President's Cabinet who are joining us.

There are many distinguished guests in this vast audience, including some of our team leaders for our explorations in space, which is one of the ways we imagine the future. I know that Donna Shirley is here, who led the team that landed the Rover on Mars, and at least two astronauts, Roger Crouch and Wendy Lawrence. They will all be speaking later today at the National Air and Space Museum, to which you are invited. And I thank the various AmeriCorps volunteer teams who are helping us this weekend. (Applause.)

So to everyone who, under the leadership of Ellen Lovell (sp) and the White House Millennium Council, have made these days and this event possible, we appreciate all of your efforts.

Now just think for a minute of the items, the events, and the ideas of this century that you would put into a time capsule that you think would really represent the United States and the American century -- a transistor, Louie Armstrong's trumpet, a piece of the Berlin Wall. Take any of these items, and it alone could tell a story of the 20th century.

It was, after all, the transistor that launched the information age and enabled man to walk on the moon. It was Satchmo's trumpet that heralded the rise of jazz and of American music all over the world. And it was a broken block of concrete, covered in graffiti, from the Berlin Wall that announced the triumph of democracy over dictatorship. These are just some of the items that will be placed, along with scores of other objects representing the ideas and innovations that shaped the American century into our National Millennium Time Capsule.

Almost three years ago, when the White House Millennium Council began planning a celebration for the National Mall built around our theme, "To Honor the Past and Imagine the Future," we decided that an important way to capture this moment in time would be by filling a national time capsule -- filled not only with the symbols and achievements of the century just past, but with our hopes and dreams for the next.

We invited the thinkers and builders and creators of this century -- all the past recipients of our nation's highest honors in the arts and humanities, in science and technology, in citizenship and leadership -- as well as the thinkers and builders and creators of the future -- the students who are taught by the state Teachers of the Year across America. We asked them all to help us fill this time capsule, and their responses have been overwhelming.

Teachers and students nominated computers, while scientists nominated the transistors that made them possible. Bruce Penniman's (sp) English class in Amherst, Massachusetts, sent a highlighted copy of Ralph Ellison's "The Invisible Man," while novelist Philip Roth recommended works by William Faulkner and Saul Bellow. June Moore's (sp) second grade class in Laramie, Wyoming, selected the sport of baseball, while playwright August Wilson suggested a recording by Bessie Smith.

When it came to hopes for the future, the young people and adults spoke as one: world peace, cures for cancer and AIDS, an end to hunger and racism. I was also impressed by how children were determined to shape the future for themselves. "Helping others is at the very top of my list of careers," wrote a student from Nevada, while another seven-year-old from Idaho wrote, "I wish that all children can have a loving family. I wish someday I will help the world."

In a few minutes, we will invite some of these students and leading citizens to share their nominations for the time capsule.

Now, the prototype is sitting right there. It was created by Pentagram Design, Inc., and the time capsule will be made of three metals -- steel for the industrial age, copper for the information age, and titanium for the age to come.

As you can see, it is molded in the shape of a waving American flag, symbolizing our optimistic country that is always in motion, always moving forward, always pushing back the frontiers of technology and progress, of tolerance and justice.

This prototype will go on display in the National Museum of American History. And at the end of the year, after all of the items have been received and selected, the actual time capsule will be exhibited and sealed at the National Archives, where it will remain until it is opened 100 years from today.

Throughout the weekend, the president and I invite you to visit the capital and to enjoy the various programs at the Smithsonian, from symposia on great Americans of the past and present -- Thomas Jefferson, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, and B.B. King -- to sessions pondering the future of American taste and the future of American democracy. And we invite you to take your children to the story circle at the National Museum of American History. And of course, you are all invited to come to the Lincoln Memorial tonight to join us in a national celebration of America's Millennium.

But by no means will the celebration end at the stroke of midnight tonight. Throughout this millennial year, the White House Millennium Council will lead even more efforts to honor the past and imagine the future. We will continue to recruit more citizens to work together to save America's treasures, whether it's the home of a great American, such as Harriet Tubman, or letters from a soldier in wartime, or a family scrapbook that may just be sitting in the attic somewhere. We will continue to open new millennium trails in our most scenic parks and historic sites. And through the Millennium Green Program, we hope to inspire every single American to plant a tree for future generations to enjoy. And through the National Endowment for the Humanities project My History Is America's History, we hope to help every child in America value their own family histories and honor our nation's immigrant past and present.

This time capsule is one of our gifts to the future, a gift that will convey to our great-grandchildren and their children what it was like and what we were thinking at the end of the 20th century.

In many ways, what our descendants find inside this capsule can be viewed not merely as a relic of the past, but as this generation's promise to the future. There will be a photo of Rosa Parks in the days after that fateful bus ride, to serve to remind us not only of her courage, but of our solemn pledge to move forward in the long march toward justice and to live even closer to our ideals of freedom and equality.

The model of the DNA double helix will be placed in the capsule, not just as a symbol of one of the greatest scientific breakthroughs of all history, but of our commitment to completing the human genome project, cracking the code of life and putting it to work for the good of humanity.

And the film of Neil Armstrong's walk on the Moon must also be our pledge to keep America the world's leading space-faring nation.

So all of us have a chance to work to give these gifts and so many others to the future -- the gifts of our natural monuments and historic places preserved, the gift of safe schools and a world-class education for our children, the gift of quality, affordable health care for all Americans, the gift of peace and justice on Earth. If we make this historic millennial weekend and the millennial year to come a time for thanksgiving, each one of us will be able to do as the president suggested -- not merely to think of what we might want or what we would wish for, but what we can do to create the future we all hope and dream for.

I hope that all of us, as we contemplate this passing of the calendar, will think of our own ways of giving gifts to the future and imagine the kind of world we could help to create.

Now I would like to invite our special guests to step forward and to announce their contributions to our National Millennium Time Capsule.

Thank you all very much. (Applause.)

PRESIDENT AND MRS. CLINTON ADDRESS THE NATION NEW YEAR'S DAY

SAM DONALDSON, host:

I think it's time to go to the White House after that attempt at humor. President Clinton and his normal Saturday morning radio address. A television camera has been allowed to be in this morning. And he is joined by his wife, Hillary Rodham Clinton, as the two of them talk to the nation on this first day of the new year on this first day of the new millennium.

President BILL CLINTON: Good morning, and happy new year, or we should say happy new millennium. Last night, Hillary and I joined thousands of Americans in the National Mall to bid farewell to the remarkable century just passed and to welcome the new millennium. The feelings of goodwill and hope that overcame us all will be among our most treasured memories, and we're deeply grateful that the celebrations were both jubilant and peaceful, here and all around the world.

Ms. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON: But our celebration didn't just begin at the stroke of midnight, nor will it end today. Two years ago, the president and I launched the White House Millennium Project to inspire all Americans to reflect on where we have been as a nation, who we are, and what we want to be, a project to honor the past and imagine the future. I've traveled all across our country, encouraging citizens and communities to think of the gifts that America can give to the future, whether it's saving our historic treasures, such as the Declaration of Independence, or Thomas Edison's invention factory, or the Pueblos of the American Southwest, opening trails and planting millions of trees for future generations to enjoy, or teaching our school children to value their own families and America's immigrant past. The president and I invite you to join these and so many other efforts to extend our celebration far into the new year and the new century.

Pres. CLINTON: What is perhaps most remarkable about last night's celebration is the way it was shared all around the world. Millions of Americans and billions of others across the globe watched on television as midnight broke first in Asia, then in Europe, then Africa, South America, finally here in North America. That people all over the planet could experience the same events at the same time would have been impossible for anyone to imagine a thousand years ago--even 100. Yet the growing interconnectedness of the world today, thanks to a global economy and technologies like the Internet, is more than just a mark of how far we've come. It's the key to understanding where we're going and what we must do in the new millennium. It's clear that our fate in America increasingly will be tied to the fate of other nations and other people around the world. We must have prosperous partners to trade with, secure democracies to share the burdens of peacekeeping, and mutual effort to combat challenges that know no borders, from terrorism to environmental destruction. To advance our interests and protect our values in this new, interconnected world, America clearly must remain engaged. We must help to shape events and not be shaped by them.

Mrs. CLINTON: Yet it is not just by our exertions abroad, but by the example we set here at home that we can influence the world for the better. For in the new millennium, the world will be looking to America for leadership in meeting our great common challenges. If we in America can extend prosperity to people and places in this country that have not yet felt it, then perhaps the global economy can bring a better life to the 1.4 billion people who live on less than one dollar a day. If we in America can provide all of our children with a world-class education, then perhaps it will be possible in the not too distant future for every child in the world to have a good education. And if we can build one America and make our diversity our greatest strength, then perhaps other nations will see the advantage of working to overcome their own ethnic and religious tensions.

President CLINTON: We begin the 21st century well poised to be that guiding light. Seldom in our history, and never in my lifetime, has our nation enjoyed such a combination of widespread economic success, social solidarity, and national self-confidence without an internal crisis or an overarching external threat. Never has the openness and dynamism of our society been more emulated by other countries. Never have our values of freedom, democracy, and opportunity been more ascendant in the world. Nearly 55 years ago, President Franklin Roosevelt said that 'We cannot live alone at peace. Our own well-being is dependent on the well-being of other nations far away. And therefore, that we must be citizens of the world, members of the human community.' I believe his words will prove even truer in the 21st century. With America fulfilling our ideals and responsibilities, we can make this new century a time of unprecedented peace, freedom, and prosperity for our people and for all the citizens of the world. Thank you, happy new year, and God bless America.

DONALDSON: The President and Mrs. Clinton speaking from the Oval Office where the president normally delivers his Saturday morning radio address. Today, on television; today, joined by the first lady with a message for this new year and this new millennium.

And we'll be back in just a moment with more of our coverage of the first day of the third millennium, right after this message.

Announcer: This ABC NEWS special, THE YEAR 2000: DAWN OF A NEW ERA, will return in a moment.

President and Mrs. Clinton Hold Impromptu News Conference Outside New Home in Chappaqua, New York

HIGHLIGHT: President and Mrs. Clinton hold an impromptu news conference, making their comments from outside their new house in Chappaqua, New York, about their first night in their new home.

DARYN KAGAN, CNN ANCHOR: And we are live now in Chappaqua, New York, listening to President and Mrs. Clinton talk about their first night in their new home.

(JOINED IN PROGRESS)

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON, FIRST LADY: ... that aren't done yet but are going to have to be tended to.

QUESTION: So you're going back to Washington today (inaudible) that?

RODHAM CLINTON: Yes. I'm going back today and we'll be packing up more things and moving more things in the next couple of weeks, so that it'll be a process. You know, we're not going to be totally moved in and everything in place for a while. But it's a lot of fun for us to be able to do this again for the first time in such a long time.

Because we of course worked very hard in the White House and spent an enormous amount of time and effort trying to keep the White House in good shape and do some additional work that needed to be done there, but it's different when you're doing it in your own home.

QUESTION: Have you thought any more about a schedule for how often you'll both be here?

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE) days ago said that both of you, the Clintons, he said, have been egregious violators of soft money, both in how it's collected and how it's distributed. Your reaction?

RODHAM CLINTON: We're going to talk about our house this morning, which we are very happy about being in and being New Yorkers, and we'll leave that to another time.

QUESTION: Mr. President, are you going to Lazard Freres?

WILLIAM J. CLINTON, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: No. No, I keep reading all these things. I've not given very much thought to this. I'm going to work very hard on finishing my library and center, and I'm going to devote all my attention being president. I've got a lot -- a big agenda this year.

We're going back now, and I have to go back to Shepherdstown this afternoon. But I've had no discussions with anybody about that kind of move. And I was amazed to see that in the paper. No one's even suggested that.

QUESTION: Mr. President, last night the vice president debates said the Hill asked military commanders about their feelings on gays serving in the military before appointing people to the Joint Chiefs of Staff. Is this litmus test the way it should work?

CLINTON: Well, I think the real problem is -- let me go back to what happened, because as you know my view was, and I will restate my view, the Uniform Code of Military Justice prohibits homosexual contacts. So my view was if someone was willing to take the pledge to observe the Uniform Code of Military Justice, they shouldn't have to lie about being gay and being in the military.

Then let me remind you what happened. The Congress voted by a veto-proof majority against that position. So that's how we got to "don't ask, don't tell." My focus has been on trying to make the policy work the way the military commanders said it would work back in 1993, which it has not been doing. No one disputes that.

To Secretary Cohen's credit, back in August he announced some new guidelines which have now been implemented for training and for implementation, which I think will significantly improve the present situation over the next few months.

Now, the vice president and Senator Bradley say they want to go back to the position that I advocated in '92 and '93. In order to do that, the Congress will have to change the law, I believe. I don't think that the military and the president have the authority to do it. Now you could go back and look at the constitutional arguments...

KAGAN: We've been listening to comments from President and Mrs. Clinton. This turned into a kind of an impromptu news conference, making their comments from outside their new house in Chappaqua, New York.

FIRST LADY HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON DELIVERS REMARKS AT THE RAINBOW/PUSH COALITION CONFERENCE, 1/12/2000

LOCATION: NEW YORK CITY

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Reverend Jackson.

You know, you can believe nearly everything Reverend Jackson tells you.

(LAUGHTER)

But I do have to take just a moment to set the record straight. When we met, we were both children.

(LAUGHTER)

That was so long ago, neither of us can even remember that far back. But it has been 25 or 30 years of friendship, good natured ribbing, commitment to the same goals and aspirations for the country that we both love so much.

I'm delighted to be here with Percy Sutton (ph), who has been an example for so many people throughout New York and America, and whose grace...

... and wisdom still influence us all.

I want to thank Secretary Summers for being here. I think when the history of the last 10 years is written, the role that Secretary Summers and his predecessors, Secretary Rubin and Secretary Benson, played in bringing the Treasury Department into the full agenda of opportunity is one that will be marked as extraordinarily important.

And Secretary Summers has gone places where other treasury secretaries have not gone before and has taken up the battle for equal access to capital and opportunity.

CLINTON: And...

(APPLAUSE)

And I want to thank Bruce Gordon for his eloquence and his provocative reminder that there is more to be done.

We come to this meeting with a lot of good news, and we've heard quite a bit of that from both Secretary Summers and from Mr. Gordon. But we also know that we would not be meeting here if we did not have work to do, that the lack of equal opportunity for access to capital and for jobs is one of the unfinished pieces of business from the last century that we carry with us into this new one.

One of the lines that is not often quoted from Dr. King's memorable speech on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial is the following. He said, "We refuse to believe that there are insufficient funds in the great vaults of opportunity in this nation." Those vaults of opportunity are slowly but surely being pried open, but they need to open much faster, if we are to keep faith...

... with the talents and the skills of Americans from every walk of life.

CLINTON: Those vaults of opportunity are fuller than ever. But their prizes are not reaching all who need them.

So, I hope that all of us gathered here today and through the rest of this conference will work to keep faith with Dr. King's words and do all that we can in the public and private and philanthropic sectors to make sure those vaults of opportunity are opened as wide as possible.

I want to thank Reverend Jackson and all who work with him on this Wall Street project for what you are doing not only to open the vaults but to remind us that every one of us has an obligation and a responsibility in the continuing journey of America to extend opportunity, to extend the winners' circle, so that every American feels that his or her place is in the forefront of taking the American dream for themselves.

We have to be breaking down those barriers that still keep us from working together and building bridges, barriers between races and until recently, between Wall Street and the great untapped markets of America.

Yesterday, I was in upstate New York. I started in Rochester, I drove to the county seat of a small county, a town called Lyons in Wayne County. And then, I went on to Geneva, where I spoke to several thousand college students and community citizens.

I started by visiting a supermarket that had not been there very long because it was in an under-served neighborhood in Rochester.

CLINTON: But because of government policies, committed business leaders, visionary public leadership, that supermarket is now there, employing hundreds of people, doing business with dozens and dozens of other businesses and serving as a stark rebuke to anyone who believes there are not markets yet to be tapped right here in our own country.

And if one...

(APPLAUSE)

... if one were to go to many of the board rooms in many of the great businesses that call this city their headquarters, there would still be incredulity at the idea that you could make a profit as this chain of supermarkets in these under-served neighborhoods is making -- that you could make a profit serving people like the ones I saw in that supermarket. I must have shaken hundreds of hands.

And the clearest way to know whether you are with a poor person in America is not by the logo on the clothes, because we all wear pretty much the same anymore; it's by looking into their eyes and seeing whether they look into yours and seeing what kind of teeth they have. Poor Americans, more than in any other way, demonstrate their poverty these days by how much medical and dental care they either have or haven't received.

So, in those hundreds of hands I shook, I could see without anyone showing me a bank balance or telling me their life story that for these impoverished people, this supermarket gave them a chance to really feel they were back in American's mainstream.

CLINTON: I spoke with some of the suppliers, some of the stockers who were there, some of the people who delivered goods to the supermarket, and they told me very honestly they never thought there would be a profitable market in that part of town again.

There are still too many New Yorkers and too many Americans who haven't yet felt the full impact of the economic progress that we celebrate as we begin this new century. And if you believe, as I do, that part of the challenge we have is to bridge the capital divide, then I hope you will see as I see in all of my travels that we really have three divides that we have to bridge in order to provide opportunity as fully as possible. We have a capital divide, we have an education divide and we have a digital divide, which Bruce talked about so well.

If we add those divides up, we see what our challenges are: How do we get capital where it needs to be? How do we make sure our education systems are working for all Americans? How do we provide access to all the new information technology?

If we take on those three challenges, then we will bridge the opportunity divide that still exists in America.

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: And the good news is, we know what works. It's not as though we have no idea how to bridge the opportunity divide. There are many models around New York and America that can be pointed to with great pride. Bruce and Percy and Jesse and Larry mentioned and referred to some. The trick is whether we summon the political will and leadership, the public investment and leadership, the private investment and leadership in order to bridge these divides.

I've met many New Yorkers in the last six months who have very good ideas about what to do in their own communities in order to further their independence and self-sufficiency, but they need help, they need investment and they need leadership.

Last summer and fall, Reverend Jackson joined the president on a New Markets tour across America to shine a spotlight and bring new investments to communities left behind in good times -- from Newark to Watts to the Pine Ridge Reservation. And in the months since then, businesses that were watching and listening have been taking advantage of some of these new opportunities.

CLINTON: New jobs have been created. New capital has found its way to create economic opportunity in those long-forgotten places.

In this era of unprecedented prosperity, we do have a chance to build on what has been done in the last seven years. We now know that we can reform welfare. We now know that we can create jobs.

I remember in 1992 when the number eight million jobs was put out, many people said don't promise that many new jobs. You'll never get there. Well, I think we're at -- what 18, 19 million now, Larry, because we changed public policies, we unleashed a lot of entrepreneurial energy, we created more capital by bringing down the deficit and enabling the private markets to have access to that capital. And the results are there for everyone to see.

But let's not kid ourselves. This path of fiscal discipline begun in 1993 is not a sure thing. Because of the president's leadership and the able assistance of secretaries of treasury and others, we have abandoned the massive deficits of the 1980s, we have built record high surpluses and restored confidence in the American economy.

But every year, despite the evidence that fiscal discipline brought us to this point where we could be talking about expanding opportunities to those left behind, there are members of Congress and candidates for Congress who insist on throwing away that progress on irresponsible tax and budget plans.

If we want a strong economy that helps us bridge the opportunity divide, then we have to make sure that we do not make a U-turn back to the days of fiscal irresponsibility. We cannot go back to the time when deficits hobbled growth, spiked interest rates and robbed businesses of capital for investments throughout our country.

CLINTON: Therefore, part of our obligation here is to stand firmly in favor of those policies that will continue to nurture economic conditions that businesses need to expand and thrive and create new jobs.

That's one of the reasons we fought so hard to preserve the Community Reinvestment Act. The CRA...

(APPLAUSE)

The CRA was seen by some as a social engineering tool that had no place in the marketplace. But we know that the CRA has helped families buy new homes, helped businesses hire more workers and promoted economic growth in so many communities. It is an important tool to expand on the progress that we have made and hope to make. And it is a valuable tool that I will stand firmly beside Reverend Jackson and Secretary Summers and others always to protect, because without that kind of public-private partnership, we will not maximize our opportunity and the chance to bring more people into this economy.

I strongly support the proposal that was announced today, that Secretary Summers spoke about, to expand the earned income tax credit to help more married couples and families who are raising two or more children. No one who works full-time in America should have to raise a family in poverty. We ended...

(APPLAUSE)

We ended welfare in large measure because we wanted to reward work.

CLINTON: Now we have to make work pay, and full-time work should provide a decent living wage that lifts a family out of poverty. And...

(APPLAUSE)

And there is a role, certainly, for earned income tax credit, for the minimum wage and other tools of government. But the greatest opportunity lies in the private sector -- to go into those markets that have been written off in the past and to bring the know-how and technical assistance that only the private sector can provide.

When I was speaking with the store manager at that supermarket in Rochester, I was struck time and again by how enthusiastic he was for the new business that he had helped to create, and how now there were five such supermarkets and more on the drawing boards. It was not something that was done from the goodness of the corporate heart. It was not an altruistic decision. It was a simple profit and loss decision and it has paid off.

I believe that if we continue to work together, the public and the private sector, to push the New Markets Initiative, to create more awareness among our business and corporate leaders about what markets are available, we will have even more stories like the ones all of us could tell.

I believe we have to make it easier for businesses of all sizes; from Fortune 500 to small start-ups, to invest in the inner city and in rural areas. I believe that's why we should support tax credits and incentives and government-guaranteed loans to leverage billions of dollars in new private investment and reduce the initial risk for businesses that agree to hang out their shingles in areas of high unemployment.

CLINTON: That supermarket was there because of the empowerment zone and enterprise community legislation that provided just that extra push that a business needed -- that the government would stand behind their risk-taking while they determined how to make a profit and build a market.

Tomorrow the president will be introducing even more proposals to boost the New Markets Initiative, and there is one aspect of that that I would like to discuss; he will certainly be making all of the other announcements here in New York.

But one that is particularly important to me and that I've been involved in now for more than 15 years is called microenterprise, an idea that started in very poor places -- Bangladesh and India -- where there was no collateral for any kind of credit, yet people worked hard 12, 18 hours a day bringing in crops, taking goods to market. They had the collateral of their own commitment to hard work. And then that was thought to be enough to give them small loans so that they could create small businesses to further their families' fortunes.

I first heard about microenterprise when I heard about the Grameen (ph) Bank in Bangladesh and a man named Mohamed Unis (ph), a United States-trained economist who returned home to Bangladesh and determined that there was no way for that poor country ever to provide economic opportunity without access to capital, and went about the business of starting a bank that would do just that.

I'd heard about how the South Shore Bank in Chicago had taken those ideas and transplanted them to America, providing modest-sized loans primarily to low-income women, who would have never qualified for a commercial loan.

When I heard about it, I knew that that was an idea that could change lives throughout America, and particularly in Arkansas, where Bill and I were committed to doing all we could to bring economic opportunity to areas that had long been left out of the mainstream of America's economy.

CLINTON: So we began to create a local version of this kind of micro-enterprise, starting a bank in association with the South Shore Bank, starting the loan funds in something called the "good faith fund," and we saw that what worked far away from the shores of our own country could indeed work here at home.

Many low-income people who had skills and talents were able to turn them in to jobs and even small businesses that employed others because they had access to capital. People began to free themselves from welfare. They saw a future where before they never had.

I know that many people are still unaware of micro-enterprise, don't know what it can do in the lives of Americans, and that many commercial enterprises, particularly commercial banks, are still reluctant to be involved. And yet in every program of micro-credit that I am personally aware of, the loan repayment rate is more than 95 percent. That is...

(APPLAUSE)

That is a return that most commercial banks certainly could not claim. And it is credit that is extended to the poorest of the poor, but in a way that enables and empowers them to not only make a profit but to pass on that kind of economic awareness to their neighbors, therefore creating a larger and larger market.

I want to thank some of America's commercial banks that are beginning to be involved in micro-enterprise, but principally abroad, working in Northern Ireland, working in India. We need to bring those ideas that work right here to America.

Since 1993, we have built a strong record of support and investment in micro lending in the Clinton administration. We've tripled America's investment in community development banks and have established the presidential awards in micro-enterprise excellence and provided technical assistance.

CLINTON: I believe we can build on that progress. I would like to double the number of micro entrepreneurs in our communities. And we can do that by strengthening the SBA's micro loan program and the new PRIME Act, which extends training and credit to people with little income or credit but good ideas for business and the willingness to put in a lot of sweat equity.

I will certainly work to support the SBA's very successful one- stop capital shops which provide finance and micro-enterprise training in distressed communities to even more under-served areas, particularly rural communities.

Now, it is clear that micro-credit is not the only solution. But it is a small and important part of the overall strategy to bridge the opportunity divide. If we have a New Markets Initiative that opens up new markets, we have to recognize that that is more than just economics and money that we're talking about. It is restoring confidence in communities where it has basically disappeared. It is giving citizens a chance to open up their first savings accounts. Instead of going to cash checkers with their EITC checks, they can go to a real bank and cash it and not pay the exorbitant fees that eat into the little income that they have. It is watching a mother with pride get dressed for work once again, and seeing abandoned streets and blocks gleam with new businesses like I saw yesterday.

I finished my day yesterday at Hobart (ph) and William Smith colleges where about 2,000 young people and maybe another thousand...

... a lot of good.

And I thank all of you for being committed to what Reverend Jackson calls America's freedom symphony. You heard him recite it as I've heard him say it so many times before: The first movement, liberation from slavery. The second, the end of segregation. The third, the fight to win the vote, which must be exercised if it means anything. And the final movement, the crusade to bring economic opportunity to all Americans.

It is our opportunity to play that symphony better than it has ever been played anywhere, anytime in human history.

Thank you all very much.

"CNN SATURDAY MORNING NEWS," CNN, 2/5/2000

Kathleen Koch joining us now from the White House with more on that.

Good morning, Kathleen.

KATHLEEN KOCH, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Good morning, Miles.

As you said, this is the weekend when Hillary Rodham Clinton transitions officially from having that conversation with New Yorkers to actually becoming a candidate for the New York Senate seat. Now, she will be making the announcement at 3:00 p.m. tomorrow at State University of New York in Purchase, and CNN will be carrying that announcement, of course, live.

Standing there at her side, where she has been for him throughout his political career, of course, will be President Clinton, though it's not exactly clear what role Mr. Clinton will play in the ceremony. Generally, the honor of introducing the candidate goes to the spouse or to the senior politician present and, of course, the president is both. But there are whisperings that because of lingering concerns over Mrs. Clinton's status as an outsider still in the state of New York that perhaps a New York politician will be tapped for that duty.

Afterwards, the Clintons plan to begin attending some campaign events and there is also a great deal of interest and it's somewhat of a mystery as to what role the president will play in the first lady's campaign.

Earlier this week, White House Press Secretary Joe Lockhart said that the president is going to "do whatever is going to be effective for her campaign" and that that would be determined as the campaign unfolds.

This, of course, will also be a very big weekend for the man who is expected to be the first lady's challenger for the New York Senate seat, Mayor Rudy Giuliani of New York. Not one to be ignored, he is going to be appearing on five Sunday morning news talk shows, count them, five. At that point we are expected to hear more about charges that came out this week that the first lady may not have adequately reimbursed taxpayers for campaign trips that she made on government aircraft. Just a taste, perhaps, of the nasty campaign to come.

So what will the White House do now with the mostly absent first lady? Press Secretary Joe Lockhart again says that the White House will manage. The first lady said that she's going to try to be here for special White House dinners, formal events with visiting dignitaries and Lockhart has said operations here won't be impacted. Where they need to fill in, they will.

Reporting live at the White House, I'm Kathleen Koch.

O'BRIEN: Of course, Mrs. Clinton will be the first first lady to run for U.S. Senate. What is the agenda? The answer might lie in what she did as first lady.

CNN White House Correspondent Kelly Wallace with a look at that.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

KELLY WALLACE, CNN CORRESPONDENT (voice-over): From the beginning, Hillary Rodham Clinton broke new ground as first lady, leading her husband's efforts to make health coverage universal, testifying on Capitol Hill.

HILLARY CLINTON: I'm here as an American citizen concerned about the health of her family and the health of her nation.

WALLACE: The experience was a political disaster. Critics not only attacked the plan, but questioned the power she wielded in the White House. Now, Mrs. Clinton admits she's learned a few lessons.

CLINTON: But I now come from the school of smaller steps.

WALLACE: Smaller and often less public steps, she pushed for government health insurance for children of low income workers, now federal law.

SEN. CHRISTOPHER DODD (D), CONNECTICUT: When I want to get the child care numbers improved in the White House's budget I don't call the president, I don't call the Office of Management and Budget, I don't call the chief of staff, I call the first lady.

WALLACE: Most of Mrs. Clinton's policy efforts focused on children, including kids waiting to be adopted.

CLINTON: Foster care should never be a permanent solution.

WALLACE: She lobbied Congress to increase incentives for adoption. Her husband signed it into law. She also convened two White House conferences, one on child care, the other on brain development in early childhood. Matthew Melmed worked with Mrs. Clinton on programs for children under four.

MATTHEW MELMED, ZERO TO THREE: She had a very pragmatic approach about what was the art of the possible and how could we try to move that forward. And I believe that that's how she was able to accomplish as much as she has been able to accomplish.

WALLACE: Mrs. Clinton also traveled to more countries than any other first lady, focusing attention on women's health in Pakistan, promoting women's rights in China and advocating micro loans in South Africa. Aides say the first lady's policy achievements are an untold story.

LISA MUSCATINE, PRESS SECRETARY TO HILLARY CLINTON: I think that after '94 a lot of people just assumed that because health care didn't go quite the way she wanted it to, that was going to be the end of her involvement and quite the opposite has been true.

WALLACE (on camera): And if the first lady makes her way to the Senate, her aides say the venue might change but her focus on children and families will not.

Kelly Wallace, CNN, the White House.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

O'BRIEN: CNN is planning live coverage of Mrs. Clinton's announcement. It begins tomorrow at 3:00 p.m. Eastern Time. Mrs. Clinton's expected opponent will be among the guests tomorrow on CNN's LATE EDITION. New York City's Republican Mayor Rudy Giuliani is Wolf Blitzer's guest, noon Eastern Time for that.

GENE RANDALL, CNN ANCHOR: First lady Hillary Rodham Clinton today makes history by formally launching her bid for the U.S. Senate from New York. She is doing so from a state university campus in Purchase, New York not far from the Clinton's new home in Chappaqua. Speaking at the moment is Senator Charles Schumer of New York. Today's announcement caps many months of Mrs. Clinton's unofficial candidacy. President Clinton and daughter Chelsea are there for the event.

And CNN's White House correspondent John King is there as well -- John.

JOHN KING, CNN SR. WHITE HOUSE CORRESPONDENT: (OFF-MIKE) ... six months, she will be a candidate for the United States Senate seat being vacated by the long-time Democrat Daniel Patrick Moynihan. This is Mrs. Clinton's first run for elective office. A grueling campaign expected here in New York.

Her likely Republican opponent, although he has not officially announced yet, the New York City mayor, Rudy Giuliani. Polls show a relatively (OFF-MIKE) ... said he led at one point early one. (OFF- MIKE) ... the mayor leading 47 percent to 40 percent in the latest Marist Institute Poll.

The first lady (OFF-MIKE) ... launched her campaign today. One big issue, of course, is she a New Yorker, is she representing people of New York? Just moments ago, the dean of the state's congressional delegation, Congressman Charlie Rangel addressed that issue. He said if you need help in public service, you don't ask somebody where they're from, you ask if they're willing to serve.

So already the first lady's friends trying to help her out today to answer what many consider the threshold question, is she running to represent New York, or is she running to advance her own national political agenda -- Gene.

RANDALL: Thanks, John.

With me in the studio is Bill Schneider, our senior political analyst. Bill, what kind of political shape is the first lady in as she formally launches this bid for the Senate?

WILLIAM SCHNEIDER, CNN SR. POLITICAL ANALYST: Gene, it's a very tight race. She's not in as good a shape as she was even a year ago at the end of the impeachment ordeal when she was running ahead of Mayor Giuliani. The latest polls, as John King just said, shows her trailing the New York City mayor.

Another poll just came out today, the Quinnipiac College Poll, which shows her behind also 45 to 42, 45 percent for Giuliani, 42 percent for Mrs. Clinton. But both of these polls are interesting because they both show that she ties among women voters in New York. She is not running ahead of the mayor among women and that's a problem that she has to attend to in her announcement today.

RANDALL: Bill, Mayor Giuliani of New York today probably tied the modern record for talk show appearances set by Bill Ginsberg (ph), Monica Lewinsky's first lawyer. He did every major TV talk show today in what was obviously designed as a round of preemptive strikes. Let's listen to a bit of what he said on one of the talk shows today, our own with Wolf Blitzer.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP, "LATE EDITION WITH WOLF BLITZER")

MAYOR RUDOLPH GIULIANI (R), NEW YORK CITY: ... single biggest issue in this race will be the single biggest issue in any race, who do the public trust more to represent them. Who does the public think is going to do a better job in this particular case of representing the state of New York in the United States Senate.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

RANDALL: This is a politician who is known for the rough and tumble. Today, if anything, he seemed to be understated. How did he do?

SCHNEIDER: I thought he did very well, because he simply said, I'm going to be running to represent the people of New York. Key words, New York, represent. She has never lived or worked in New York State. Her campaign is mostly about national ideas and national issues.

She's got to somehow make it clear to the voters of New York, today perhaps, that her agenda will be their agenda, because frankly, especially in upstate New York, the carpetbagger charge that she's come from nowhere, from Washington, from Arkansas to try to claim the seat to further her own career, they suspect that and that's why she's running behind.

RANDALL: Do you think we'll see a kinder, gentler Rudy Giuliani in the days ahead?

SCHNEIDER: It's hard to imagine such a thing, but he was pretty kind and gentle today, when she's tried to portray him as a bully -- her people -- I won't say she's done this, but her staff has tried to portray as someone who's part of the vast right-wing conspiracy, who's going to be used to -- by the anti-Clinton forces.

Number one, his views are not that right wing. On our own "LATE EDITION WITH WOLF BLITZER," he talked about supporting the minimum wage increase, supporting the patients' bill of rights and the right of patients to sue, supporting the president's agenda on a whole number of issues. He's not a right winger.

Second of all, it's hard to portray him as someone who's going to be pushed around somehow by the right-wing who run Congress here in Washington, because frankly, New Yorkers don't believe that anybody pushes Mayor Giuliani around.

RANDALL: Bill, one major piece of business for the Clinton campaign now in New York for the first lady is to reintroduce her to the voters of that state. She will argue she has been misperceived, and part of the effort today is an 18-minute biographical video of Mrs. Clinton. I want to look at part of that and then ask you about it.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP, HILLARY CLINTON CAMPAIGN AD)

DOROTHY RODHAM CLINTON, HILLARY CLINTON'S MOTHER: She was a good child without being too good.

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON, FIRST LADY: I was very fortunate that I lived with both my parents and my two younger brothers in a close-knit neighborhood. I went to really good public schools. My father was a small businessman. He had a small drapery company that didn't employ very many people except every so often he would draft my mother and my brothers and I to help him print the fabrics that he designed and sold. We had a wonderful time.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

RANDALL: This is obviously a softer Hillary Rodham Clinton, to what end, Bill?

SCHNEIDER: To the end that I mentioned before. She is now tied with Giuliani among women voters in New York. One of the constituencies she has to bolster her standing with is women.

This video, this biography is soft focused. It focuses on children, on her mother, who's featured very prominently in it on her life's background, it focuses on her role as a woman, her relationship both with her mother and with her daughter. This is aimed at shoring up her support among women voters in New York. A lot of them sympathize with her when they saw her as a victim a year ago during the impeachment saga, but now see her differently. They see her as a pol (ph) and that's not a very flattering light.

RANDALL: You saw the entire 18 minutes. How would you characterize it?

SCHNEIDER: Very soft, very biographical. Emphasizing her commitment, her personal convictions on issues like health care, women's rights, children's rights, and also emphasizing her willingness to speak out. New Yorkers value that. It showed her speaking in China, it showed -- and I'm not sure this was wise -- her meeting with Mrs. Arafat on the West Bank, which was very controversial. But it does say that she speaks her mind. In fact, it featured one incident quite prominently, mentioned it several times, that when she graduated Wellesley College in the 1960s she gave a speech that was sensational. She threw away her prepared text and spoke out about the issues that were then whirling the country, because it wants to make the point -- like a true New Yorker, this woman will speak her mind.

RANDALL: And what kind of campaign do you see her running in New York, Bill?

SCHNEIDER: Well, she's going to have to run upstate very hard, because that's where the carpetbagger issue hurts her most. New York City, they don't care about carpetbaggers. Most people came from somewhere else to begin with, many from another country. But in upstate New York, yes, they worry about that and they wonder, how can she understand what life is like, the taxes we pay, the education issues that we face, if she's never lived or worked here?

I can't find another example, save Robert F. Kennedy, which is a questionable example, but I can't find another example of a politician being elected to a major statewide office in any state who's never lived or worked in the state. And when RFK was elected senator from New York in 1964, it was very much on the coattails of Lyndon Johnson, who won New York the very same day on the same ballot by 2,700,000 votes. Kennedy got elected by 700,000. It's hard to see how either Gore or Bradley at the top of the Democratic ticket is going to have coattails the way LBJ did in 1964.

RANDALL: Robert Kennedy in that year, of course, defeating Republican Kenneth Keating.

SCHNEIDER: That's right.

RANDALL: We must take a break, as we await the start of Hillary Rodham Clinton's official announcement that indeed she will run for the U.S. Senate from New York. We'll be back in a moment.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

RANDALL: Welcome back.

Hillary Rodham Clinton, the first lady of this country will announce that she is a candidate for the U.S. Senate in New York, as she tries to succeed Daniel Patrick Moynihan, who is retiring.

Let's go back to Purchase, New York, where the announcement is still some minutes away.

CNN's senior White House correspondent John King is there.

John, I know there is an 18-minute biographical video which is being played at the moment. How focused is the Hillary Clinton campaign effort to reintroduce her to the voters on her own terms?

KING: Well, that is their main mission today. They say in this speech, through this video we're seeing right here at the announcement right now, 400,000 flyers being distributed across this state entitled "Hillary: the Real Story."

Obviously, the first lady has been a very controversial figure in American politics these past seven years. She was controversial back in Arkansas as well. This a chance for her. She says she has been mischaracterized by her critics, and she acknowledges she perhaps has not done as good a job as she would like to have done to explain herself.

A bit of a role reversal here today. The first lady has traditionally been out supporting her husband in his political effort -- when he was governor of Arkansas, when he was running for president back in 1991 and 1992. Of course, she led the health care reform task force, turned into a political disaster for both the president and the first lady. Now she steps out on her own.

We have not seen her today. She has been off in private rehearsing her speech, we are told. We did see the president and daughter Chelsea Clinton earlier today. They went into Mrs. Clinton's new hometown of Chappaqua to the Starbucks, a little coffee, a little sightseeing early this morning for them. They will be in a supporting role here today. No remarks from the president, although we are told that he does participate in some of the strategy sessions, and he did offer his wife some advice today as she prepared her announcement speech -- Gene.

RANDALL: John, is there an acceptance among the inner circle of Hillary Rodham Clinton's organization that she must be a different kind of candidate in the months ahead if she is to make progress against Rudy Giuliani?

KING: They certainly do accept that and on several fronts. First and foremost, in her first six months of exploring she made several mistakes as she explored the ethnic politics of New York, mistakes meeting with some of the leaders here. They felt slighted by her. They felt she came in thinking that they would immediately support her, and she did not reach out to them.

She's working a much more aggressive inside game, and she says she also must be much more accessible, not only to the news media -- and a very competitive news media here in the state of New York -- but on the point you were discussing with Bill Schneider earlier. She wants to show the people of New York that she wants to fight for them. There is some skepticism that she wants to be in the Senate for a national political platform. She needs to make the case she wants to fight for the people of New York.

If you picked up your "New York Times" this morning, she does an interview in which she talks about how shocked she was when she saw her property tax bill for the first time, also talks about her first visit to the supermarket. The first lady trying to cast a new image here, trying to relate herself more to the people now whose votes she desperately needs -- women voters in New York, suburban voters in New York -- and she certainly can't expect a win upstate, but she does very much need to cut into the mayor's lead up there. RANDALL: And, John, once again that biographical video is continuing behind you. we'll get back to you in just a few moments.

Today's official announcement, of course, comes after many months of unofficial campaigning by the first lady. How has she been received by voters in New York to this point?

DEBORAH FEYERICK, CNN CORRESPONDENT (voice-over): There's something about Hillary Clinton that opinionated New Yorkers either love or hate.

UNIDENTIFIED NEW YORKER: She's got guts.

UNIDENTIFIED NEW YORKER: Between her and Bill, I think they should just stay out of public office from here on in.

FEYERICK: The Chicago, Boston, Arkansas, Washington and now Chappaqua resident has lived in the state for only a month, a problem for some New Yorkers, not for others.

UNIDENTIFIED NEW YORKER: I'm uncomfortable having someone come in from outside the area and just set up shop here.

UNIDENTIFIED NEW YORKER: It doesn't matter because I'm not from New York, too.

UNIDENTIFIED NEW YORKER: I think it takes a person to have lived here, paid taxes here and gone through the educational system to truly know the problems and needs of the state.

FEYERICK: Still, Hillary Clinton's time in the Arkansas governor's mansion and White House weighs on voters' minds.

UNIDENTIFIED NEW YORKER: Being the president's wife, I mean she has a very good grasp on the issues.

UNIDENTIFIED NEW YORKER: Her experience in New York is limited at best.

UNIDENTIFIED NEW YORKER: She's been in politics a long time and I think she has the educational criteria and I think she could do it.

FEYERICK: She's won friends on some policies but not on others.

UNIDENTIFIED NEW YORKER: I don't think so. She's a friend of Israel and I don't think so she's a friend of New Yorkers either.

UNIDENTIFIED NEW YORKER: She cares about kids. She cares about health.

UNIDENTIFIED NEW YORKER: I don't like her views on the situation in Vieques or the political prisoners, the way she wavered on both.

UNIDENTIFIED NEW YORKER: She seems to have good intentions. FEYERICK: As for her character...

UNIDENTIFIED NEW YORKER: I think I'll pass on comment on that.

UNIDENTIFIED NEW YORKER: I think she's been very intelligent. She does a lot of research before she does stand for something.

FEYERICK: She's remained standing by her man.

UNIDENTIFIED NEW YORKER: I'm not too crazy about the whole Clinton shenanigans and I think she's part of it.

UNIDENTIFIED NEW YORKER: Couples have marital problems and I think she rode through that as a champion.

UNIDENTIFIED NEW YORKER: There's no denying the fact that her and her husband, the president, are a team and you can't have one without the other.

FEYERICK: So what are her chances?

UNIDENTIFIED NEW YORKER: No, I think it's great. It's just about woman time now.

UNIDENTIFIED NEW YORKER: Hey, she could try like everybody else. It's a free country, right?

FEYERICK: Whether New Yorkers like it or not.

Deborah Feyerick, CNN, New York.

RANDALL: Bill Schneider, John King alluded to the fact that President Clinton has no formal role in today's ceremony. But he also said that the president is, of course, advising his wife. Now do you suppose he advised her on the merits of running as a new Democrat?

SCHNEIDER: Well, apparently he did, because she's stressing, according to the "New York Times" interview this morning, she's stressing her credentials as a new Democrat. She has an image of being the most liberal member of the Clinton administration, but yet she's now talking about her support for the death penalty, her support for welfare reform, which Senator Moynihan, whom she wants to succeed, voted against, saying that it would throw children out on the street. And she's talking about her support for a balanced budget. She's trying to run as a Democrat, a Bill Clinton Democrat.

RANDALL: She is running in a state where her husband won with well in excess of two million votes in 1996. Is that any built-in advantage which is guaranteed?

SCHNEIDER: It's not guaranteed, but it's certainly an advantage. New York has a heavy Democratic registration edge. It's one of the states Democrats believe they can count on in a presidential election, though, I hasten to add, voted for Ronald Reagan twice. Nevertheless, it is a state that tilts Democratic. not by decisive margins.

The problem is will Al Gore or Bill Bradley have that kind of a margin this year in November? It looks doubtful. Right now, the polls show Gore and Bush, if they are the nominees of the two parties, are running very, very close. So it doesn't look like it's going to be a Democratic landslide in New York.

And frankly, there's a big question mark over this presidential election, and that's John McCain. A lot of Democrats and independents like John McCain. If he turns out to be the Republican nominee, oh boy, watch out.

RANDALL: And hasn't he gotten, really, a lot of attention in New York simply because Bush's people, from Governor Pataki on down, tried to keep McCain off the ballot and finally had to surrender? So he will have ballot access. He's getting a windfall of publicity just from that, isn't he?

SCHNEIDER: That's right. It's a real bonanza for John McCain. He looks like the guy, you know, who took on the impossible task, overthrew the bosses, the machine, the establishment of the New York Republican Party which tried to freeze him out and won. And he won. And New Yorkers are kind of excited by that, the little guy taking on the system, especially people like the mayor -- the governor of New York -- and the mayor, who of course supports George Bush as well.

RANDALL: In Purchase, New York, today, the first lady will be introduced by Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan. She, of course, would like to succeed him in the U.S. Senate. And when that happens we'll bring it to you, but right now we'll take a break.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

RANDALL: There is a major Clinton family event today in Purchase, New York, outside New York City. It is not for the president, it is for his wife, first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton. She will formally announce her bid for the U.S. Senate seat being vacated by Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan.

And our senior White House correspondent, John King, is there.

John, tell me about the turnout for today's event.

KING: We have a who's who here of New York Democratic officials. They might as well have the state convention. Members of Congress here, city Democrats as well as Democrats from all around the state of New York. Also, a large representative from teachers unions here and other organized labor groups backing the first lady. A small smattering of White House staff on hand as well to watch this. They're traveling here with the president of the United States.

What you're about to see, Gene, a very unique moment that shows where we are, a very confused state of Democratic politics right now. The first lady will be introduced by the man she hopes to replace, Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan. In the presidential race, Senator Moynihan is a supporter of Bill Bradley. Senator Moynihan is known to not be terribly fond of the president, Mr. Clinton, but he is giving his full support to Mrs. Clinton here. That a sign of the rather unique Democratic politics, as she launches her first run for elective office.

Right now we're in the final minutes of that 18-minute biographical video you mentioned earlier. It was produced by two long-time friends of the Clintons, the Hollywood producers Harry Thomason (ph) and Linda Bloodworth (ph). Thomason, you might remember back at the 1992 Democratic Convention, a long biographical video about Bill Clinton called "The Boy From Hope." That was designed to refurbish his image after very bruising Democratic primaries. The Thomasons also produced this video, as the first lady tries to reintroduce herself not only to the people of New York, but to the people of the United States as well. Although, her worries over the next several months, obviously, building support here in New York.

RANDALL: John, what exactly is the president's role today other than accompanying his wife?

KING: He will sit in the background and just cheer his wife on. People in the -- Mrs. Clinton's campaign say that was his decision, that he could have spoken if he wanted to, but that he wanted her -- this to be her day, as she tries to step out.

A great deal of debate about just how big of a role the president can play as the campaign goes on. He has helped his wife raise money. He has helped with her speech today, we're told, and have been involved in some of the strategy meetings. And he promises if wanted he will play a very active role in the fall campaign.

Nationally, the president a controversial figure in his final year perhaps. Here in New York, the latest Marist Institute Poll, a 64 percent approval rating. So no evidence at least in the public opinion polling that the president hurts his wife. The big question is, though, people in New York say she needs to win this on her own, so his role will be limited, at least in the short term. Look for him, though, to help with turnout come November.

RANDALL: We of course assume that the Republican opponent for Mrs. Clinton will be Rudy Giuliani, the Republican mayor of New York City. He did all the talk shows this morning and he talked about himself and his own case for election. Let's hear some of that.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GIULIANI: One of the attacks that they make every other day is, the mayor is too much of a fighter, he's too tough. The other attack that they make is, oh, gee, he's just going to do what Republicans tell him to do. Well, maybe the reality is that I'm an independent person, I believe in Republican principles, but I'm pretty good at advocating, I'm pretty good at getting for the people that I serve the things that they need.

RANDALL: Bill Schneider, we talked about this before. This was a very understated Rudy Giuliani, wasn't it?

SCHNEIDER: Yes. Well, it was understated, but he made it clear that he's a fighter. You know, there's something interesting and odd about Giuliani. He often takes up causes that he doesn't win. Remember he tried to shut down the Brooklyn Museum of Art because they showed an exhibit that he thought was sacrilegious. He tried to revise the city charter in a very unpopular move, rejected by the voters three to one. And the voters turn against him. They don't like those things he's doing. And every time he does it, his ratings go up. Why?

Because they think he's a fighter. He's someone who will fight for the city of New York, fight -- he hopes they'll see him as fighting for the state of New York.

RANDALL: In what kind of shape is he in going into this race, again, assuming he will make the announcement?

SCHNEIDER: Well, he has certain advantages. You know, he -- the mayor of New York is never popular upstate. As far as upstate New Yorkers are concerned, New York City is Mars. But the problem is, she is not very popular upstate either. So he's leading her, but not a decisive margin. That's where the battle will be fought.

His base is not in New York City, where she's leading by a very good margin, he's going to cut into that a bit, because he's a popular mayor, but still, New York City, that's Democratic. His base is in the suburbs of New York. As I like to put it, the suburbs of New York watch New York City television, they think he's done a great job, it's a safe place to go to the theater now, but they don't have to live with him. They don't have to live with the turmoil and the traumas that he causes, and that's where he's best.

RANDALL: Bill, at the risk of being too personal, I will tell you, growing up north of New York City, when I was a small child someone said to me there is a place in New York called Buffalo. I said, no, there isn't. They said, yes, there is. I said, no, there isn't. There can't be a place in New York called Buffalo, which I think goes to your point that there are separate worlds in New York. I'm not proud of that ignorance that I displayed then and I've come to appreciate all of New York. But is upstate where this is going to be told, where the story is going to be told?

SCHNEIDER: I think it will be. That's about 40 to 45 percent of the voters in New York State. There are a lot of them up there. Nobody knows who they are. Wolf Blitzer is from Buffalo. You'll have to talk to him. But it's -- a lot of voters are up there and that is where the carpetbagger issue as well as the liberal image of Hillary Rodham Clinton is hurting her. That's why she's running as a new Democrat and that's why in the next couple of weeks she's going to focus her campaign effort in upstate New York, because right now upstate voters favor Giuliani over Mrs. Clinton. Although, as I say, the mayor of New York has never been a popular figure upstate.

RANDALL: And a few minutes from now we'll be hearing from Chappaqua resident Hillary Rodham Clinton. But right now, we'll take a break.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

RANDALL: President Clinton, his wife, and daughter Chelsea are in Purchase, New York today. It is the first lady, Hillary Rodham Clinton, who is in the spotlight. She is formally announcing she is a candidate, a Democratic candidate for the U.S. Senate from New York. She is being introduced by Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan, who is retiring. Let's go to Purchase, New York.

SEN. DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN (D), NEW YORK: ... and it was decided that I would go and take our daughter, who had never been. So I hired a carriage and we made our way around through the Secret Service checkpoints, and we were sniffed and prodded and scrutinized, and finally got to the west entrance and a beaming young Secret Service agent looked in the window and said, good evening, Senator Thurmond.

(LAUGHTER)

Which brings me -- reminds me that indeed in just three years I will have spent a half a century in New York politics.

(APPLAUSE)

I got out of the Navy, finished graduate school and went off on a full ride to wander around the world for a bit, came back 1953, went right to work in the mayoral campaign of Robert F. Wagner for mayor of New York. Next came the Harriman campaign for governor and the Harriman administration, then the Kennedy administration. In each of which settings I came to know Eleanor Roosevelt.

(APPLAUSE)

President Kennedy set up a commission on the status of women with her as chair and she would ask us up to Valkil (ph) and there would be wonderful evenings. stories of the 1930s, and discussions of issues to come, lots of martinis, and you came to love this person so because she cared so much about others.

And I would like say to the lady who put a picture of Eleanor Roosevelt on her White House office wall the day she arrived, Hillary, where are you? Hillary, Eleanor Roosevelt would love you.

(APPLAUSE)

And here she is, our next senator and our first lady senator ever, to tell you what she's going to do with the trust we're going to impose on her.

(APPLAUSE)

H. CLINTON: Thank you and thank you Senator Moynihan for that very generous introduction and for all the support that you and Liz have given to me. You know New York and America are greatly indebted to Senator Moynihan for your years of courageous and visionary leadership.

(APPLAUSE)

No one has done more to remind us that families are the bedrock of our society. I want to thank Chuck Schumer, Charlie Rangel, and Nita Lowey for their friendship, for their kind words and for all that each of them does for New York. And I want to thank all the members of the congressional delegation who are here today. Thank you all for coming.

(APPLAUSE)

And I want to thank Comptroller Tom McCall, Speaker Shelly Silver and all of the state elected officials who are with us.

(APPLAUSE)

And I so pleased to be here at Purchase College State University of New York.

(APPLAUSE)

I know that Purchase was recently named one of the finest regional public liberal arts colleges in the entire country.

(APPLAUSE)

And it is part of the greatest state university system in this country.

(APPLAUSE)

I think all of the young singers and entertainers and I especially want to thank Amity Weiss (ph) from Ithaca for representing young New Yorkers and all of their possibilities. Thank you, Amity.

(APPLAUSE)

And I thank all my fellow New Yorkers for coming out on this wintry Sunday afternoon to be with me. My long-time friends, my new supporters, elected officials, all of you, I appreciate your being with me. And I know that there are about 1,000 more in the overflow room, and I'm very glad you could be here as well.

I'm so grateful to Bill and Chelsea, my mother and my brothers, and all of our families -- those who could be with us and those who could not, today.

And I'm pleased that I have with me, also, some old friends from my childhood in Chicago, my college days and law-school years in New England, my wonderful years in Arkansas and as first lady. Thank you all for a lifetime's worth of love and encouragement.

You know, the first time I spoke to a group this large was at my college commencement in 1969. I'm a little older now...

... a little blonder...

(LAUGHTER)

... a lot humbler. I've gone to work, I've raised a child, and I've spent 30 years trying to better the lives of children and families. But I often return to one thing I said way back then, that politics is the art of making possible what appears to be impossible.

(APPLAUSE)

I still believe that today. We can do what seems impossible if we have the vision, the passion and the will to do it together.

We've seen what's possible in the progress we've made over the last seven years, and I am proud and grateful to have been a part of it.

(APPLAUSE)

And I am convinced we can move on from here to meet the challenges that lie ahead. We can strengthen our families, we can protect our children, we can improve our schools, we can provide health care to all our citizens, and we can bring good jobs to every corner of New York.

(APPLAUSE)

Because I believe we can meet these challenges together, I am honored today to announce my candidacy for the United States Senate from New York.

(APPLAUSE)

Thank you. Now I know, some people are asking why I'm doing this here and now. And that's a fair question.

Here's my answer and why I hope you'll put me to work for you. I may be new to the neighborhood, but I'm not new to your concerns.

(APPLAUSE)

When I ate lunch with teachers at a school in Queens, I heard how hard it is to teach and learn when 2,000 kids are crammed into a building designed for half that number. And I thought -- I thought about the work I've done for 20 years to improve our public schools. Now I want to make sure that every child in New York has the best possible public education, with well-trained teachers in modern classrooms connected to the Internet.

(APPLAUSE)

That's why I want to be your senator.

When I visited businesses from Jamestown to Great Neck, I thought about my father who ran a small business and worked hard every day. I thought of all the work I did, first in Arkansas and then as first lady, throughout America and in developing companies, to improve training for workers and to provide credit for entrepreneurs and bring jobs to areas with high unemployment. Now I want to bring the prosperity of this new economy to all New Yorkers, from upstate towns and farms to inner-city neighborhoods. That's why I want to be your senator.

(APPLAUSE)

When I spoke with breast cancer survivors at Adelphi University, I thought about Bill's mother and the courageous battle she fought until her last day. Over the past seven years, I've worked to include annual mammograms under Medicare, and to increase funding for research, detection and treatment of breast cancer.

(APPLAUSE)

Now I want finally to pin down the environmental connections to cancer on Long Island or elsewhere.

(APPLAUSE)

And I want to provide the research funds to prevent and cure cancer, AIDS and other diseases. That's why I want to be your senator.

(APPLAUSE)

You know, when I sat on porches and in back yards from Elmira to New Rochelle, I heard parents' concerns about the media's influence on their children, and I thought about all the conversations Bill and I had with our friends when Chelsea was growing up about how to protect our children from the influences of a popular culture that glorifies guns and violence.

That's why I've advocated for better programming for children, the V-chip and zero tolerance for guns in schools.

(APPLAUSE)

Now I want to challenge the entertainment industry to establish a voluntary, uniform rating system for movies, TV programs and video games that parents can actually use to protect their children. That's why I want to be your senator.

(APPLAUSE)

When I listen to young people from Buffalo to Brooklyn talk about how a caring adult or an after-school program turned their lives around, I thought about all the children I had tutored and represented over the years who were very poor or victims of child abuse or caught up in the foster care system. I'm more committed than ever to helping these children, to giving them the child care and the pre-school, the summer school, after-school and mentoring programs they need. After all, they're all our children, and that's I want to be your senator.

(APPLAUSE)

For over 30 years in many different ways, I've seen first-hand the kinds of challenges New Yorkers face today. I care about the same issues you do. I understand them, and I know I can make progress on them. That's why, my friends, I want to be your senator.

(APPLAUSE)

My life's work has been motivated by fundamental beliefs that are at the heart of my decision to run. I believe every child counts and every child should have a chance. I believe raising children is every parent's most important job. I believe all parents must be responsible and be able to succeed at home and at work, and that no child should grow up in poverty in America in the 21st century.

I believe the solutions to our public problems ought to be based on core American values: community and opportunity, responsibility and enterprise. That means I support a balanced budget and more investments in education; welfare reform and better child care for working parents; tougher child support enforcement and second-chance homes for unwed mothers; more police on the beat and fewer guns on the street...

... better protection for the environment and steady economic progress.

I'm a New Democrat. I don't believe government is the source of all our problems or the solution to them. But I do believe that when people live up to their responsibilities, we ought to live up to ours, to help them build better lives. That's the basic bargain we owe one another in America today.

(APPLAUSE)

To fulfill that basic bargain for New York, I'll have to fight. Well, I've had some experience with that, too.

(LAUGHTER)

When I pushed for teacher testing and higher standards in the 1980s in the face of protests and boycotts, when I went to Beijing to speak out for women's rights as human rights...

(APPLAUSE)

... in the face of strong opposition to my trip, both here and there, when I tried to get affordable quality health care for all Americans against all the odds and the special interest groups...

(APPLAUSE)

... I won the first two battles. And as you may recall, I lost the last one. But instead of giving up, I learned to take a different approach. That's why I fought for the Children's Health Insurance Program, which already has insured two million children, with funding for three million more.

(APPLAUSE)

That's why I fought to make sure new mothers could at least stay overnight in the hospital and to protect workers from losing their insurance if they changed jobs.

That's why I'm still fighting for a real patient's bill of rights, and why I'll keep fighting until every American has access to health care.

(APPLAUSE)

If you'll put me to work for you, I'll take these values to the United States Senate and I'll fight my heart out for you every single day. I'll be on your side in the fight for higher standards, smaller classes and well-trained teachers in modern classrooms, so that our kids can learn what I call the six R's: not just reading, 'riting and 'rithmitic, but also responsibility, respect and results.

(APPLAUSE)

I'll be on your side in the fight for a fiscal plan that pays down the national debt, strengthens Social Security for at least 50 years, and modernizes Medicare with new prescription drug coverage.

(APPLAUSE)

I'll be on your side in the fight for targeted tax cuts to middle-income families to help with some of our biggest worries: deductions for college tuition, easing the marriage penalty and a tax credit for the care of aging or disabled family members.

(APPLAUSE)

I'll be on your side in the fight for a real increase for the minimum wage, an expanded Earned Income Tax Credit for working families, and equal pay for every woman in every job.

(APPLAUSE)

I'll be on your side in the fight for tough measures to prosecute hate crimes that tear at our social fabric...

(APPLAUSE)

... and to end discrimination against people simply because of their race, ethnicity, sexual orientation or religion.

(APPLAUSE)

I'll be on your side in the fight to keep guns out of the hands of criminals and away from children, for closing the gun-show loophole, requiring child safety locks and licensing all new handgun owners.

(APPLAUSE)

I'll be on your side in the fight to expand family and medical leave, which has already given 20 million Americans time off from work for a new baby or a sick parent.

(APPLAUSE)

I'll be on your side in the fight to protect the privacy of our medical, financial and personal records.

(APPLAUSE)

I'll be on your side in the fight to find smart new ways to help the least fortunate among us, including the homeless. It may be a hard thing to do, but it's the right thing to do.

(APPLAUSE)

I'll be on your side in the fight to bring prosperity to upstate New York and to still-distressed urban areas with new incentives to create jobs, start businesses, reduce air fares and lower utility costs.

I'll be on your side in the fight for a safer world, to pass the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty...

(APPLAUSE)

... to strengthen our defenses against biological, chemical and cyber-terrorism, to provide debt relief to the poorest countries in Africa, Latin America and Asia...

(APPLAUSE)

... and to work for peace from Northern Ireland to Bosnia and Kosovo, to Greece and Turkey, to India and Pakistan, and to a comprehensive peace in the Middle East which finally guarantees Israel's security.

(APPLAUSE)

And I'll be on your side in the fight for a fair share for New York. It is just wrong that today New York sends $15 billion more in taxes each year to Washington than New York gets back. That's a big reason that local property taxes are so high. We can change that, working together.

(APPLAUSE)

Now there are also things you can be sure I'll fight against.

I'll be on your side in the fight against school vouchers that drain taxpayer dollars from our public schools.

(APPLAUSE)

I'll be on your side in the fight against Republican efforts to undermine family planning or take away a woman's right to choose.

(APPLAUSE)

I'll be on your side in the fight against any tax cut so big it would take us back to the bad old days of exploding deficits and deep recessions, making it impossible for us to save Social Security and Medicare, fund our educational needs and pay down our national debt.

(APPLAUSE)

And there is one other thing I'll fight against: the divisive politics of revenge and retribution.

(APPLAUSE)

If you put me to work for you, I'll work to lift people up, not push them down.

You know, public service has been my life. It hasn't, as yet, included public office. Over the next nine months all of you will decide whether I've earned the privilege of serving you.

I want to thank those of you who have taken the time to visit with me during the last seven months as I've gone from county to county to hear what's on your minds.

I want to thank all of you who have written me or e-mailed me or visited my campaign web site, at hillary2000.org. I want to thank the nearly 600 families across New York who are hosting house parties this afternoon to help launch my campaign.

(APPLAUSE)

And I especially want to thank the nearly 25,000 New Yorkers who are attending those house parties this afternoon.

(APPLAUSE)

I want to thank the thousands of men and women already working as volunteers on my behalf. I want this to be a people's campaign, a grassroots campaign.

Now I know it's always going to be an easy campaign. But, hey, this is New York.

(APPLAUSE)

In the summer of 1998, I went on a bus trip as part of our White House millennial effort to honor the past and imagine the future.

I remember warm July afternoons when we drove through the beautiful New York countryside, from George Washington's Revolutionary War headquarters in Newburgh, to Harriet Tubman's home in Auburn, to the site of the first women's rights convention in Seneca Falls.

(APPLAUSE)

As I visited these places that captured the greatness of New York's past, I heard in the voices of parents and saw in the eyes of children, their dreams for New York's future.

New York has always been more than just a great state. To people all over the world, it represents the best of America.

(APPLAUSE)

It is the golden door, the gateway to opportunity. New York deserves a future worthy of that past.

New York defined what was possible in the 20th century, and New York can make what seems impossible today possible in the 21st century. And that's why I want to be your senator from New York.

Thank you all very much.

(APPLAUSE)

RANDALL: First lady Hillary Rodham Clinton now officially a Democratic candidate for the U.S. Senate from New York. Her bottom line in her announcement speech: I will fight for you, I will be on your side. This, of course, addressed to voters in that state. And she said, I will fight against, what she called, the divisive politics of revenge and retribution. It seemed a clear reference to the impeachment days, which so seriously clouded her husband's White House. All this happening today in Purchase, New York.

And our senior White House correspondent John King is there -- John.

KING: Gene, the celebration underway here now. Amazing to watch the president during his wife's announcement. Several times the president put his mouth and his face down in his hand as if he couldn't believe what he was seeing, shaking his head, also looking on quite proudly, though.

The first lady making it official she will be a candidate for the United States Senate, and in launching her campaign, the first lady directly addressed what many think is her biggest issue here, will she fight for the people of New York, or does she want this job to advance her own national interests. She was born in Illinois, educated in New England, spent most of her adult life in Arkansas, and now in Washington. But the first lady made clear she believes she is ready to fight for New York and the United States Senate.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

H. CLINTON: Now I know, some people are asking why I'm doing this here and now, and that's a fair question. Here is my answer and why I hope you'll put me to work for you. I may be new to the neighborhood, but I'm not new to your concerns. (END VIDEO CLIP)

KING: Those concerns the first lady said, education, health care reform, money to help clean up the environment, but also to keep the economy going. The first lady flatly declaring, "I'm a new Democrat." She has been regarded for years as the more liberal member of the Clinton partnership, but declaring today in a speech that very well could have been read by her husband that she would push ahead for a balanced budget, support welfare reform, she supports the death penalty as well, a more national message here.

Even as the first lady discussed specific concerns to New York, she delivered a very national Democratic message, mirroring her husband's recent State of the Union address, that in part because she and Mayor Rudy Giuliani, her Republican opponent, they both support abortion rights, they both support gay rights. To succeed her, many in here campaign think she needs to make the case that the Republicans already have a majority in the United States Senate and that the people of New York do not want to send another Republican senator to Washington -- Gene.

RANDALL: So, John, while the president's role was one of cheerleader today, he was very much a part of that speech, wasn't he?

KING: He certainly was. We're told that in private strategy meetings over the past week the president helped write the speech. Also, for months he has been participating in weekly meetings at the White House between the first lady's political staff and her White House staff.

The president's role so far largely behind the scenes, although he is helping her raise money. The big question is how active and how public will he be in the months ahead. Today we're told it was his personal decision to stay out of the limelight, let his wife step out in the shadow. She has supported him and stepped up for him in key moments throughout his career. This was her day. The president looking on quite proudly, shaking his head, though, as if in disbelief several occasions -- Gene.

RANDALL: All right. John, thanks very much. We'll come back and talk with Bill Schneider in just a moment, but first we will take a break.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

RANDALL: Today's major political development came in Purchase, New York, outside New York City. That is where the first lady, Hillary Rodham Clinton, announced formally she is a candidate, a Democratic candidate for the U.S. Senate from New York. Her probable opponent is the Republican mayor of New York City, Rudy Giuliani.

Our senior political analyst Bill Schneider. Bill, what struck you about the first lady's speech?

SCHNEIDER: Her explicit declaration that she's a new Democrat, very much in the mode of her husband and Al Gore. She said that she was for balanced budget, but also more for social programs, welfare reform and better child care. She actually came right out and said, "I am a new Democrat," and here's how she defined it.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

H. CLINTON: I'm a new Democrat. I don't believe government is the source of all our problems, or the solution to them. But I do believe that when people live up to their responsibilities, we ought to live up to ours, to help them build better lives. That's the basic bargain we owe one another in America today.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

RANDALL: Bill, Mrs. Clinton also tied herself very much to the prosperity, which she said was attributable, at least in part, to her husband's administration.

SCHNEIDER: That was also very striking, because of course, her husband's best thought of in New York and around the country as having been one of the architects of the new economy that he likes to talk about. So she wants to bring that to bear on the concerns and problems of New Yorkers, as she did in this particular passage.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

H. CLINTON: Now, I want to bring the prosperity of this new economy to all New Yorkers, from upstate towns and farms to inner-city neighborhoods. That's why I want to be your senator.

(APPLAUSE)

When I spoke with breast cancer survivors at a...

(END VIDEO CLIP)

RANDALL: Whoops. Technology. Bill, could Al Gore have written a speech as well?

SCHNEIDER: Well, he -- she used the word that he used to reinvent his campaign quite successfully. He won the New Hampshire primary by running on the word fight. And you heard her say fight, fight, fight, about a -- at least a dozen times by my count. She said she's had experience as a fighter on issues like family leave, and going abroad to Beijing and fighting for human rights, and fighting unsuccessfully for health care reform.

She also said she learned to take a different approach. She learned from her mistakes, a very important acknowledgement on her part. And she said she would fight against some of the things that are wrong in Washington. But this notion of being a fighter, that's at the heart of the Gore campaign, it revived his candidacy, and that is clearly going to be at the heart of her campaign. It's going to be at one -- it's going to be very much the same campaign that Al Gore is running as Democratic candidate for president.

RANDALL: And, Bill, finally, she was out to jump start this campaign today, wasn't she?

SCHNEIDER: Yes, she absolutely was. And what's interesting is, you know, on a lot of issues she agrees with Rudy Giuliani, or he agrees with her, abortion, gay rights, minimum wage, patients' bill of rights. But what she's going to do is say that she will fight the Republican Congress as much as Giuliani, because if you send a Republican to Washington, even if he's moderate and agrees with her on a lot of issues, he will be part of keeping that majority in power, and that's something that she's going to portray as threatening to New Yorkers.

RANDALL: Bill, thank you very much, and thank you to our senior White House correspondent, John King, in Purchase, New York.

I'm Gene Randall in Washington. Donna Kelley will have the rest of the day's news in a moment.

"CNN Larry King Live," CNN, 3/16/2000

LARRY KING, HOST: Tonight, first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton on adoption. She wants you to know there are thousands of kids who need it. Entertainer Marie Osmond joins us, one of four fabulous adoptive moms joining us in Los Angeles. With her is actress Donna Mills -- she has an adoptive daughter -- actress Valerie Harper -- got an adopted daughter, too -- actress-singer Nell Carter, two adopted sons, and in Columbus, Ohio, Dave Thomas, founder of Wendy's and founder of the Dave Thomas Foundation for Adoption. That and more next on LARRY KING LIVE.

Good evening. There are about 120,000 adoptions every year in the United States, but there are still tens of thousands of kids waiting to be part of a loving family. Hillary Rodham Clinton started working on children's issues long before she entered the White House, but she's made adoption a special priority as first lady, and it's in that role she joins us from New York. We'll save talk of her Senate run for an upcoming show.

Hillary, why adoption? You're not adopted. You didn't adopt Chelsea?

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON, FIRST LADY OF THE UNITED STATES: You know, Larry, I think it goes back to the work I did 30 years ago when I was in law school, and I decided that I really wanted to do everything possible to help children, and the most vulnerable of our children are children who are caught up in the foster care system, who are given up for adoption, who are abused and neglected. The very first case I did as a young law student was to work with a lawyer to try to help a foster mother adopt a young foster child, and in those days, back in 1970, oftentimes the decisions were made not on the best interests of the child, but who had the biggest house or the most material possessions. And we've come a long way in making adoption much more available and affordable for all people.

And I hope one of the messages of your show tonight is that we have 400,000 children in foster care. About a hundred thousand of those are available to be adopted. We have many children who are not in the foster care system, but who are given up for adoption, and we don't have enough permanent loving homes for those children, so anything we can do we ought to try.

KING: Why -- is it that most people who want to adopt want babies? They don't want to adopt the 4-year-old or 7-year-old in the foster home?

CLINTON: Well, I think that's part of it. But I also think that the system has not been as user-friendly as it needed to be. You know, starting back in '93 and '94, we began to try to change the laws at the national level, to try to begin to expedite decisions about whether a child would go back to the child's biological family or be freed for adoption, and we've done a lot of events at the White House. I know that Dave Thomas will be on with you, and he has been a terrific ally in our fight to change and really open up the adoption system.

And you know, one of the great joys that I have had in the years in the White House is seeing that magic happen when a young child is adopted and finds a permanent home. We have opened the White House time and time again. I remember, particularly, a young woman who had been in foster care for most of her life who was turning 13. All she wanted is what any child wants, which is a room of her own and a family of her own.

And so there are so many success stories that I hope everybody will be sharing and knowing that there are a lot of children out there waiting. We now provide more financial support through the federal government for people who adopt and tax credits. We provide support for people, especially, who adopt children with special needs, physical or emotional nature, so there's a lot of help out there.

KING: The late Bob Constantine, the writer, once wrote, "I have four children. Two are adopted. I forget which two."

CLINTON: Yes.

KING: Has society accepted this more?

CLINTON: I think so. And I know that as I travel around New York, I meet so many people who are products of the foster care system themselves, who are adopted, who are adoptive parents.

You know, I was just yesterday at Central High School out on Long Island, and I was having a town hall meeting at the high school about education. We talked about everything -- you know, overcrowding, and qualified teachers and the kinds of courses kids have to take, and then a young man stood up, and he said he was in the foster care system, and he wanted to know what would happen to him when he graduated from high school, and I was so pleased I could tell him that we changed the law last session of Congress. It was a bipartisan effort, so that we could continue to provide support services.

You know, it used to be, Larry, that when a child aged out of foster care, either on his 18th birthday or when he graduated from high school, whichever came first, there would be literally a knock on the door of his foster home or his group home, and there would be somebody standing there with a big old black garbage bag, and the kid would be told to put his belongings in it because he was moving. Well, we've now changed that, and I want to thank people on both sides of the aisle. You know, we have brought together some unlikely allies. I worked with the late John Chafee, a wonderful man who was very devoted to kids, and in the House, I worked with Tom DeLay, who doesn't have the same views on a lot of things I do, but cares about foster kids and adoption. So I think there's a growing public awareness and acceptance, and there is now more support for people willing to adopt. And I really hope that we can increase the number of children adopted. We set a goal. We're trying to reach that goal, of doubling and then tripling the number of children adopted out of our American public system by the year 2002.

KING: One other thing, Hillary, do minorities have a tougher time being adopted?

HILLARY: Well, you know, it's interesting, because there are a lot of informal adoptions in the minority communities, particularly African-Americans, who have always taken in children of cousins, or grandchildren or people in some kinship relationship. I would like to see us do more to support that kind of guardianship and custody arrangement rather than having a child be put into the foster care system. If we can keep that child in some system of relatives or kinship, I think it would be better.

And the other point I wanted to make is that yesterday, after this young man stood up at the high school, another young man stood up and said that his mother had been a foster mother for years, and it got so difficult, and the kind of compensation available was so inadequate for what is truly a 24-hour-a-day job, being a mother. I'd like to see us give more respect to the people who do a good job of fostering children, as well as helping more people understand what adoption could mean in their lives as well.

KING: Thanks, Hillary. Thanks so much. I'll send your best to the rest of the panel as they join us.

HILLARY: Thank you. Thank you so much, Larry.

KING: I'll see a lot of you on the trail.

HILLARY: I'll look forward to it.

KING: Hillary Clinton, the first lady of the United States.

NEWS BRIEFING ON MEDICATING CHILDREN WITH EMOTIONAL AND BEHAVIORAL PROBLEMS, 3/20/2000

LOCATION: WASHINGTON, D.C.

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON DELIVERS REMARKS ON MEDICATING CHILDREN WITH EMOTIONAL AND BEHAVIORAL CONDITIONS

MARCH 20, 2000

CLINTON: Thank you all for joining us here this morning and I want to thank Secretary Shalala for her leadership and I'm also pleased she refuses to sit still...

... because whenever our children's health is at stake, she's out there, working very hard to make sure that we all pay attention.

I also am pleased to be joined not only by Secretary Shalala but by Surgeon General David Satcher and FDA Director Jane Haney and NIMH commissioner Dr. Steve Himan (ph), and Dr. Judith Human (ph), representatives from many of the groups who are on the front-lines working on behalf of all of our children and particularly children with behavioral and emotional challenges.

We just came from a meeting where we talked about what more we can do to ensure that children with emotional and behavioral problems get the diagnosis and treatment they need and when they need it.

CLINTON: Today's meeting and the announcements around it are important steps, but they're certainly not the last step that we need to take in meeting the goal of ensuring that all of our children get the help, and support and treatment that they deserve.

You know, when a child comes to us who is hurt or sick, there is nothing more terrifying for any of us, especially parents, when we don't know how to make it better. If they have a broken arm, we want to fix it. If they have a deadly disease, we want to do everything we possibly can to cure it. And it's no different if the problem they bring to lies in their head or their heart.

CLINTON: Thanks in large part to the leadership of Tipper Gore, the president's mental health adviser, we've come a long way in our battle to bring mental illness out of the shadows and make sure it is treated just as seriously as physical illness. More and more often, those treatments include drugs, and even for young children. And that is the issue we are here today to discuss.

As many of you know, the Journal of the American Medical Association recently reported that the number of preschools who are taking psychotropic drugs increased dramatically from 1991 to 1995. We know that the increase for Ritalin alone was 150 percent, and the use of antidepressants increased over 200 percent.

Now I am no doctor, as is obvious, but I am a parent and I have been a long time children's advocate, and these findings concern me. And I know that they concern Dr. Hime (ph) and Secretary Shalala, and countless other experts.

But let me be very clear, we are not here to bash the use of these medications. They have literally been a God-send for countless adults and young people with behavioral and emotional problems. We know that when children with such problems are left untreated, they may fail to reach their full God-given potential later in their lives.

CLINTON: That's we are here. We want the best information for every parent, every doctor, every teacher, every single person who cares for our children.

But we do have to ask some serious questions about the use of prescription drugs in all children. We have to ask, for example, how are we diagnosing, treating and caring for children with behavioral and emotional conditions. Do we have the best tools to make the most accurate diagnoses?

When it comes to drug treatments for children, why are we seeing such great variations by community and race? And what effects do over-use and under-use of these medications have on our children?

We need to ask also: Why aren't we doing a better job of combining drugs when necessary with family therapy and other behavior modifications? And what about the effects on our very youngest children who haven't been tested for these prescription drugs and whose brains are in their most critical stage of development?

These are tough questions, and none of us have all the answers.

But as we made clear in the meeting this morning, we are building on a record, not starting from scratch. We have already taken critical steps over the past few years to ensure that drugs are being tested and labeled specifically for children. Some of you may remember, that was a long, drawn-out struggle that we were finally able to make progress and were able to make an announcement here at the White House last year.

In so doing, we have learned that finding the right prescription for a child is not always just a matter of decreasing the dosage.

You know, I think it's important that all of us as adults recognize that children are not just miniature adults, that their systems, their developmental needs, are different from that of an adult.

CLINTON: We also learned quite a bit from the first-ever surgeon general's report on mental illness, which came out in December; it grew out of the White House conference on mental illness lead by Tipper Gore. And it taught us that the stigma of mental illness is often worse for children; that too many health care professionals lack training in the area of children's mental, emotional, and behavioral needs; and that we have a long way to go to increase awareness about children's mental health.

So clearly we must do more. We know the questions being raised are very difficult, and they cannot be answered overnight. And they certainly won't be answered by the government or health care professionals or educators or parents acting alone. Every single person with a stake in our children's health has an important role to play.

So I'm very pleased today to announce some of the immediate steps we are taking to make sure that children with mental illness, with emotional and behavioral problems, get the right care at the right time.

As our meeting made clear, we already know a lot about the proper diagnosis and treatment of emotional and behavioral problems in children. But that critical information has not reached many of the people who need it most: Many of the parents, many of the teachers, many of the school nurses, many of the school's social workers, many of the family physicians, many of the pediatricians. So there are a few things that we're going to do to try to change that.

Today the NIMH is releasing a new easy to understand fact sheet that parents can use to make the right decisions about their children's treatment for these conditions. The Education Department will soon release a information kit to help parents and teachers better care for children with ADHD. And I want to thank both the American Academy of Pediatrics and the American Academy of Family Physicians for all they are doing on this issue.

This spring and fall, the American Academy of Pediatrics will give all of their 55,000 members up-to-date guidelines for diagnosing and treating children with emotional and behavioral problems.

CLINTON: And as part of their year-long focus on mental health, the American Academy of Family Physicians is sponsoring continuing education courses about these conditions for their 90,000 members.

But now we also have to admit, honestly, that there are some areas where we still just don't know enough. And that's especially true when it comes to giving prescription drugs to our very youngest children. I am pleased that NIMH will dedicate over $5 million to conduct a landmark study examining ADHD and Ritalin use in pre- schoolers.

This study will look at the gap between what we are finding out in the science labs and what is happening in clinical practice so we can ensure that our children get the care they need.

In addition, the FDA will look at some common psychotropic drugs and begin a process to find out what dosage levels are appropriate for very young children. This information will then be included on the labels of these medications. And the studies on them will address the obvious ethical issues that arise when you examine the use of prescription drugs in such a vulnerable group.

Finally, I am delighted that this fall the office of the surgeon general will coordinate a national conference for the treatment of children with behavioral and mental disorders. It will bring together experts from the administration, parents, advocates, educators, researchers, health care professionals and consumers.

It will look at the challenges we are all still facing in caring for children with mental illnesses. And it will help us develop long- term strategies that each of us can use to help young people get the childhoods and chance in life they all deserve.

I remember, as we were talking today, that I was fortunate more than 30 years ago to work at the Yale Child Study Center, one of the premiere research institutions in our country when it comes to treating young children.

And I was exposed to some of the greatest minds and experts in the country about how to treat very young children.

CLINTON: And there is nothing more challenging and in many ways heartbreaking than a preschooler with obvious mental, emotional and behavioral problems. That child cannot Speak for him or herself. It's often difficult to find out what kind of conditions in the child's life led to -- if there was a cause and effect -- the kind of behavior that is being observed.

So I know firsthand from 30 years of work on my own behalf, and watching experts who really are on the front-lines of this, that this is a very big challenge we're taking on today.

But I'm also concerned that we are seeing increasing numbers of children who are both being diagnosed with certain disorders and whose behaviors are crying out for helpful intervention.

We spoke earlier today in our meeting about the increasing number of very young children in foster care. The fastest growing group of children being put into foster care are children under five. They come into foster care because of abuse or neglect and they therefore have more than the kinds of problems that one would expect in the population at large.

We talked about the increasing numbers of children who are in the juvenile justice and criminal justice systems. We are not doing what we need to do to help intervene and treat those children, just as we are not providing adequate medical and mental health services in our adult prisons.

These are problems that affect all of society, not just the individual with the specific problem or that individual's family or those teachers and others who come into contact with that young person. This has ramifications for all of us.

All we need to do is look back a few weeks and think about the 6-year-old who brought the gun to school to kill the other 6-year-old. That is a problem that did not just occur on the morning that child picked that gun up off that bed in that terrible condition in which he was living.

So all of us have a stake in the research, the diagnosis and the treatment.

CLINTON: And I would also add that we need some other people at the table, and we're going to try to do that through Dr. Satcher's efforts and the efforts of the associations represented here.

We need to be sure that the insurance industry, the HMO industry, the pharmaceutical industry, as well as decision-makers at all levels of government, are also at the table.

We do have a lot of information about what works. We need more, and that's what this meeting and these announcements are about. But we should at least be trying to implement what we do know works while we look for more answers and follow up on the efforts that will be underway.

You know, when a child is sad or misbehaving, it is never easy for even the most well-intentioned, best-meaning parent to figure out what is happening. Anyone who's ever had a child who is pre-verbal with any kind of illness or a toddler or a preschooler knows how difficult it is.

Some of these young people have problems that are symptoms of nothing more than childhood or adolescence. Some of them need a parent to love them or persons simply to listen to them talk about their pain.

And yet some do have severe emotional and behavioral problems that can be greatly helped by prescription drugs. These children are waiting for our help, every one of them, and today we are taking important steps to provide it.

It is my great hope that this meeting will move us closer to the day when we are able, number one, to remove the stigma from these problems so that no parent or no community has to wonder whether this is something that should be talked about or help should be sought for; and number two, that we will treat the problems of the body and the mind the very same.

So I hope that all of us will see this as a beginning and that we will be even more committed to doing whatever it takes to make sure that all of our children get the help, support and love that they need to have.

Thank you all very much.

(APPLAUSE)

(CROSSTALK)

CLINTON: Thank you all. Thank you so much.

QUESTION: Mrs. Clinton, you mentioned the six-year-old child -- that the NRA for the second time in a week has accused the president's policy of being responsible for a death. What's your response to that?

CLINTON: Today I want to talk about what we can do positively. And I think that the worse that can come out of this meeting could be a very good deterrence and prevention strategy to avoid problems that are very complex. But certainly, the easy, ready access to guns makes emotional and behavioral problems, that might have been fought on a playground or been manifest by verbal arguments, much more deadly and dangerous. And everyone, everyone, has an obligation to do anything we can to keep our children safe.

Thanks very much.

DNC Dinner, 4/24/2000

REMARKS BY PRESIDENT CLINTON, VICE PRESIDENT GORE, FIRST LADY HILLARY CLINTON AND TIPPER GORE AT DNC DINNER

LOCATION: NEW YORK SHERATON HOTEL, NEW YORK, NEW YORK TIME: 8:53 P.M.

MRS. GORE: Thank you, all. Hello, everybody. Please be seated. I want to thank you for that very warm welcome, Mayor Rendell, and for your very spirited and dedicated and strong leadership that's so effective for our Party. I know all of us appreciate that, the time and the commitment that you give to us.

And what a great night for the Democratic Party. What a great night. It's fantastic. (Applause.) I am proud to be sharing the stage, too, with one of our Party's greatest Presidents ever and two of its very finest candidates. What a pleasure for me. It's fantastic. (Applause.)

I also see so many friends in the room, and I want to thank each and every one of you for being such very good friends to Al and to me. And I think all of us here recognize that this election is going to be very tough and it's going to be very important in our nation's history. And it's going to determine the kind of nation that we are going to leave to our children and to our grandchildren.

And I know that you would agree with me that it's one of the great reasons why it's important for us to remind our neighbors and friends and other people who are interested that politics is personal, and that it really does matter who we all elect to the State House and to the White House, and it's going to make a very real difference in each of our houses.

And I think that's a message that all of us are very determined to take to other people, and to continue to open the doors in the Democratic Party to all those who share that vision and those values. And we have to remind people that it is the Democratic Party, truly, that is the party of the people, that makes the government work for the people. That's the value, the core value of our party and that's a key distinction, and I know it's one that we're all very proud of.

And now it is my great pleasure to introduce to you a woman who embodies all the very best values in the Democratic Party. We know her as someone who works absolutely tirelessly to open the doors of opportunity to women here in America and, in fact, all around the world. And she knows how to turn her rock-solid values into a commitment that can serve people in their everyday lives. And she knows, as well, how to achieve results.

She is a very dedicated and a very determined leader, and I am proud to welcome her as a close, personal friend and someone who I know that all of you are proud of as our great First Lady and a wonderful candidate for the Senate.

Ladies and gentlemen, my friend, Hillary Rodham Clinton. (Applause.)

MRS. CLINTON: Well, thank you all. And thank you, Tipper. I'm delighted that all four of us -- Tipper and Bill and Al and I -- could be here to be part of this very successful event for the DNC in the Empire State, where we have so many people who have demonstrated their commitment to the Democratic Party, and to its principles. And I'm delighted to be here to thank all of you for your support over the last seven, eight years now, and thank you for your continuing commitment and support.

You know, I know Tipper so well, and am so proud of her, and I can only echo what Ed Rendell said. And that is that she's going to be a superb person in the White House to carry on so many of the important issues that she has championed her entire life. From homelessness -- (applause) -- from her advocacy on behalf of the homeless, the children, to those with mental illness, who deserve to be treated the same as a person with any kind of illness, and she sends a brave and courageous voice for that position. (Applause.)

I want to thank Ed for his leadership of the party. He's done a fabulous job. (Applause.) And he's one of my favorite mayors, and I'm so grateful for the leadership that he has demonstrated in the position that he formerly held.

And I want to thank Tony Bennett for coming and entertaining us as well this evening. (Applause.)

This is a very special night for all of us, because Bill and I have been a little bit nostalgic today. We did the last Easter Egg Roll on the White House Lawn, and that's the eighth and last one for us. And we spent some time sort of thinking about everything that has happened since 1992. And one of the greatest gifts that we've had is the friendship and relationship with Al and Tipper Gore.

And it was a relationship that began when Bill asked Al to join the ticket and the four of us first met together. And I can remember some of those early times when we were getting to know each other, on a bus trip that took us throughout so many of the states that we were campaigning in with such joy and excitement about the future.

And I think all of us made those speeches in 1992, standing on flatbed trucks and in the doorway of a bus or in front of a building somewhere, in a field with a farmer. And we kept saying -- and Bill and Al said over and over again, we can turn this country around, we can demonstrate what it means to lead again; America can assume its position of prominence in the economy and the political and military leadership of the world, we just have to make some tough choices.

Many of you took that position that Bill and Al embodied, which was really the new Democratic Party, you took it on faith. You knew that we had to make some serious changes. You had seen the deficits building, you had seen how they squeezed out private capital, you saw our social conditions deteriorating. And you said, no, we're going to make a change. And New York was such a great, supportive state for the policies that the Clinton-Gore administration proposed.

Now, we can look back and say that that investment you made in 1992 -- and then you even upped your investment in 1996, because New York gave the greatest margin of victory to the Clinton-Gore ticket. That investment was one of the best investments that New York and New Yorkers and America has ever made. Because we are today -- (applause) we are today a stronger and better country than we were in 1992 -- (applause) --and I know that all of us in this room recognize it would not have been possible without the leadership and the tough decisions that were made from the very top by the President and the Vice President. I'm very proud of the record of this administration; and the results speak for themselves.

And many of you have been not only stalwart supporters, but you've been missionaries, in effect, talking to friends and neighbors and colleagues about what it now means to be a Democrat -- a Democrat who believes in balanced budgets, a Democrat who believes in using the surplus to pay down the national debt, a Democrat who believes in providing the tools that are needed to mayors and governors and others to bring down the crime and welfare rates. A Democrat who understands that we have to remain committed to public education, that we have to continue to work for the day when every child has access to a first- class public education in this state and throughout our country. (Applause.)

You know how important it is that we continue to work toward the day when we do provide quality, affordable health care to every New Yorker and every American. (Applause.) You know what the positive agenda of this Democratic administration has been. You have supported it. You have spoken out for it. You have contributed to the DNC and to the Democratic campaign, so that this message could get out and the work could be done.

Because now we no longer have to ask you to take it on faith. You've seen the evidence, you know what the results of these kinds of policies are, and how critical it is that we elect Democrats -- starting with Al Gore, but going right through the House and the Senate. If we are able to take back the House and the Senate, we can continue the policies that have worked so well for America. (Applause.) Now, with so many Democratic New Yorkers in the House, I just have to say one special word about how important it is that we elect a Democrat to succeed Daniel Patrick Moynihan in the United States Senate. (Applause.) And just remember these three brief reasons why it's important we do that.

Number one, we do not need any more Republicans in the United States Senate, we have too many as it is. (Applause.) They have stood in the way of the progress that has been made and we have to continue to stand up to them and their agenda, that would be so counterproductive and send us in a u-turn back to the 1980s, with exploding deficits and disinvestment.

Number two, there are very big differences between Republicans and Democrats in this state and elsewhere. If we want to continue the fiscal policies that have worked, we need a Democrat in the Senate. If we want to support public education, we need a Democrat in the Senate. If we want to guarantee a woman's right to choose, we need a Democrat in the Senate. (Applause.)

And you all know that in order to get anything done in the Senate, it takes teamwork. It takes people who are willing to work together to get something accomplished for their state and the people they represent. And if you go to the Senate and you disagree with a fellow senator -- you can ask the Vice President, he was there working so hard and effectively for all those years -- you can't sue or fire your colleague, you have to get along with them and keep working with them to get things done for the people you represent. (Applause.)

So there are many reasons why we should celebrate tonight. But we cannot rest until we make sure that we put Al Gore in the White House, we do everything we can to put Democrats in the majority in the House and in the Senate.

Now, none of this would be possible this evening, we could not have raised the money that's been raised, the report that Ed gave about how well we're doing, if this administration had not kept faith with you, had not demonstrated how worthy your investment in Bill Clinton and Al Gore was.

And none of that would have been possible if we hadn't elected someone to be President who understood where the country needed to go, who had the commitment to making the tough political decisions that would really make it possible for us to be enjoying and celebrating this moment, and I am very proud that this administration has such a record of accomplishment.

And it's my great honor, and personal privilege, to introduce the person who really has made it all possible, the President of the United States, Bill Clinton. (Applause.)

WOLF BLITZER, HOST: She's the first lady of the United States.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK SENATE CANDIDATE: We do not need anymore Republicans in the United States Senate. We have too many as it is.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: He's the mayor of New York City.

MAYOR RUDY GIULIANI (R), NEW YORK: I think I've turned the city in the direction that you agree with, and I'm going to be doing that same thing for the state of New York.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Short of a presidential race, their battle for the United States Senate may be the most watched political contest in U.S. history.

Tonight, the first nationally televised town meeting of the New York Senate race: Hillary Rodham Clinton faces the voters of New York.

ANNOUNCER: Live from the University of Buffalo, "The New York Senate Race: A LATE EDITION Town Meeting." Now, here's CNN's Wolf Blitzer.

BLITZER: Good evening and welcome to this town meeting, sponsored by CNN and the University of Buffalo.

We're here in the Katharine Cornell Theater on the university campus. This is the first of two town meeting we're planning in New York. Republican candidate Rudy Giuliani has agreed to participate in a similar meeting down the road.

Our audience tonight is made up of students, faculty and staff members of the university, as well as other residents of the greater Buffalo area. All are registered New York state voters.

Ms. Clinton, welcome to my alma mater and my hometown of Buffalo, New York.

CLINTON: I'm glad to be here with you.

BLITZER: We're very excited that you're here.

Mrs. Clinton, I'm going to open the meeting up to questions from the floor in a second, but let me ask you a few questions directly.

A lot of New Yorkers are still not convinced that you are a New Yorker. Many of them still see you as someone who is coming in from the outside -- a carpetbagger, if you will -- someone who really is primarily seeking to advance your own personal agenda, political ambitions.

What makes you -- how can you convince New Yorkers that you really are one of them?

CLINTON: Well, you know, Wolf, for more than 30 years I've worked on issues concerning children and families and trying to improve education and expand health care, and those are the concerns of my lifetime. And as I've visited with now thousands of New Yorkers, those are the concerns that people talk to me about. And I'd like to take those concerns and the work that I've done and the passion I feel about them to the Senate and work on behalf of the children and families of New York.

To me, it's a commitment to continue a life's work and to put it to work for people who I think are concerned about the same matters that most of us worry about: the kind of futures we're going to have, especially for our children.

BLITZER: And if you don't win this race, will you stay in New York state?

CLINTON: Oh, absolutely. You know, I had planned on living in New York after the White House years. Bill and I talked about that, because for me it's always been something that I've wanted to do.

Now, I didn't think I'd be running for the Senate when I first started thinking about it. But when I was invited to consider it and when I talked to so many New Yorkers and really thought that if New Yorkers wanted me to, I would work my heart out for them, and I intend to make this my home.

BLITZER: Let's talk a little bit about an issue that is in the news right now, the Elian Gonzalez case. You've always been an advocate of children, yet this child -- and a lot of Cuban-Americans firmly believe this in their heart and many other Americans believe it as well -- this child if forced to go back to Cuba, this 6-year-old, will forever be a pawn, if you will, of Fidel Castro, a propaganda tool, sit on Fidel Castro's lap. He will never have a normal life in Cuba.

Is this what you want for this little boy?

CLINTON: Well, you know, Wolf, I have ever since I was in law school been a children's advocate. I have represented children. I've worked on behalf of child abuse and neglect cases, and tried to reform the foster care and adoption systems. And I approach this primarily as a mother and as a child advocate, and I try to keep my thoughts on what is best for this little boy.

And I know these are very tough issues for a lot of people to think about. I don't have any liking for Fidel Castro or for the Cuban government. I deplore their denial of human rights and the mistreatment of so many people who have fled in order to find freedom in our country.

But on the balance, I think this child belongs with his remaining parent. I think that that is what is in his best interests. And I hope that this reunited family can really work to make sure that he overcomes the trauma of losing his mother, the incredible media circus that he's been part of for the last five months, the political exploitation he's been subjected to by people on all sides of the political spectrum.

I think he deserves the chance to be with his father, and I hope that, you know, we can make the right decision for him as expeditiously as possible.

BLITZER: Would it be appropriate for you, for the president to encourage Juan Miguel Gonzalez, his father, to remain in the United States with Elian?

CLINTON: Well, of course, I think that that's his decision to make. I believe if he were to express such an interest, he's got lawyers and others who represent him who meet with him. Certainly, if that were to come to the attention, I know that people would be more than happy to accommodate that.

But I think that we have to let it be his decision. And I hope that this taste of freedom and the opportunity to be with his son and to have this time perhaps would lead to that. But at the end of the day, this has to be the father's decision, just as we would want it to be your decision, you know, if heaven forbid, something, you know, were to happen and you had been in some way deprived of your child.

And I just think we have to respect the family bonds and we have to do more than give lip service to family values. We have to value families even if those families may live under a regime that we don't value. We have to keep that family bond first and foremost, because I think that's what's in the best interests of most children.

BLITZER: I'm going to a question from the audience in a moment, but on the tactics that were used, the heavily armed force that went in Saturday morning to seize Elian -- we've all seen that very dramatic picture, Elian in the closet -- he looks terrorized by what is going on. Can you condone that kind of tactic?

CLINTON: Well, I think everyone would agree that it was unfortunate that that kind of activity had to take place, but I understand the concern and frustration of the Justice Department and the attorney general when faced with continuing recalcitrance and opposition to obeying the rule of law, to turning the boy over to the custody of his father, especially when there were court orders and an agreement that they would not leave the country. So it was, I think, on everyone's mind regrettable, but I understand the necessity for it.

You know, at a certain point the rule of law and the rights of a parent to his natural child, who is not in any way proven unfit, have to be respected. So of course, we wish that it hadn't have happened. We wish that the relatives in Miami had cooperated and turned the boy over voluntarily.

BLITZER: All right. Let's take a question from the audience. Please mention your name and your home town.

QUESTION: My name is Jill (UNINTELLIGIBLE). I grew up in Buffalo, New York.

I'm concerned about the fact that young people feel they need to leave Western New York in order to find good jobs, and I was wondering if you might have some ideas about how to reverse that trend.

CLINTON: I'm concerned about that too, and I have given a lot of thought to it and I've talked with so many people here in Western New York, and I have some ideas about it, because I think that we have to look at the obstacles to economic growth here in upstate New York, particularly in Western New York, and we have to attack those obstacles. And then we also have to look at the opportunities.

And let me start with the obstacles, because there are reasons why we haven't been able to keep and attract businesses and grow the economy here the way that we should. We have a very high rate of state and local taxes. You know, the state and local tax burden on those of us who live in New York is the second-highest in the entire country. We have among the highest utility and power costs in the entire country.

I've been in businesses here in Western New York, in manufacturing facilities as well as other businesses, that have told me that they could move across the state line to Ohio or Pennsylvania and cut their utility costs by a third to a half.

And we also do not have adequate transportation, either road transportation, or airfares are too high, so we don't have adequate airport transportation. So those are some of the obstacles that I would like to work on.

Now I can't directory as a senator deal with the high state and local taxation, but as a citizen I'm concerned about it. But as a senator, I would fight to make sure that New York got its fair share of federal dollars, which would us bring more money back to the state, which now sends $15 billion more to Washington than we get back, in order to lower those taxes.

And I would also fight very hard to make sure when we deregulate electricity, which is working its way thought the Congress, it's done in a way that does not disadvantage Western New York. And I would also work to make sure that we have better transportation, whether it's, you know, 219 I-86, some the routes that are important for moving goods and services.

But I think there are also opportunities...

BLITZER: Mrs. Clinton, if I could interrupt for a second, because we don't have a whole lot of time. But one issue that you would be able to deal with if you were a United States senator, federal taxes.

CLINTON: Right.

BLITZER: Your opponent, Rudy Giuliani, the Republicans by and large want to cut back, want to reduce federal taxes across the board by a lot more. Now, during a time of affluence, when the economy is strong right now, why not give the American people, the people of

New York state, people here in Western New York more of their money that they give to Washington? Why not reduce significantly the tax burden at this point?

CLINTON: Well, I favor middle class targeted tax cuts. I favor easing the marriage penalty. I think we should promote marriage, not penalize it. I favor making college tuition tax deductible so that more families can afford to send their children to a wonderful university like this. I favor long-term tax credit for care that people give to their loved ones who they take in and care for in their homes.

So I think that we can afford the kind of middle class targeted tax cuts that would make a difference. But I do not believe it is in our interests as a country to go back to the days of exploding deficits with the kind of very large, across-the-board tax cuts that my opponent and the presidential candidate on the Republican side advocate.

I would rather see us continue the policy of fiscal discipline and responsibility that brought us to this point, and to use the surpluses that we have built up to do several things: to deal with Social Security and to pay down the debt, to add a prescription drug benefit to Medicare, to provide the middle class targeted tax cuts, which we can afford, to expand coverage for health care for people. And I would take the entire Social Security surplus, and to use it to pay down the national debt, and to reform and modernize and strengthen Social Security, to extend its lifetime. And I would take the non- Social Security surplus and use about 40 percent of it to similarly pay down the debt, and the remainder to put that prescription drug benefit on Medicare, do the targeted tax cuts, and do some of the other investments we need.

I think that's a stronger policy for the future, and that's what I would support.

BLITZER: Hillary Clinton, sounding very much on the tax cut issue like Bill Clinton, but on some other issues you don't necessarily agree. But we will have a chance to do a lot more. Our LATE EDITION town meeting from the University of Buffalo will be right back.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Welcome back to our special LATE EDITION town meeting from the University of Buffalo with the U.S. Senate candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Let's take a question from the audience. Go ahead please.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE) in New York. Mrs. Clinton, if you're elected senator, can you promise the New York voters that you will not run for presidency in 2004?

CLINTON: Yes.

(LAUGHTER)

Yes, and I have said that I want to be the very best senator I can be. You know, I have a lot of plans that I'd like to work on with people throughout the state. I do have an economic plan that I particularly want to work on that would, I hope, help bring the new technology economy here, because as a student here you know that this university is one of the most wired universities in the entire country. And yet the city of Buffalo is one of the least Internet- connected cities of our big cities, so that a lot of the graduates from the university have to go elsewhere to get the jobs that really they're equipped to take.

So I'd like to work as hard as I can over the next six years as senator to really make sure that we get the new economy, and we get the right mix of jobs and skills, that we provide federal financing to expand broadband access, and we make it possible to ensure that we've got technology expertise available to businesses so that we really do create jobs here that you and your classmates can take to stay right here. And that's going to be a big effort that I'm going undertake, and that is going to be my primary focus: the economy when I'm a senator.

BLITZER: And so you're making a firm commitment that even if there's a Republican president in the White House in 2004 that there is no circumstance whatsoever, under any circumstance, would you not serve...

... would you not serve your six-year term as senator?

CLINTON: I am going to serve my six-year term as senator. I owe it to the people of New York. I'm working hard to earn the trust and the votes of New Yorkers. And I want to help make things in the state. That's really what motivates me.

You know, I've been involved in public service for more than 30 years. I've never run for office before. But what I'd like to do is to bring people together to solve problems.

And I know that the upstate economy and the economy in Western New York, that we can make the changes together, the public and private sector, everybody working to do what needs to be done. I've seen that. When I was here on February 7th, I met three young graduates of this university who started a dot.com company. And they went from their three selves to employing about 65 people.

They had $60,000-a-year jobs they couldn't fill because we don't have the emphasis on matching the skills with the jobs, and keeping people who graduate from this university and others here. I want to be somebody who helps make that happen.

BLITZER: All right. Let's take another question from the audience.

QUESTION: Good evening, Mrs. Clinton. I'm Judge Frank Caruso (ph) from the town of Tonawanda, and my question is, with the number of school shootings that have happening across the country, and most recently the shooting at the National Zoo, how would you address the issue of teen violence in our country?

CLINTON: Well, judge, I think there are several things we have to do, and I hear from parents and students all over the state about their fears and concerns about gun violence. And you know, it's really well-placed, because we lose about 13 children a day to gun violence, accidental or deliberate.

I think we have to do more to keep guns out of the hands of children and criminals and people who are unable to exercise responsibility. That's why I support the sensible gun safety measures that have been before the Congress now, but the Republican leadership will not take them up.

I think we can have sensible gun safety measures without infringing on the rights of, you know, responsible citizens, and I think we have to do more to do the background checks, and to license and register those handguns so that we try to get hold of them.

I also think we should have a national buyback program to try to sweep up as many guns as we possibly can.

But I don't think that guns are the only reason that we've got more violence in our country than most other civilized societies do anywhere in the world.

Certainly, the access to guns turns, you know, what used to be arguments on the playground sometimes into deadly gun fights, and that is a real problem for us. But I also think we have to look hard at whether we are providing the kinds of support and services that children who are depressed or who have other kinds of emotional or behavioral problems need. We're not taking seriously enough some of the cries for help and attention that kids give. If you look at some of the school shooters, they said things that should have been a big light flashing for all of us. They said that they wanted to kill somebody, they wanted to kill themselves. We as parents, as teachers, as judges, as police officers, we have to be very alert and we have to have more services to try to intervene and prevent a child's problems from becoming violent. I also think that we have to do more to provide family support and good values. You know, a family is a child's first school, a child's first teachers are the parents, and we have to help our children learn how to control themselves and to empathize with one another. That should start in the home, but I think there are some programs that I've seen in schools around the state that would work also, having conflict resolution and mediation to try to help youngsters deal with their problems besides resorting to violence.

And finally, I just think that parents have to exercise a lot of parental authority over the kinds of media that their children watch at young ages. I just don't think that it's good for our children to see so much violence as a steady diet, and every time I say this it's inevitable that, you know, somebody about the age of my daughter says, well, you know, I play those games, I watch those movies, I don't do anything. I say, yes, but, you know, there are many children who are vulnerable to that. We don't know all the reasons why some are vulnerable. It might be genetic or temperamental or family break-up, whatever it might be.

So we have to try to play the odds and more parents and adults have to try to provide alternatives to children besides the steady diet of violence. So there are many things we should work on, all of which I would try to work on in the Senate.

BLITZER: All right, Mrs. Clinton, let's take another question. On that gun issue, though, let me just point out one thing, when it comes to gun control you and Rudy Giuliani don't really disagree, he supports significant gun control, too.

CLINTON: Yes.

BLITZER: There isn't a whole lot of space like that.

CLINTON: There -- that is right.

BLITZER: OK, let's take another question.

QUESTION: Hi, my name is Rob Grilo (ph). I was wondering why would you make more gun laws if the ones we have now aren't being enforced?

CLINTON: Well, you know, we have increased enforcement by, I think, about 30 percent, but we have to do more and we have to do better. And I agree that we have to do everything within our power to enforce those gun laws and to send a very clear signal to anyone that committing a crime with a gun is going to carry a heavier penalty.

I would support putting more resources into our federal system so that we can hire more assistant U.S. attorneys in order to be able to prosecute at the federal level as many gun cases as we can, and I really applaud the efforts to work that are starting out here in Buffalo so that we've got even better cooperation between the federal authorities and the state and local and state authorities. So I agree, we've increased it, but it needs to be even more than it is.

BLITZER: All right, let's take another question, please, go ahead.

QUESTION: My name is Aaron Libere (ph) from New York City. How do you feel about the police situation in New York City and what do you think needs to be done to change that?

CLINTON: Well, I have spoken out about this, and I am very troubled and concerned about recent events because I -- you know, I am a very strong supporter of law enforcement. For the last, I guess, 17 or so years I have basically lived with a lot of professional law enforcement officers who have been assigned to my husband and myself.

I've had a lot of experience with local and state police officers here in New York who have been exceptionally helpful to me, and I think it's a very tough job that we have to respect those who carry it out. What I regret is that in New York City we've seen a false choice being posed to people. I don't think we should have to choose between effective policing and mutual respect between our police and our communities.

Therefore, I believe we have to do more to support our police and to make it clear that they have a job to do that we want them to do, but we also have to provide more and better training. We have to provide more supervision and monitoring for those young police officers, because we've added lots of police officers. You know, about 6,000 of the police officers in New York City are paid for with the federal funds that came from the anti-crime legislation passed in 1994 to put 100,000 more police on the street.

Well, we need now, I think, to provide more training and support so that those police officers who we ask to do this job are really fully prepared to do it. But we also have to ask the police to show respect toward the vast majority of people who are law abiding citizens and I don't think that some of the tactics that have been used recently in the city are really going to create the kind of community support for the police that most police officers I know want.

So I reject this false choice that has been posed. I do not think we have to choose between continuing to lower crime, which is in everyone's interest, and creating good relations between our police and the communities. And we've seen how it can happen in other cities and I'd like to work to make sure it happens in every city in New York.

BLITZER: Mrs. Clinton, I'm the time cop here. Unfortunately, I have the duty of telling everyone that we have to take another commercial break.

We have a lot more to talk about with Mrs. Clinton.

Stay with us.

BLITZER: Welcome back to our LATE EDITION town meeting from the State University of New York at Buffalo with the U.S. Senate candidate, the Democratic candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton. I take it there are no other Democrat candidates running for this Senate seat.

Mrs. Clinton, there is -- polls show this is a very, very close race, Zogby Poll this month showed Giuliani 45 percent, Clinton -- that would be you -- 44 percent. But look at this, in a new poll that just came out just today, it shows that Mayor Giuliani has 52 percent of the upstate vote, while you only have 38 percent of the upstate vote. We are here in upstate.

Why are you having such a hard time winning support among upstaters?

CLINTON: Well, you know, Wolf, upstate New York is historically a very Republican area -- not Buffalo and Erie County, but most of upstate New York -- and I feel pretty good about the progress we're making. You know, I'm spending a lot of time. I've, as of today, been in 56 of the 62 counties. By tomorrow, I will have been in 58 and I intend to visit all 62 in the next couple of weeks.

And what I'm finding is that the people I'm talking to -- you know, this morning I started out on a dairy farm talking to a lot of dairy farmers and other farmers in Wyoming County and in western New York, and you know, they're traditionally Republican, but they're listening to my views on the issues, they're asking a lot of good questions. And I'm just going to work as hard as I can to persuade voters in upstate, Democrat, Republican, independent, everyone that I will work very hard to help the people here and I want to represent the entire state and everybody in it.

QUESTION: Mrs. Clinton, my name is Pat Radle (ph) and I'm a first year student at U.B. Law School. Senator Moynihan has twice voted in favor of banning partial-birth abortions. In fact, he's called the procedure practically infanticide. Do you agree with Senator Moynihan?

CLINTON: You know, I have always been a very strong pro-choice advocate. I believe that a woman's right to choose is protected by our Constitution. I have also said that there is a way, and the president and the Democratic leadership in Congress have proposed a piece of legislation that would ban late-term abortions, except in instances to save the life of the mother or to prevent serious harm to the health of the mother. That is a position I could support, but the Republican leadership will not let that piece of legislation come to the floor for a vote. They would rather, in my view, play politics with this incredibly sensitive and difficult issue, which I really regret.

So I would like to see us do everything we can to protect the life and the health of the mother, and of course I'm a very strong supporter and have been for many years of adoption, and foster care and the changes that we need to make to make sure every child has a safe and loving home, and I would continue to work on that as well.

BLITZER: Mrs. Clinton, like gun control, on this issue of abortion, there is no difference between you and Mayor Giuliani, on other issues, affirmative action, gay rights, you agree as well. What is the biggest policy difference there is between you and Rudy Giuliani?

CLINTON: Well, there are a number of them, Wolf.

BLITZER: Just give us the biggest one.

CLINTON: The biggest is probably his support of the very large, across-the-board, in my view, risky and irresponsible tax cuts. He also supports vouchers for public education, which I reject. He would be against the Comprehensive Nuclear Test Ban Treaty, which I would vote to ratify. He is not for a patient's bill of rights that includes the right of people to sue their HMOs, and I think that that's the kind of version we should look to pass. On many issues that a senator will vote one, he has taken a position that is not only opposite of mine, but I think opposite of views of most New Yorkers.

BLITZER: All right, let's take another question from one of those New Yorkers.

QUESTION: Hi, Janell Samnella, Rochester, New York.

I just want to know how you're going to defray the cost of college tuition. I want to know how come every time I get my fax-a-form (ph) back, it keeps saying no, you're not eligible for TAP (ph), you're not eligible for PAL (ph), but you can take out a loan. I think the government doesn't understand that just because, you know, parents are in the middle-class to upper-class income-level bracket doesn't mean that they're paying their students college tuition. So how can you help us? How can you help us students?

CLINTON: Well, I had proposed, along with Senator Schumer and now the president has agreed and put in the budget, that we make $10,000 a year of college tuition tax deductible, which would be an enormous help to middle income families like yours. I believe this we made college tuition tax deductible and combine that with the aide that is available for people who are eligible for it, we would go a very long way in making college affordable for every student.

I'd also like to create a national teacher corps, because we're going to have a big teacher shortage, and I would like to encourage some of the students here and on this campus to consider going into teaching, but a lot of students say they can't afford too, because they come out of school with too much debt. So I would like to say that if you agree, you could get a full scholarship anywhere in the country, if in return, you would teach for four years. I would like to defray and to eliminate the debt that a lot of the students come out of school with, and I'd like to do the same for nursing and medical schools as well.

So I think the combination of making tuition tax deductible and really focusing on areas of shortage, like teachers, doctors and nurses, would probably cover the needs of most of our students, which I think would be a great step forward.

BLITZER: All right. Let's take another question, please.

Please, go ahead.

QUESTION: Hi, Ms. Clinton, my name is Betsy Snyder, and I'm from the West Winfield (ph) area near Utica, New York, and I'm a third-year law student here at UB.

From my area in Central New York, the backbone of our economy is farming. And presently, many farmers are having a problem in passing down their farms to their children to carry, due to detrimental tax consequences. What do you suggest that you could do to help family farmers pass onto children, as well as small family business owners facing similar problems?

CLINTON: Well, that's the announcement that I made this morning when I was on the dairy farm in Wyoming County, because I have heard about this from farmers and small business people all over the state. I believe that we should raise the exemption for the inheritance tax to $1.75 million, and I also believe that we ought to increase the unified credit to a million dollars, because there are many family farms that cannot afford the estate taxes that are currently levied. I don't think we can afford in our balanced budget to go as far as the Republicans do, but I think that based on all my conversations, that we have to do more to remove this burden so that families that have worked hard to build up a farm -- like the farm I was on today fourth generation, and the fifth generation is waiting in line to take over -- they'll be able to do that, so I hope that that will help.

Because you're right, a lot of people don't know that agriculture is still the number one industry in New York. So when we talk about economic development upstate, we have to talk not only about the new economy and technology, but doing more to help our farmers, and that would include, for example, including New York in the dairy compact so that our dairy farmers would get a much fairer price for their milk and doing some changes in some of the federal financing and subsidy programs, so that all of our farmers would have a leveler playing field so that they could compete and really continue the rural tradition that means so much to upstate New York.

BLITZER: All right, Mrs. Clinton, we have to take another break.

More of our conversation, our town meeting, with the U.S. Senate candidate from New York, the Democratic candidate, Hillary Rodham Clinton, when we come back.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Welcome back to the University of Buffalo, where we're continuing our special LATE EDITION town meeting with Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Let's take another question from a New Yorker.

QUESTION: Hi, my name is Dan Kamerada (ph) from Rochester.

President Clinton and yourself pushed for a nationalized health care. When brought to the American people, this was soundly rejected. If you were elected, would you try to get the same nationalized health care. How would you guarantee that people without health care could get coverage?

CLINTON: Well, you're right. You may remember I had a few things to say about health care a few years ago, and I learned a lot from that experience, and I'm now from the school of smaller steps.

I still believe that we have to work toward the time when we can provide quality, affordable health care for every American, because since those years, we've had, as you've pointed out, even more uninsured Americans, and an increasing number of what you might call underinsured Americans, and so there are a lot of steps that I think we could take. I've mentioned a few of them just briefly.

We do need to add a prescription drug benefit to Medicare and to ensure that Medicare is always there for my mother, and your parents and you eventually. We also need to pass a real patient bill of rights that puts doctors and nurses and health professionals back in the position of making the decisions about health care, and not bookkeepers and accountants and people in insurance companies. I think we have to continue as I did. As soon as we were not successful on that, and I took stock, I began working on some other ways that we could expand health coverage, and I'm very pleased that we have a children's health insurance program, which I'd like to build on and expand, because I'd like to see every child get the health care that child needs. I now would like to see us expand that to the parents, the working parents of children that we're insuring.

And you know, when you think about it, it's very sad that we have so many uninsured and underinsured people, and I've been in and out of hospitals all over the state. And I was up in Massena, which is -- I don't if anybody here is from Massena, but it's up in the north country -- and I went into a hospital room and met a woman who has no insurance, and she has asthma and a heart condition, and so every three months she goes into the hospital where they take very good care of her, but then they don't have any way to pay those bills because she makes too much money in order to qualify for Medicaid but she can't afford insurance.

In that same hospital I met a young woman who switched jobs and was not yet eligible for the health insurance of her new employer when she found a lump in her breast and a family friend, an internist did the out -- did the biopsy and found out that it was cancerous and sent her to his friends, an oncologist and a surgeon, and the surgeon said to her, "You know, this may be a blessing in disguise because now I'll be able to take care of you the way that I want to without arguing with your insurance company."

So we really have some work to do to make sure that it's doctors and nurses and to make sure people have access. We also have to lower the cost of prescription drugs. They are just way too high and they're going up too fast, and I've said that I would introduce legislation that would permit us to reimport American manufactured and approved drugs from Canada so that we could buy them at the low rate that Canadians buy them, so we can have a more competitive marketplace for drugs.

BLITZER: Mrs. Clinton, but you know that millions of Americans will forever define you by that failed health care plan of 1993, not so much because it was -- you wanted to go in one full step, but because it was big government, an effort by the government to take over our health care, and they will always see you as someone who simply wants big government to do all these things whereas the private sector and individuals should be doing more, that are local and state governments.

How can you reassure voters in New York that you're not simply for more federal government takeover not only of health care but all sorts of other issues that affect our day to day lives?

CLINTON: Well, I think, Wolf, all you have to do is look at not only the positions that I have taken and advocated for many years but what I would do in the Senate. Now, you know, there is a lot of evidence that the problem has gotten worse, and so I think we should put our heads together and come up with whatever will work and to try to make that available to people.

I think it's also very important that we do continue to take these steps that we've taken like the Childrens Health Insurance Program that I worked so hard on, because we have to figure out a way, because this is not a problem that just affects the uninsured or people who have to argue with their HMO. It eventually affects all of us, because if we don't have a system that is really funding our local hospitals, our academic health centers, all of the pieces of our system that really make America's health care system the best in the world, eventually it will affect what kind of care all of us can receive.

BLITZER: All right, let's take another question.

QUESTION: Hello, my name is Marcy Kelly (ph), I'm from Hamburg, New York and I work for an agency called Action For Mental Health, which is part of the West New York Independent Living Project. It's a disability rights advocate agency. Currently in New York state we can't get equal health insurance coverage for mental illness, insurance companies do not cover mental illness and middle class and lower-class people go without mental health treatment. On the federal level, Medicare only allows 90 days of in-patient hospital care.

What can you do to help us in this -- in getting insurance coverage we need for treatment for mental illness?

CLINTON: Yes, I'm really glad you asked that, because I think it might surprise people to know how often as I'm traveling around the state, maybe going into a diner or, you know, in a supermarket, people will come up and talk to me about just that problem.

You know, we still have a stigma, don't we, when it comes to mental illness? And I think the more we learn about how our bodies and minds work -- you know, the mind is an organ just like the heart or the liver, and we are learning that a lot of the susceptibility to mental illness is really in our genes. I think when we map the human genome we're going to discover that just like some of us might be susceptible or vulnerable to diabetes or cancer, others might be susceptible to depression or schizophrenia.

I think it's time we realize that health care should be both body and mind, and I would like to advocate and work toward parity for coverage for mental illness, because what I see happening now is that a lot of untreated mental health problems are manifesting themselves in violence. You know, we have so many people with mental health problems in our prisons. We were talking before about school violence and the level of youth violence. There's a lot of evidence that many of those youngsters are affected by emotional and behavioral problems.

I think that it's really in our interest to do more to destigmatize the treatment of mental health and to provide the resources, because I think eventually it would save money in many, many of the cases that I'm aware of, and I applaud you for working on it and being an advocate.

BLITZER: All right, Mrs. Clinton, we have to take another break. More of our town meeting with Mrs. Clinton when we come back.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: When we come back, more of our LATE EDITION town meeting with Hillary RodhamClinton, and I'll ask her one question I've been waiting to ask all night. Stay with us.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Welcome back. Let's take another question right away from the audience.

QUESTION: Good evening, my name is Judata Abdella (ph), and I'm from Buffalo, New York.

Monetary compensation to survivors of the Holocaust has set the precedent for reparations to victims of war. Do you feel that this should extend to the Palestinian people who have lost their land to Israel?

CLINTON: You know, I am a very strong supporter of Israel's safety and security, as well as a strong supporter of the peace process. And right now, I believe that we should support the negotiations that are ongoing to permit the parties to reach whatever arrangements they finally can reach. And I don't think it's useful for those of us who are at a distance from the situation to be really commenting on what should be the basis of the discussion between the parties, and I hope that, you know, progress will be made.

BLITZER: But you did at one point call for a Palestinian state. Do you still believe there should be an independent Palestinian state alongside Israel?

CLINTON: Well you know, I expressed a personal opinion, but I think that that also is one of those issues that has to be decided between the parties, and it is part of the final status negotiations. BLITZER: So you've backed away from that?

CLINTON: Well, I think it's not useful, especially for someone to comment or talk about what should be the determination between the parties.

BLITZER: All right. Let's take another question.

QUESTION: Hi, Mrs. Clinton, my name is Alka Sharma (ph). I'm from Buffalo. My question is, what key strength do you feel that you possess that will make you the best advocate for New York?

CLINTON: Well, I think I bring 30 years of experience and commitment to the issues that New Yorkers are talking to me about: How do we improve public education? and I and I am a strong supporter of that. I was one of the first people, for example, to call for teacher testing back in 1983, and I'd like to do more to both increase standards and accountability as well as provide more opportunity. The work that I have done in health care and will continue to do, the work that I've done on economic development I think is all very relevant to the job of a senator.

But it's not only issues, it's how you get things done. You know, in the Senate, we have to work with 99 other people, and I think I bring a leadership style that will try to unite people, and try to work with people in a way that will actually accomplish some very positive results for our state, and so I think both on issues and how I would go about doing the job, I think I could be a strong advocate for the needs and interests of the children and families of New York.

BLITZER: Are you saying that Rudy Giuliani can't work with other people?

CLINTON: Well, I'm saying that I will work very hard with other people, and I'm going to say run a campaign that is based on issues and ideas, and I've worked with the Senate for many years. You know, I was confirmed by the Senate back in 1977 for a position in the Legal Services Corporation. You know, I've worked with senators on, you know, legislation, I testified, even before the White House years. And in the White House years, I've worked with members of Congress from both parties on not only health issues, like CHIP, but on improving adoption, and foster care and education. In fact, you know, Wolf, I even worked on improving adoption and foster care with someone who rarely has a good thing to say about my husband or me -- that's Tom DeLay. But you know, I invited him to the White House, and we worked together, and we made some very significant changes in how we will hopefully move more children from foster care to adoption.

I'm willing to work with anybody. I think that the most important commitment I can make to the voters of New York is that I will get up every single day and work my heart out, and that means working with people that I may not agree with and that may not agree with me, but I know that I might need their vote to do something for Buffalo or Western New York.

BLITZER: All right, go ahead. QUESTION: Hi, Mrs. Clinton, my name is Erin Ziggler (ph), and I'm from Buffalo, New York.

I was wondering, how do you feel about granting MFN status to China when considering their very poor history on human rights?

CLINTON: That's a very good and hard question. And I know many people, here in Western New York in particularly and Erie County, are concerned about this vote, and I share the concerns that many of my supporters in organized labor have expressed to me, because I do think we have to make sure that we improve labor rights, we improve environmental standards in our bilateral and our multilateral trade agreements.

But on balance, I've looked at this, I've studied it, I think it is in the interests of America and American workers that we provide the option for China to go into the WTO. Right now, we are trading with China. We have a huge trade deficit with China. The agreement that has been negotiated between our two countries would open their markets to us in a way that they are not yet open, and in fact, for many large manufactured products, like automobiles, we would have the first chance to really get in and compete in that marketplace.

I also think it's not just an issue of trade. I believe it's a security consideration. I want to do everything we can to persuade China to improve its human rights record, to be sure that it doesn't in any way interfere with its neighbors or with Taiwan. I don't think you gain that by isolating China. I think we must work out as best we can a relationship in trade, and a very firm statement and commitment to improving human rights and try to make as much progress as possible.

BLITZER: Mrs. Clinton, we only have a few seconds left.

Here's the question that I've wanted to ask you. Our audience at home is now going look at a picture of you wearing a Chicago Cubs baseball cap and a New York Yankees baseball cap. If the Cubs make it to the World Series this year, the first time since 1908 that they would actually be in a position to win a World Series, a lifelong Chicago resident, a native of Illinois, would you say the Chicago Cubs should win or the New York Yankees?

CLINTON: Well, you know, Wolf, I got into trouble when I told people that I was a Yankees fan growing up. But part of the reason I was a Yankees fan is because I was also a Cubs fan. You know, I needed an American League that could win. It's depressing to be a Cubs fan year after year after year. But you know, I'm no longer going talk about baseball. I will just privately keep my opinions to myself, because you know, I got so much grief the last time I opened my mouth.

If that were ever to happen, you can come back to me.

(LAUGHTER)

BLITZER: She's not telling us. All right, Mrs. Clinton, thank you so much on behalf of the University of Buffalo, everyone at CNN. Thank you so much for joining us for this "LATE EDITION" town meeting.

CLINTON: Thank you.

(APPLAUSE)

BLITZER: I want to thank the audience once again.

We will have a similar forum in the not-too-distant future with the Republican candidate, Rudy Giuliani.

For all of us here at CNN, thank you very much for watching. I'm Wolf Blitzer in Buffalo. Good night.

STATEMENTS BY FIRST LADY HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON, SENATOR CHRISTOPHER DODD (D-CT), DR. T. BERRY BRAZELTON, AND OTHERS AT A WHITE HOUSE EVENT, 4/28/2000

TOPIC: CHILD CARE AND CRIME PREVENTION

LOCATION: THE ROOSEVELT ROOM OF THE WHITE HOUSE, WASHINGTON, D.C.

MRS. CLINTON: (In progress due to technical difficulties) -- crime, Invest in Kids, an anti-crime group made up of 700 police chiefs, sheriffs, prosecutors, experts, and victims of violence.

Now this report which we are releasing has the expert help and advice of so many people who are on the front lines of caring for our children and of preventing crime. It tells us that at-risk children who receive quality child care today are much less likely to commit crimes tomorrow. They're less likely to enter school with serious behavioral problems. They are less likely to be arrested. They are less likely to break the law again and again when they grow up to be adults.

And by investing in child care, we save not only precious lives and futures, but also precious resources. For every dollar we invest in child care, we save more than $5 in crime costs down the line.

It is my great hope that Congress will pass this budget so that we can take a step forward to having the kind of country that all of us want to have and that our children deserve to have. As today's report confirms, investing in child care is not only the right thing to do, it is the smart, economic and, now we know, crime-fighting thing to do as well.

Now, our next speaker is someone who has been working on this issue for a lot longer than anyone else in this room. He has worked tirelessly on behalf of our youngest and most vulnerable children, and it has been my great pleasure to work with him over many years now. So let me introduce a professor, a pediatrician, a co-author of today's study, a great champion of children, a friend and a mentor to so many of us, Dr. T. Berry Brazelton. (Applause.)

DR. BRAZELTON: Well, Hillary, it's a great pleasure to be here with you again in the White House. Hillary has done more for children and families than any president's wife that I know of, and it's just incredible to me. I hate to lose her. And we've worked together, as she says, over 15 years. They told me to say 30, and I said, No, that was too much -- (laughter) -- so I cut it down to 15.

But I am proud of Fight Crime: Invest in Kids, because it's been the brain child of people that really have power -- the adults who cope with the other end of failures, police chiefs, district attorneys, sheriffs and victims -- and it's time we looked at what we were doing instead of putting band-aids on the other end, such as prisons and so forth. And I think these people realize that we have been a failure in what we've been doing.

And I -- the rigorous research that I can quote now is certainly a back-up to all that we're talking about. Researchers at the High/Scope Foundation randomly chose half a group of at-risk toddlers to receive a quality -- and that's the biggest word, quality -- educational child care program while they were three and four. Twenty-two years later, the children left out of the program were five times as likely to have grown up to be chronic lawbreakers with five or more arrests.

Think of the cost of that.

Brand-new research has just come out from a large 14-year study of children enrolled in government-funded child-parent centers at ages 3 and 4, and shows that compared to children who'd been left out of the program, they were only half as likely to have two or more arrests as teens.

And in North Carolina, which is a leading state now -- we're beginning to see the states turn into paying attention to this -- the children who have been in child care centers, bolstered by wonderful Governor Hunt, the state's pioneering Smart Start program, were half as likely to have behavioral problems with they hit kindergarten.

So we have every kind of evidence that this works, and it works to prevent.

The thing that strikes me about it, too, is what Hillary mentioned -- that we're not just talking about children, we're talking about families. When a family knows their child's going to be taken care of appropriately, they don't have to grieve in the same way. When they have to leave a child with somebody you or I wouldn't trust, nor would they, what recourse have they got but to begin to grieve and to begin to pull away from that child and not -- and to deny what might happen to that child? So we end up with seeing the empty faces that we saw in the Colorado episode. When you look at those children on TV, they are empty. They don't have what we want all of our kids to have.

The three things that I think -- four things that I think we can give a child in the first three years at the cheapest price are:

Self-esteem. Every time somebody looks at that child and the child goes, "Ooh," and they go, "Ooh," back -- (laughter) -- that child feels, "I matter! And every time that child smiles and somebody smiles back at him, that child gets a sense of self-esteem.

And then, with enough self-esteem, they can care about others. This is what we've lost in this country -- caring about others.

The third thing is the motivation for learning. You know, we hear all this about stimulating your child in the uterus, stimulating him and so forth. Kids who feel good about themselves are ready to learn anything we want them to.

I think if we can fund it at the national level, at the state level, at an individual level, we can do it; we can give every child in this country quality. And the Perry Preschool Project showed that if we do this early, we can save $7 on every child later on. And then you ask, what will it cost us? Compared to what?

Now I'd like to introduce Chris Dodd, one of my favorite people. He's been -- (laughing) -- we've been fighting together for 50 years (laughter) -- on almost everything: 99, 457, the Early Intervention Program, the Parental Leave Bill, the Child Care Bills. Every bill that's come up for children, Chris is the leading expert on. So I think all of us deserve to give him a hand. (Applause.)

SEN. DODD: Thank you very much, Doctor. If I had any sense, I'd just sit down right now after that! (Laughter.)

If I start doing this on television, Doctor, I don't get the same response you do -- (laughter) -- (inaudible) -- children. Every time you do it, it moves an audience, and we thank you immensely.

Well, this is about as good a child care setting as there is in the country. As long as Hillary Rodham Clinton is in this house, children don't have a better place and a better set of advocates than they do in the president and the first lady. We thank you immensely. What they've done over the years. It deserves a round of applause. (Applause.)

And not just a newcomer, obviously, to it, but for those of us who have had the pleasure of working with Mrs. Clinton over the years, the Children's Defense Fund, as the first lady of Arkansas, and during these past more than seven years now as first lady of the United States. I've often said I have a great friend in the president of the United States when it comes to these issues, but if I know I really want to get something done on children, I know who to call here, with all the other things the president has to worry about and talk about.

And, Dr. Brazelton, it's always a pleasure to be with you, in your company. And when we need to make a case to our colleagues in Congress, there's no better advocate for children anywhere in America than Barry Brazelton. And we thank you immensely for the years and years of advocacy on behalf of America's children.

My colleague, Ben Cardin, Eric Holder, Chief Sullivan. Pleased to be with you. Olivia, we thank you as well for all the tremendous 00

How do you close your eyes to the fact that our child care providers, the individuals who work and nurture these young people for eight to 10 hours a day, are paid abysmally in this country. Some of the lowest-paid workers in the nation are people that we ask to watch the next generation of Americans. We do a better job in insisting that your pets are cared for in this country than that your children are. And there ought to be a sense of outrage about that across this country.

As a result of the efforts of the Clintons and others in Congress, we've been able to improve the safety of the food that children eat, recently with the medicines that children take, with the toys that they play with we've done a much better job. It seems somewhat ironic, to put it mildly, that we have yet been able to increase the quality of the settings where these children live every day as a result of the pressures that their parents are under.

And it is a frightening experience for parents to have to worry about where your child is going to be, who is watching out for them, not losing my job because I have to worry about whether or not the child care setting is appropriate and proper. I don't know if enough of my colleagues, frankly, understand the fright and the terror that parents go through every day, with 13 million children every single day in a child-care setting, with so many who have to struggle every single week to try and find a good, safe place for their children. In this day and age, as we enter the 21st century, this ought not to be a partisan issue. Democrats and Republicans ought to be able to find common ground on seeing to it that we have accessible, affordable and quality child care for every needy child in this country, and that's what we're determined to achieve.

So I'm pleased to be joining today with the folks who prepared this report. Arlen Specter, our friend and colleague in the Congress, has committed to raising up to $2 billion, Ben, the numbers that we're talking about here, the administration has those numbers in there, Berry, and we're hopeful this year. Last year, four times the United States Senate passed legislation to increase the funding for child care. On four different occasions we were able to achieve that. And yet in the arcane world of the Congress, the conferences where the two houses meet, we lost out on these issues. Well, we're determined not to lose this year. That's why we're here today. That's why we've come together to make the case once more that in this year, the first year of the 21st century, the American children and their child care needs are not going to be forgotten.

We in law enforcement fully recognize that we need to be strong on crime, and we need to have safe communities. But we know we're not going to achieve real safe communities until we are starting to invest more money in the early childhood years of the children we're dealing with. Head Start needs more money. Other programs similar to Head Start in our communities across the country need to be better funded. Those proposals are before the Congress, and they need to be funded -- not only in the Congress, but also in our state legislatures.

As Dr. Brazelton said, for -- every dollar invested in early childhood care saves $7 later in the way of criminal justice system costs, social services costs, and puts a more viable person enjoying the full life of -- American society has to offer.

I work with about 80 kids who have been passed out or dropped out of high schools. They were placed in alternative schools. They have failed and were tossed out of the alternative schools. Those kids are well on their way to jail, to become my clients and the prison system clients in jail. In working with them, a board that I serve on in working with those kids, we find that many of them have literacy problems. They don't have educational deficits as far as ADD or dyslexic, but they just never had the opportunity to really grasp the basics -- reading, for one. They never stood a chance of getting started in the elementary schools, and they start failing out in junior high and high school. We need to invest our money far better in that preschool, Head Start, early childhood development, so that they can be successful when they hit our regular public schools.

The public of America understands the public mandate to fund schools starting at first grade. They don't understand -- and we need to help get that message across -- we need to make better investments in preschool, early childhood development, so that these children stand a chance and don't become the clients of myself and the attorney general's office, Mr. Holder.

So Fight Crime: Invest in Kids' partnership of chiefs, commissioners, sheriffs, prosecutors back the administration's proposal for increased investments and also, then, encourage our state legislatures to look at their role, their responsibility at the state level to invest as well, to match with the federal government's investment in early childhood education and development.

With that, I'd like to introduce a man who is a major leader in the House in early childhood care legislation, Mr. Ben Cardin from Maryland. (Applause.)

REP. BEN CARDIN (D-MD): Thank you. Sheriff Sullivan, thank you very much for what you do for our children and what you do for our community. And I first want to thank the children who are with us today. Thank you very much.

YOUNG PEOPLE: Yeah! (Applause.)

REP. CARDIN: Chris Dodd, of course, has been the real champion in the United States Senate on the child issues in so many different ways, and I want to agree with Chris Dodd that for the past seven years, America's children and families have had the benefit of the most effective, most persistent, most determined voice for child care that we've ever had in the White House.

The first lady's hard work has raised the visibility of child care issues in the administration, in the Congress and, indeed, in our entire nation, and we all thank Mrs. Clinton for what she has meant for all the children in our country. Thank you very much. (Applause.)

Dr. Brazelton, I was wondering why you were oohing and aahing me when I walked in. You've built up all of our self confidence -- (laughter) -- and we thank you for -- I feel better already, so thank thank you very much for --

REP. CARDIN: Well, now I think you've gone too far. (Laughter.)

Nothing is more important to the daily lives of more American families than the availability of affordable, reliable, safe care for our children. Six out of 10 American families with children under the age of six have two working parents or a single parent that's in the work force. And this really struck home for me this past month when I became a grandfather for the first time. My daughter and son-in-law will be working. So for my daughter and my son-in-law and for millions of similar families, child care is not a public policy issue; it's a daily struggle to balance the pressure to provide for their children with the need to make sure that their children are safe.

Senator Dodd in the Senate has been real champions on this issue. Mrs. Clinton, I want you to know that I was joined by more than 100 of our colleagues in the House on both sides of the aisle, Democrats and Republicans, writing a letter to our Appropriation Committee urging them to include the entire increase in this year's budget in the House of Representatives. We need to get that passed this year. (Applause.)

In this time of budget surpluses, an increase in the Child Care and Development Block Grant is exactly the kind of wise investments we need to make in order to make our country stronger. If we shortchange child care at budget time, we shortchange our kids for a lifetime.

Again, Mrs. Clinton, I want to thank you for keeping this issue in front of the American people. Congratulations. (Applause.)

MRS. CLINTON: Well, I want to thank everyone for participating in the study. We've got some of the people who have actually been the investigators, the researchers, the writers, members of the committee to fight crime, and everyone who has been a part of this, I'm very grateful to you.

I too want to thank our guests, who have been extremely patient (laughter) -- during this occasion.

And I guess we would just end by saying -- Barry and I were talking about this, and Ben, and Chris and I have talked about it, the attorney general and Eric -- we've all talked about this for so long because we know what the research shows us and we know what common sense, personal experience tells us. And I hope that we're able finally to make the case to the Congress.

And Sheriff, thank you for your eloquent and strong statement and your leadership.

And we will all be working very hard. But this is an issue that we can highlight here in the White House today, but we have to work hard on every single day to make sure that we translate the results of this report into the dollars that are needed so that we can fulfill the promise that the report gives us, that Dr. Brazelton is such an eloquent proponent of, and that is to make every child feel as wanted and special as possible, because we know that's the best way to prevent any problems down the road.

REP. CARDIN: I testified before John Porter's subcommittee on Appropriations, and I can tell you that Congressman Porter was very supportive, is going to do everything he can, I think, to help us. So I think we have strong support among the -- some of the leadership on the House side to get this done.

MRS. CLINTON: And that's really key, Helen, because, as Chris said -- and you might want to add on that, Chris -- the Senate has passed considerable measures in the last couple of years.

Q (Off mike) -- added into that --

SEN. DODD: Well, that's so -- but last year four times the Senate -- four times the Senate passed, actually, the legislation on child care, and Senator Specter has indicated that he is going to support the number -- the president's number, the 817 million, getting up to 2 billion, for child care. So we feel very good about the strength we have, and with Ben's work in the House and the leadership out of the White House, all of that strength.

And events, frankly -- other events that have occurred -- tragic events, too often, are -- if there's a silver lining to any of these tragic events, it is because it raises the level of importance, the profile or the importance of doing more, as the sheriff has pointed out, early on with these children. And that aspect of this helps us tremendously.

MRS. CLINTON: You know, we have the sheriff, we have Commissioner Branton (sp), we have other leaders in law enforcement, if any -- if you'd like to add anything else to Helen's question. Bill or anybody, you want to add anything? (Pause.)

I think that the sheriff well said it when he described these young men -- and, I assume, some women --

SHERIFF SULLIVAN: Yes, young men and women.

MRS. CLINTON: -- but mostly young men -- that he's working with, who have dropped out or been pushed out and, you know, are really on the road to ending up as, you know, wards of the state in prisons or jails. And that's what we're trying to avoid.

And we've known this for so long. I mean, this is what must be a little bit frustrating for Dr. Brazelton and the experts who are here, who have worked in this field for so many years.

Can't we do something about it?

MRS. CLINTON: In fact, Helen, we now have a lot of research that, exactly as Dr. Brazelton said, you can identify in preschool years, and certainly by fourth grade, children who are on the road to the kind of violence and criminal activity that we're all trying to prevent. And, you know, for too long, a lot of these issues have been considered, you know, kind of luxury or marginal issues. Like, you know, when I talk about encouraging parents to read to their children, you know, people say, "Well, isn't that nice." But it connects to everything we're talking about, the more we can get parents involved in the lives of their children, the more we can persuade parents that even if they, themselves, didn't have that good of an upbringing, if they, themselves don't feel that well educated, that there are things they can do that will give those tools to their own children.

But parents need help. Part of the great success of these early childhood programs that Dr. Brazelton talked about is that they not only focused on the child, but they helped parents be better parents. They improved the family atmosphere, so that kids could break that generational sort of cycle of illiteracy and poverty and violence. And, you know, you can just see it in the faces of children, and we know that it will work.

So we're here again to really make a plea to all the members of Congress to see this, for all of the reasons that we have tried to convey today, as one of the very best investments our country could make.

Thank you all very much. (Applause.)

WOODRUFF: The president explaining his decision to be in Albany, New York this evening, when state Democrats formally nominate Hillary Rodham Clinton as their U.S. Senate candidate.

Mr. Clinton will not address the state party convention, but he will make remarks at a reception afterward. The event comes as a new Quinnipiac poll of registered voters in New York state shows Mrs. Clinton remains in a statistical dead-heat with Republican Rudy Giuliani even after the mayor's disclosure of his marital and health problems. Well, as CNN's Frank Buckley explains, the Clinton camp may be hoping the first lady's nomination will give her a bounce.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

SEN. CHARLES SCHUMER (D), NEW YORK: We will make a great team in the United States Senate.

FRANK BUCKLEY, CNN CORRESPONDENT (voice-over): New York Senator Charles Schumer will officially nominate Hillary Clinton as the Democrats' choice for the U.S. Senate seat, but she's been the party favorite for a year-and-a-half, and the convention is expected to only affirm that conviction.

JOEL SIEGEL, "NEW YORK DAILY NEWS": This is a very unusual situation for the New York Democrats, to have an open seat and they don't have a primary pretty much. And that's -- nobody can remember the last time that's happened, and it will be more of a coronation than anything, I think.

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK SENATE CANDIDATE: I will work for the next month in this campaign to earn the trust and the vote of every single New Yorker.

BUCKLEY: Congressman Charles Rangel was among the first New Yorkers to approach Mrs. Clinton with the idea of running. Despite never having run for any office and never having lived in New York, she was viewed as a potential heavyweight contender against the formidable presumed Republican candidate New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani. Given Giuliani's recent diagnosis of prostate cancer and last week's revelation regarding his intentions to seek a separation from his wife, Rangel believes Mrs. Clinton is now the one to beat.

REP. CHARLES RANGEL (D), NEW YORK: It is a good feeling to win, but not nearly as good if we had a health candidate that had no problems at home, and we just whooped them good.

BUCKLEY: The first lady began her campaign with what she called a "listening tour."

H. CLINTON: Good afternoon, and thank you for joining us.

BUCKLEY: It was also a learning period for the novice candidate. Mrs. Clinton made mistakes: failing to consult with Hispanic leaders on clemency for Puerto Rican nationalists; waiting too long to issue a statement denouncing anti-Israeli comments made by the wife of Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat during a trip to the Middle East.

Polls have generally showed Mrs. Clinton and Giuliani in a statistical dead-heat. But a perceptible shift occurred in Mrs. Clinton's favor following the police shooting death of unarmed security guard Patrick Dorismond in March.

MAYOR RUDY GIULIANI (R), NEW YORK: Ultimately, it will be relevant as to whether or not the police officer actually caused his death or Mr. Dorismond caused his own death by struggling and fighting with the police.

BUCKLEY: The mayor's release of Dorismond's juvenile arrest record angering some voters and providing Hillary Clinton with an opportunity to criticize and gain ground.

H. CLINTON: At just the moment when a real leader would wait for the results of a full and fair investigation, he has led the rush to judgment. That is not leadership.

BUCKLEY: Giuliani's announcement of prostate cancer has softened Mrs. Clinton's campaign and tonight she is not expected to attack the mayor or do much more than accept her party's nomination during her appearance.

LEE MIRINGOFF, MARIST INSTITUTE FOR PUBLIC OPINION: Nothing big. You don't want to drive Rudy's bad news off of page one with something of your own.

FRANK BUCKLEY, CNN CORRESPONDENT (voice-over): Hillary Clinton arrived in upstate New York, where her Republican opponent, Rick Lazio, has been campaigning in a bus tour since Monday.

The already combative Senate race now focused on allegations from both candidates that the other has gone negative.

LAZIO: They would like to drag me down in the mud, but you know what, we're not going to go there.

H. CLINTON: I think he ought to rename his bus, you know, instead of the Mainstream Express, he ought to call it the "Double-Talk express." You know, he's got moderate talk on the trail and extreme rhetoric in his mail.

BUCKLEY: Mrs. Clinton, referring to a Lazio fund-raising letter, revealed this week, in which Lazio says: "Hillary Clinton and her husband have embarrassed our country and disgraced their powerful posts."

LAZIO: And frankly, these letters are written, you know, not by me. I'm not disowning it, but they're not written by me. I mean, what's important is what I sign off on, what I'm saying, and what I am communicating through the commercials.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP, HILLARY CLINTON CAMPAIGN AD)

UNIDENTIFIED ANNOUNCER: Rick Lazio, the more you know, the more you wonder.

BUCKLEY: Lazio saying a recent series of commercials from Mrs. Clinton represent the truly negative campaign.

LAZIO: I'm not the one. Hillary Clinton's the one who's out there trying to distort my record, attack me every day. I'm not the one who's got six negative ads hammering her. She's the one who's committed herself now to a negative campaign.

BUCKLEY: Mrs. Clinton was asked about the ads during a town hall-style meeting.

H. CLINTON: I think that providing information about people's record and their positions is absolutely fair. So that, for example, I know that my opponent has, you know, complained that I have pointed out some of the votes that he has taken. I haven't called him any names. I will never call him a name. So far as I know, he's a nice person. I don't have any personal animus toward him.

BUCKLEY: Mrs. Clinton is calling this swing of her campaign the "Upstate Economic Tour."

H. CLINTON: Last summer, I came to listen, and today, I'd like to offer a plan.

BUCKLEY: Clinton hoping to draw a contrast to Lazio's current campaign tour, which is largely focused on legislative accomplishments rather than policy proposals.

H. CLINTON: Remember in 1992 when they said "It's the economy stupid?" Well, I still think it's the economy.

BUCKLEY (on camera): The aggressive campaigning by both candidates in upstate New York, an indication of how importance this region is in winning a statewide election. Voters here are hoping both candidates will be as interested in the area after Election Day.

Frank Buckley, CNN, Johnson City, New York.

"CNN Sunday Morning," CNN, 8/13/2000

KYRA PHILLIPS, CNN ANCHOR: With President Clinton and first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton in Los Angeles this weekend raising money for their own personal causes, there have been some grumblings from the Gore campaign that the Clintons are stealing the spotlight from the vice president.

CNN's Frank Buckley sat down with the first lady to talk about that.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

FRANK BUCKLEY, CNN CORRESPONDENT (on camera): So much has been made of the idea that somehow you are stealing the spotlight from Al Gore. What do you have to say to people who have been saying things like that?

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), N.Y. SENATE CANDIDATE: Well, of course, that's not the case. We are trying to shine the spotlight on Al and Joe by talking about the issues that they stand for and the progress that has been made under the Clinton-Gore administration and why a Gore-Lieberman administration would be the best thing for America.

And we're going to be doing everything we can to get that message across and certainly when the president speaks Monday night he's going to be talking about the accomplishments of this administration and the work that remains to be done and why Al and Joe are the best people to do it.

BUCKLEY: As you look back on the president's legacy, what would you like President Clinton to be remembered for?

RODHAM CLINTON: I think that he restored our economic well being and our national spirit and if you look at the accomplishments that resulted from the change in direction that he brought to the White House and that he and Al have managed and led us through, he's really positioned America well for the 21st century.

And one of the strongest arguments for Al Gore is that he understands the future. He knows where we're going. He really gets technology and the scientific changes that are so rapidly transforming the way we live. So we can build on the hard work that the president and the vice president had to do these last eight years to really straighten things out.

I think that anybody who fairly looks at what they inherited when they went into the White House in 1993 knows there was a lot of work to be done.

Now, though, we're in a very strong position here at home and around the world and the question is what are we going to do with that? And we have a very clear choice because the other party offers a recipe for going back to the past. They wrap it up in the talk of the future and nice sounding rhetoric, but if you look at their economic plans and where they stand on other important issues like education and health care, it's really a sound for retreat and Al and Joe are going to be building on the new Democrat philosophy that Bill and Al brought to the White House and I would hope that every American really understands what's at stake in this election.

BUCKLEY: One of the things that Rick Lazio says over and over again is ask Hillary Clinton what she has done for New York during the past 30 years. What have you done?

RODHAM CLINTON: Well, you know, there are so many answers to that and one of the first is that I supported Bill Clinton and Al Gore and that was good for New York. And we've seen the results of that. But I've also had a long record of work on behalf of children and families going back 30 years. And I took that work with me to the White House. And so when I worked to reform the foster care and adoption system, that certainly helped people all over the country, including New York. And when I worked for the children's health insurance program that began to insure the children of working families, that's also helped a lot of people.

I think on so many issues where I've stood is where most New Yorkers stand. And time and time again, my opponent has voted with the Republican leadership and against the interests of New York. So I can't wait for the debates and for us being able to talk to him about his record, which he doesn't seem interested in really admitting or acknowledging or discussing because when people know what he's done and what I've stood for, I think they will feel very comfortable voting for me.

BUCKLEY: As you look back over the past year, was it what you expected?

RODHAM CLINTON: Well, I didn't know what to expect because even though I had been around political campaigns for many years, I had never been a candidate before and never had really visualized it or thought about doing it. I've had a lot to learn. It has been an incredible experience. I thank the literally tens of thousands of New Yorkers who have been kind and supportive to me along the way. I've enjoyed traveling to all 62 counties and really seeing firsthand what the problems of the state are and telling people what I would do as senator to try to deal with those.

So it's been an absolutely wonderful personal experience for me and I want to put that experience to work for New York. BUCKLEY: In the polls, you consistently stay in the 40s. What will you do to get through that and to achieve the margin that you need to win?

RODHAM CLINTON: Well, you know, I think most people aren't really focused on any election until after Labor Day. There's, well, you know, discussion about issues and people get to meet candidates, but until the fall comes there's not a real commitment to sorting it all out. And as people really look at the differences between us and realize that, you know, I'm pro-choice, he's multiple choice. I'm for the Million Man March agenda to license handgun owners and register handguns and he doesn't agree with that and calls it intrusive. And I'm for getting money for modernizing and constructing schools in New York and he's voted against it. I'm for a patients' bill of rights that actually holds HMOs accountable. He's for the Republican leadership bill that doesn't.

There are so many differences between us and time and time again I have been convinced that New Yorkers when they know those differences are going to be voting for me.

KYRA PHILLIPS, CNN ANCHOR: With President Clinton and first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton in Los Angeles this weekend raising money for their own personal causes, there have been some grumbings from the Gore campaign that the Clintons are stealing the spotlight from the vice president.

CNN's Frank Buckley sat down with the first lady to talk about that.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

FRANK BUCKLEY, CNN CORRESPONDENT (on camera): So much has been made of the idea that somehow you are stealing the spotlight from Al Gore. What do you have to say to people who have been saying things like that?

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), N.Y. SENATE CANDIDATE: Well, of course, that's not the case. We are trying to shine the spotlight on Al and Joe by talking about the issues that they stand for and the progress that has been made under the Clinton-Gore administration and why a Gore-Lieberman administration would be the best thing for America.

And we're going to be doing everything we can to get that message across and certainly when the president speaks Monday night he's going to be talking about the accomplishments of this administration and the work that remains to be done and why Al and Joe are the best people to do it.

RODHAM CLINTON: I think that he restored our economic well being and our national spirit and if you look at the accomplishments that resulted from the change in direction that he brought to the White House and that he and Al have managed and led us through, he's really positioned America well for the 21st century.

And one of the strongest arguments for Al Gore is that he understands the future. He knows where we're going. He really gets technology and the scientific changes that are so rapidly transforming the way we live. So we can build on the hard work that the president and the vice president had to do these last eight years to really straighten things out.

I think that anybody who fairly looks at what they inherited when they went into the White House in 1993 knows there was a lot of work to be done.

Now, though, we're in a very strong position here at home and around the world and the question is what are we going to do with that? And we have a very clear choice because the other party offers a recipe for going back to the past. They wrap it up in the talk of the future and nice sounding rhetoric, but if you look at their economic plans and where they stand on other important issues like education and health care, it's really a sound for retreat and Al and Joe are going to be building on the new Democrat philosophy that Bill and Al brought to the White House and I would hope that every American really understands what's at stake in this election.

BUCKLEY: One of the things that Rick Lazio says over and over again is ask Hillary Clinton what she has done for New York during the past 30 years. What have you done?

RODHAM CLINTON: Well, you know, there are so many answers to that and one of the first is that I supported Bill Clinton and Al Gore and that was good for New York. And we've seen the results of that. But I've also had a long record of work on behalf of children and families going back 30 years. And I took that work with me to the White House. And so when I worked to reform the foster care and adoption system, that certainly helped people all over the country, including New York. And when I worked for the children's health insurance program that began to insure the children of working families, that's also helped a lot of people.

I think on so many issues where I've stood is where most New Yorkers stand. And time and time again, my opponent has voted with the Republican leadership and against the interests of New York. So I can't wait for the debates and for us being able to talk to him about his record, which he doesn't seem interested in really admitting or acknowledging or discussing because when people know what he's done and what I've stood for, I think they will feel very comfortable voting for me.

BUCKLEY: As you look back over the past year, was it what you expected?

RODHAM CLINTON: Well, I didn't know what to expect because even though I had been around political campaigns for many years, I had never been a candidate before and never had really visualized it or thought about doing it. I've had a lot to learn. It has been an incredible experience. I thank the literally tens of thousands of New Yorkers who have been kind and supportive to me along the way. I've enjoyed traveling to all 62 counties and really seeing firsthand what the problems of the state are and telling people what I would do as senator to try to deal with those.

So it's been an absolutely wonderful personal experience for me and I want to put that experience to work for New York. BUCKLEY: In the polls, you consistently stay in the 40s. What will you do to get through that and to achieve the margin that you need to win?

RODHAM CLINTON: Well, you know, I think most people aren't really focused on any election until after Labor Day. There's, well, you know, discussion about issues and people get to meet candidates, but until the fall comes there's not a real commitment to sorting it all out. And as people really look at the differences between us and realize that, you know, I'm pro-choice, he's multiple choice. I'm for the Million Man March agenda to license handgun owners and register handguns and he doesn't agree with that and calls it intrusive. And I'm for getting money for modernizing and constructing schools in New York and he's voted against it. I'm for a patients' bill of rights that actually holds HMOs accountable. He's for the Republican leadership bill that doesn't.

There are so many differences between us and time and time again I have been convinced that New Yorkers when they know those differences are going to be voting for me.

"Larry King Live," CNN, 8/14/2000

KING: We're back on night one of the Democratic National Convention: various female United States senators and congresswomen are speaking to the crowds in advance of Hillary Rodham Clinton, the outgoing first lady, candidate for the U.S. Senate in New York. She will address the 43rd Democratic National Convention in the next hour. Her husband will be following her to the podium.

I interviewed Mrs. Clinton just a day ago. I began by asking if she felt funny attending this convention.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D-NY), U.S. SENATE CANDIDATE: I feel great being here. You know, I get to...

KING (on camera): It's kind of weird, though, isn't it, at the end?

CLINTON: Well, you know, it's bittersweet in the sense that this has been an extraordinary eight years, but I'm very happy about Al Gore and Joe Lieberman, and I feel so energized by the ticket and the differences between them and their Republican counterparts that I just want everybody in the country to sort of see Al the way that I see him and to understand what's at stake in the election.

KING: Were you surprised that Joe Lieberman got picked?

CLINTON: Well, as it got toward the end of the decision being made, I knew there was a short list, and I knew Joe was on the short list. And I've known Joe for 30 years and have admired him, and really like him and Hadassah so much.

And I know that on many of the issues that count he has been along the lines of the president and the vice president as one of the leaders of the new Democratic Party.

So I really wasn't surprised; I thought it was a great choice, and I think the country reacted so positively because it was self-evidently a good choice.

KING: The man who was going to run against you, Rudy Giuliani, told us the other night that he thinks that this selection helps you a great deal in New York. From a personal standpoint, doesn't it?

CLINTON: Well, I would hope so, because I would hope that New Yorkers really understand the differences between me and my opponent, and between Al and Joe and their opponents. And any time we can get the focus on the issues it helps me.

KING: Were you surprised at the Jewish element? I mean, that was the drawback, wasn't it? I mean, Joe Lieberman, the question was, "Should a Jew be on a national ticket? How much of America still has anti-Semitic feelings?" What are your thoughts in that area?

CLINTON: I think Joe Lieberman is eminently qualified. I believe that he was a great choice on the merits. And I think it's wonderful that in addition of his being so well-qualified to be president and therefore to be an excellent candidate for vice president, as the vice president has said, you know, we've broken down some more barriers. And as Jesse Jackson memorably said, "Every time any barrier in America is broken down, it opens doors to everyone else."

KING: And what -- what's with Hillary and the Jewish community in New York?

CLINTON: I -- I think...

KING: Reading it from afar, everyone says you're in trouble with the Jewish vote in New York, and the question is, why?

CLINTON: Well, I don't feel that. I feel very supported. Certainly, some of my very biggest supporters are standing behind me all the way. But I think it's just a question of people getting to know me, know my stands on issues here at home and abroad, particularly with respect to my strong support for Israel's security and well-being and what I've tried to do to promote that over the years.

And on domestic issues, whether it's the fact that I'm pro-choice and my opponent is not, that I am going to be willing to stand up against the gun lobby and fight for the licensing of handgun owners and the registration of handguns, and where I stand on the economy and education and health care and the environment, the issues that New Yorkers care about, I think, I will have great support across the board in the state.

KING: And you have been greeted well by the Jewish community?

CLINTON: Oh yes.

KING: Of course, you did have that problem with...

CLINTON: Well, you know, I was there as a first lady.

KING: That was ceremonial though, wasn't it?

CLINTON: It was ceremonial, and as soon as we got an official translation, I condemned what she said. But I think that most people are looking at this election as to what it's going to mean for the future.

KING: Oh, you didn't know what she was saying when she said it?

CLINTON: Well...

KING: But you've also come out now for Jerusalem as the capital, right?

CLINTON: Oh, I did that more than a year ago, publicly.

KING: Before your husband.

CLINTON: Well, that's probably right. But I did come out in a letter that I wrote; I reiterated that. But I've also made clear that we here in America need to support the decisions that the Israeli government and the Israeli people make for the best interests of Israel, and that means the security and the peace that they can seek and that we can guarantee and can stand behind.

So my opinions or your opinions or anyone here in America's opinions really don't count as much as what the people and government of Israel decide.

KING: Are you glad you're making this race?

CLINTON: I am having the time of my life.

KING: Now, that you have the advantage of hindsight, glad you did it?

CLINTON: Absolutely. I'm enjoying it so much. I didn't know what it would feel like to be a candidate because I'd never done it before.

KING: What does it feel like? What is it like?

CLINTON: Well, it's very different. You know, for 30 years I've worked on behalf of causes and candidates and particularly on behalf of my husband in his many races, and I've always enjoyed doing that, thought it was important, never really believed I would be on the other side of that line, being a candidate myself, and it takes some getting used to. There's a real learning curve. Even if you've been around it for years, as I have, once you're the person on the front line, who is, you know, making the statements and doing the interviews about not out what someone else believes whom you're supporting, but what you believe and what you'll fight for -- it's a very different feeling.

KING: So it's not "Vote for him"; it's "Vote for me."

CLINTON: That's right.

KING: How about fund raising? Some people have said the hardest thing in politics is to ask for money.

CLINTON: It's very hard.

KING: Now you're asking for you. It's thing to ask for someone else. Is that hard?

CLINTON: Well, it's hard, but you have to do it. I want to change the system; that's why I support campaign finance reform, because I don't think it's a good system for our democracy. But it is the system we have, and if you believe strongly, as I do, that we need to continue the progress of the last eight years and that it's important who is a partner in the Senate with Al and Joe, then you go out and you work as hard as you can, and that includes raising the money to make the campaign.

KING: An old friend of ours, Marvin Davis (ph), told me that you told him seven years ago you wanted to live in New York.

CLINTON: Yes, that's true.

KING: That this wasn't the -- way before this Senate jump.

CLINTON: I've always wanted to live in New York.

KING: Why?

CLINTON: Why not? I mean, there isn't any place like it.

KING: You're a Chicagoan, though. That's...

CLINTON: But I've been -- you know, I've...

KING: "Big Shoulders."

CLINTON: You know, I've had a wonderful life, because, look, I was born and raised in Chicago. I went to school in New England, and law school. I got to live in Arkansas, made the friends of a lifetime there. Got to live in Washington.

But like so many other people from all over the world, I've always wanted to live in New York. And I told Marvin, I've told a lot of people over the years that after the White House years I wanted to move to New York and have a chance to experience New York City and everything that goes with it.

KING: And when you can't -- you don't experience it as an everyday New Yorker. I mean, you have the Secret Service and...

CLINTON: Well, it's a little different, Because I used to love going and just being able to walk down the street before the White House years: going to a museum, going to a play, going out to a great restaurant. It is a lot harder for me now, but that will get easier after Bill's no longer president.

KING: And how is Chelsea enjoying being part of a campaign, Chelsea, who you've sheltered so well, who we, the public, really don't know

CLINTON: Well, thank you. Thank you and the press for giving her the space...

KING: They have, haven't they?

CLINTON: They have, and I hope it continues with all the children involved in this presidential campaign. You know, the Bushes and the Gores and the Liebermans all have young children, not adults yet. So I hope that the pattern that has started with our daughter will continue. But I am -- I'm enjoying having her with us. She has always been a part of our life, and politics has always been a part of our family. So she has been with her -- with her -- with my husband, her father, been with me from time to time. And it's been a great treat.

KING: She's enjoying it?

CLINTON: Yes, she likes it. You know, and she -- you know, she's good to have around.

KING: Not bad. The times I've known her, she's a terrific person.

CLINTON: Thank you.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

KING: We'll have more of our interview with Hillary Clinton, which we taped on Saturday afternoon right here at the convention site, at the bottom of the hour. When we come back, one of the world's superstars, the incredible Cher, will join us. Always been

More now of the Hillary Clinton interview we started showing you earlier in the program. I asked the first lady about the contrition comments that her husband made last week before a gathering of ministers in Illinois.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

CLINTON: Well, I don't have anything to add to what he said. I think that what's important here at this convention and certainly what's important in this election is the future. And it's very clear to me that if you look at the public record of this administration, and what Bill Clinton and Al Gore have meant to America and the world, this shouldn't even be a close election. But I think we have to really get people to focus on what's at stake in their lives and what the decisions are going to be.

KING: Were you surprised, though, that he did come forward that way?

CLINTON: You know, he felt moved to speak and he did, and I don't have anything to add to that.

KING: How is that going?

CLINTON: He's great; he's doing very well and he's very focused on every day being the best president he can be. And of course, he is absolutely committed to doing everything he can to get the message out as to why Al and Joe would be so good for the country.

KING: And how, frankly, are you doing, emotionally? I mean, you went through a tough thing. The whole world knew. You know, when you see the whole -- it's embarrassing. Hard to come through? It's got to be tough. CLINTON: But you know, that's my business, and I don't talk about my personal business, and I feel strongly that what goes on in a marriage or a family should remain in that marriage and in that family. And I'm very, you know, happy doing what I'm doing. I feel very committed to making this race, because I believe so strongly in these issues. I have worked on them for 30 years. It's what I care most about in public life, and that's what I do every day.

KING: And the rest is none of our business.

CLINTON: That's right.

KING: What about -- why do you think people hate you? I mean, lots of people love you, and a lot of people have just judged you politically. But why do you engender, do you think, so much anger?

CLINTON: Well, you know, I think some of it is because of what I stand for and what I've done...

KING: It has to be more than that. Other people stand for those things.

CLINTON: Well, I think that people who are, for example, anti-choice or against gun safety measures, they know that I really mean it. I mean, it's not just a political view for me. I mean, it is something that I've come to after my life experience that I believe strongly in a woman's right to choose as part of the Constitution, and to make it clear that I've been in countries where that right was taken away from women, and I will fight very hard to prevent that from happening here.

Or when I stand up against the gun lobby, I'm not winking. I'm not saying that I'll fight only this hard and no harder. I think we've got too much violence in this country. There are too many guns falling into the hands of children and criminals. And I'm going to fight very hard to take that on.

And there are so many issues that I have a long track record on, that I have been out-front on.

You know, back in 1983, people were upset with me because I was among the first people to say that we needed to improve the quality of teachers, and I advocated teacher testing, and I was, you know, booed and I was boycotted, but I did what I thought was right.

KING: You also changed a lot. You were a Goldwater girl.

CLINTON: I was a Goldwater girl. But you know what...

KING: But why...

CLINTON: ... I've always believed in doing what you think is right for you. And sometimes people are, you know, not in agreement with me, and I just... KING: But it's more than that: It seems that you engender -- women have written books about you with, I think they would admit it, venom.

CLINTON: Who've never met me.

KING: I know. Why do you think...

CLINTON: Well, I don't know. You'd have to ask them as I'm sure you have.

KING: Do you ever wonder about it?

CLINTON: You know, but so much of it is politically motivated. There's...

KING: Just that?

CLINTON: Well, I'm not saying all of it, but so much of it is. There's a political and partisan agenda to it. There's an ideological bent to it. A lot of the people who write those things and say those things, you know, they loved the policies of Ronald Reagan and President George Bush.

I disagreed with them. I believe we're a better country than we were in 1992. I believe that our economy had to be turned around, and we had to make some very tough decisions.

You know, you go back to the kind of vitriol that really greeted both Bill and me when he began to run for president. It is hard to explain, except if you look...

KING: Because you basically were moderate, right?

CLINTON: Of course, but we were very intent upon changing things, and now I'm intent on preventing those positive changes from being reversed.

You know, just think about it, Larry: We worked so hard as a nation to get our economic house in order. If you look at what George W. Bush and my opponent, for example, are supporting, the Republican economic plan, it doesn't add up. The arithmetic is just not there, and the result would be to send us back to deficits and disinvestment.

Now, it's perfectly fine if somebody wants to believe that's the right thing to do, but I have a right, and I will fight with every fiber of my being, to say, "That's not good for America."

KING: Do you expect a very close, tough race?

CLINTON: I think races in America today are all close and tough.

KING: Do you know Rick Lazio?

CLINTON: I have met him, but I don't know him.

KING: Just perfunctory meeting.

CLINTON: Yes. I mean, I've learned a lot about his record, which he doesn't seem to want to own up to. So I'm going to be...

KING: Are you ready for debates?

CLINTON: Absolutely, I can't wait for them. I've challenged him to do even more than he's agreed to, because I want people to see me not as some kind of mythological figure that other people talk about, but here I am, here's what I believe in, here's what I've stood for, here are the values I was raised with, here's why I am doing this. I have worked on these issues since I was a young woman. I've never stopped working on them. I took my concerns for foster children and poor education and inadequate health care with me into the White House, where I kept working on it.

I want people to know that I am a consistent, strong voice for what I believe in, and if someone goes into a polling booth to vote against me, I want them to know what they're doing. I want them to understand, not what some, you know, paid-for talking head has to say about me...

KING: What did you think of the Republican convention?

CLINTON: Well, I thought it was a show that didn't have a lot of substance, that tried, and effectively did, mask the differences that exist within their party, and the very strong policies that they have put forward that have not been good for the country, and the Congress that the president and the vice president and others have had to beat back.

I thought that they tried to blur the distinctions between the Democrats and Republicans, and it was a bravura performance, but it didn't have much to do with the substance or policies of their candidates or their party.

KING: See you in New York.

CLINTON: Yes, you will.

KING: Yes, we'll, after Labor Day, we're going to see a lot of you.

Hillary Rodham Clinton, first lady of the United States. It's her last convention as first lady. She might be here as a senator. One never knows.

CLINTON: Hope so.

"The World Today," CNN, 8/15/2000

When our special report returns, first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton reflects on the past seven and a half years at the White House and what the future may hold in store.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

MORET: First lady Hillary Rodham Clinton set the stage for her husband's keynote speech. In her address, Mrs. Clinton had to pull off a triple task, boosting her husband's legacy, the Gore-Lieberman ticket and her own candidacy for the U.S. Senate. As CNN's Frank Buckley tells us, it all started with a rousing welcome.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: Hillary Rodham Clinton!

FRANK BUCKLEY, CNN CORRESPONDENT: First lady Hillary Clinton was welcomed to the stage at the Democratic national convention by a group of women she hopes to join, all of them Democratic U.S. senators.

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), FIRST LADY, NEW YORK SENATE CANDIDATE: Thank you, thank you, thank you!

BUCKLEY: The first lady received like a rock star by her fellow Democrats to the song "New York, New York," the Senate candidate devoting much of her 16-minute address to issues of children. CLINTON: What will it take to make sure no child in America is left behind in the 21st century? It takes responsible parents who put their own children first. It takes all of us, teachers and workers and business owners and community leaders and people of faith. And you know, I still believe it takes a village.

BUCKLEY: She invoked the familiar title of a book she authored and touched on familiar themes from her Senate campaign, including gun control laws, the minimum wage and health care.

CLINTON: It's time to pass a real patients' bill of rights and provide access to affordable health care to every child and family in this country.

BUCKLEY: The first lady thanked Americans for what she called "the honor and blessing of a lifetime," eight years in the White House. Mrs. Clinton said the U.S. was stronger and better than it was in 1992, and she suggested that voters should support the Democratic national ticket in November.

CLINTON: How can we continue America's progress? By electing Al Gore and Joe Lieberman the next president and vice president of the United States!

BUCKLEY: And in her only mention of the office she is seeking, she was nostalgic.

CLINTON: Bill and I are closing one chapter of our lives, and soon we'll be starting a new one. For me, it will be up to the people of New York to decide whether I'll have the privilege of serving them in the United States Senate.

BUCKLEY (on-camera): If it were up to the Democrats gathered here, it would be no contest. But polls suggest it will be a very close contest that decides if the first lady leaves the White House and enters the U.S. Senate.

"Ahead of the Curve," CNN, 9/14/2000

CNN's Frank Buckley looks at some of the more engaging moments.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

FRANK BUCKLEY, CNN CORRESPONDENT (voice-over): Congressman Rick Lazio and first lady Hillary Clinton were friendly as they met before the debate. But their political rhetoric during the clash cut through their cordiality, both candidates sprinkling New York-isms into their digs. Lazio aggressively confronting Clinton throughout the debate.

REP. FRANK LAZIO (R), NEW YORK SENATE CANDIDATE: In New York we say you've got to tell liked it is. And the way it is is that Mrs. Clinton has had two opportunities to make policy, one on health care and one on education. And on health care, it was unmitigated disaster.

BUCKLEY: Mrs. Clinton, on Lazio's claim of being independent in the House of Representatives, using an oft-used Yiddish word meaning, utter nerve.

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK SENATE CANDIDATE: Listening to the congressman's response reminds me of a word I have heard a lot of this past year, chutzpah. He stands here and tells us that he's a moderate mainstream independent member of Congress. Well, in fact, he was a deputy whip to Newt Gingrich, he voted to shut the government down, he voted to cut $270 billion for Medicare, he voted for the biggest education cuts in our history.

BUCKLEY: Lazio, saying Mrs. Clinton's comments redefined the word chutzpah.

LAZIO: Mrs. Clinton you, of all people, shouldn't try to make guilt by association. Newt Gingrich isn't running in this race, I'm running in this race.

BUCKLEY: The moderator Tim Russert, to Mrs. Clinton, about her initial response in the Monica Lewinsky scandal, asked the First Lady if she regretted misleadingly the American people.

CLINTON: Obviously, I didn't mislead anyone, I didn't know the truth. And there's a great deal of pain associated with that, and my husband has certainly acknowledged that, and made it clear that he did mislead the country, as well as his family.

BUCKLEY: The candidates exchanged differing views on issues like the struggling upstate economy, Lazio suggesting it has turned a corner, Mrs. Clinton, quoting from a series of newspaper articles about the economy.

CLINTON: Referred to my opponent as "orbiting another planet."

BUCKLEY: On education, Lazio described Mrs. Clinton's record of reform in Arkansas as a disaster.

LAZIO: I don't think we need that Little Rock record in the Big Apple.

BUCKLEY: And when Lazio pulled out a recent pledge that both candidates forego soft money, Mrs. Clinton called it a wonderful performance.

CLINTON: You did it very well...

LAZIO: I'm not asking you to admire it I'm asking you to sign it.

CLINTON: Well, I would be happy to when you give me the signed letter...

CLINTON: We'll shake on this one.

LAZIO: No, I want your signature, because I think everybody wants to see you signing something that you said you were for.

BUCKLEY (on camera): In the end, both campaigns said the opposing candidate made factual misstatements during the debate. And both sides declared victory. Voters will have the final say, and at least one more look at the candidates clashing in debate. They meet again October 8th.

Frank Buckley, CNN, New York.

Senate Debate with Rick Lazio, "CNN Live Event/Special," CNN, 10/8/2000

First lady Hillary Rodham Clinton and Congressman Rick Lazio face each other in the second New York Senate debate.

ANNOUNCER: This is an Election 2000 live event. First lady Hillary Rodham Clinton and Congressman Rick Lazio face each other in the New York Senate debate. Now from Washington, here is CNN's Wolf Blitzer.

WOLF BLITZER, CNN ANCHOR: Today for only the second time, the two candidates for U.S. Senate in New York state will face off. It's the most closely watched contest in Election 2000 other than the race for the White House. For much of the campaign, first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton and Congressman Rick Lazio had been running roughly even in the polls, but recent surveys have shown the first lady edging ahead as the race now enters its final month.

The second debate is about to begin. It's scheduled to last for one hour. Immediately following the debate, we will begin an extended "LATE EDITION," including reaction from both camps and special interviews with Democratic vice presidential candidate Joe Lieberman and Secretary of State Madeleine Albright.

One of the key issues that has emerged in the first debate was campaign finance reform. Last month, both New York Senate candidates agreed to a ban on so-called "soft money" to finance television campaign ads, but that agreement remains tentative at best. Both candidates can be expected to be asked about this and many other issues as this debate goes forward.

We now go to the studios of CNN affiliate WCBS in New York City.

MARCIA KRAMER, WCBS-TV: Good morning. I'm Marcia Kramer, political correspondent for WCBS-TV.

Well, the stage is set. Our candidates are here: Democratic Hillary Clinton and Republican candidate Rick Lazio. I'm joined by our panel of reporters, who'll be joining me in questioning the candidates. First CNN senior political correspondent Jeff Greenfield, "New York Daily News" political columnist Lars-Erik Nelson, "New York Times" columnist Joyce Purnick, and representing "The New York Post," political reporter Greg Birnbaum.

More than 200 people are here in our audience from across the state to watch the second New York Senate debate. We should mention, though, that our Web site viewers have been submitting questions for the past several weeks, and we've incorporated some of those questions into the debate.

First some quick ground rules. Quickly, each candidate will be allowed 90 seconds to answer the question. The other candidate will have 45 seconds to offer a rebuttal. By a flip of the coin, the first question goes to Mrs. Clinton.

Mrs. Clinton, figures from the independent budget office show that New York state lost over $200 million in federal aid after Chuck Schumer defeated Senator Al D'Amato and New York no longer had a senator in the majority party. Since the Senate is expected to stay in the Republican hands, how would you deliver for the state of New York as a junior senator from a minority party and a person that the Republicans would clearly want to humiliate?

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK SENATE CANDIDATE: Well, Marcia, first let me thank you for moderating this discussion. And I thank our panelists and the audience and mostly everyone who's watching at home. And I do want, Mr. Lazio, to put your mind at ease, in case you've been worrying. I won't be coming to your podium today.

CLINTON: But I will be addressing the issues that are important to New York. And one of the issues I've been talking about ever since I got into this race was how we could get more of New York's fair share. I think this is a problem that Senator Moynihan has put on the table, and we need to really address it. We have a chance to do that because we now have a surplus. One of the biggest injustices is the Medicaid formula. And I've come forward with a plan that would get us more money in New York.

I believe that the objective of the Senate is to do the best job you can for the state you represent, which I intend to do for New York. And I look forward to working with Chuck Schumer, who has been a vigorous and effective advocate.

Now, the problem is that the Republicans have control of the Senate and the House. I hope that changes in this election. I think there's a good chance it will. But the Senate is dominated by people who don't necessarily agree with how we need to do things here in New York, and I would be a vigorous proponent of what we need and an opponent of what would hurt New York. And I would look forward to being a good partner with Chuck Schumer.

KRAMER: Mr. Lazio, your rebuttal?

REP. RICK LAZIO (R-NY), SENATE CANDIDATE: I think this is incredibly important for New York. New York has had a history, up until this last election, of having one senator in each party of influence. I'm looking forward to working with Chuck Schumer in the Senate. I work with him in the House. I've been in the minority and the majority. And let me tell you, I know that in the majority, it's the people in the majority who craft the bills, who write the language, who are in a position to actually get the job done.

Now, New York sends $15 billion a year more to Washington than we get back. I think we need somebody in the majority party who can well -- work well with others, who can cross party lines, who can be independent and who's got the ability to make sure that New York gets its fair share. And I think I'm that person.

KRAMER: OK, Mr. Lazio, our viewers wanted to know about your relationship with Newt Gingrich. Mr. Lazio, you were the deputy whip under Newt Gingrich at a time when government was actually shut down, and you voted under the "Contract with America" to shut down the United States Department of Education. Are you proud of the work that you did, and do you think that the Gingrich policies were good for New York?

LAZIO: Well, first of all, Marcia, I would say that's not accurate. What we did do is to try and send bills to the president, which the president vetoed. In fact, it was the work of people like me on the Budget Committee that got to the first balanced budget in a generation. And the fact is, on education, for the last three years, I voted for the highest levels of federal aid to education in our history, in part because we made the tough decisions back in 1994.

Yes, we voted to balance the budget. Yes, we voted for Welfare reform. It's had the result here in New York of sending hundreds of thousands of New Yorkers back into the workforce, ending dependency. Yes, we voted for a strong national defense. I believed in those things then. I believe in those things now. And I think the votes that we took back then helped put us on the path where we're able to make the investments in education, where we're able to reduce the Welfare rolls, where we're able to reduce taxes and create jobs here in New York.

KRAMER: Mrs. Clinton?

CLINTON: Well, it's not my opponent's association with Mr. Gingrich that bothers me, it's the fact that he voted with him. He voted with him time and time again to shut the government down, to eliminate the Department of Education, to cut $270 billion from Medicare.

Now, this is not ancient history because just last week on "Meet the Press," when he was asked what he thought about those votes, he said that Gingrich was a figure of historic importance, and he had absolutely no regrets.

I think we need someone representing New York who would not have voted with Newt Gingrich. If it had not been for President Clinton, the government would have been shut down and many of the programs that my opponent now talks about wouldn't even be in existence anymore.

KRAMER: OK, Mrs. Clinton, we asked our viewers to come up with some questions for this debate, and we were surprised at what they wanted to know about you. They want to know more about you as a person. Quite frankly, Mrs. Clinton, they wanted to know why, after all the revelations and pain of the last few years, and because you are such a role model, why you stayed with your husband.

CLINTON: Well, you know, Marcia, I've answered that question and I've addressed it in various forums. For my entire life, I have worked to make sure women had the choices they could make in their own lives that were right for them. I've made my choices. I'm here with my daughter, of whom I'm very proud. We have a family that means a lot to us. And I'm going to continue to stand up and speak out for what I believe, what I think is important. And many of my experiences in my life will give me insights into what I can do to be a good senator.

You know, I've had first-hand experience in balancing family and work. I've had to worry about making sure that my parents, my late father and my mother, were well taken care of, as well as taking care of my daughter. The choices that I've made in my life are right for me. I can't talk about anybody else's choice. I can only say that mine are rooted in my religious faith, in my strong sense of family, and in what I believe is right and important.

I want to go to the Senate to stand up for women's choices and women's rights, as I have done around the world in every chance that I've been given. And I want to be sure that there's a voice in the Senate that reminds us that with all the advances that women have, we're still threatened with the right to choose that might disappear if the wrong person is elected president, the wrong people are elected to the Senate. So I think my experience as a woman, as a person, will make me the kind of senator who will really understand what's at stake.

KRAMER: Mr. Lazio, rebuttal?

LAZIO: Well, I think this was Mrs. Clinton's choice, and I respect whatever choice that she makes. The fact is that this race is about the issues, about who can be most effective for New York, that who has got the skills to build bipartisan alliances and get the job done, who can go out there and make sure that New York gets its fair share.

Mrs. Clinton raised this issue, as she has before, on the so-called cut in Medicare. It's false. "New York Daily News," in an editorial, called it false. In fact, we would be spending more money this year on Medicare than we would have under the president's budget last year if we would have supported the bill that she criticizes now. The fact is, that we've been increasing our commitment to Medicare, and I think New Yorkers should know that.

KRAMER: OK, Mr. Lazio, choice is a big issue in this campaign. The next senator from the state of New York will have to approve as many as four Supreme Court Justices. I'd like you to take a look at the nine current members of the Supreme Court and tell me which one specifically most typifies the kind of jurist you would vote for and why.

LAZIO: I would -- may I? I would say Sandra Day O'Connor. I think she had the right -- she's got the right intellect, the right experience. She has a respect for precedence. I think she has had a distinguished career on the bench. And that's what I think a senator should look for when it comes to confirmation. And this is consistent with, frankly, what both Vice President Al Gore said and what Governor Bush said in their debates. Look for the most experienced, qualified person, no litmus tests. Let's make sure we get somebody who has a healthy respect for precedent, who's got the ability to make good decisions and who's got a -- hopefully, a good experience of being on the bench and having the temperament that we would want to have as somebody who's going to be serving on America's highest court.

KRAMER: Mrs. Clinton?

CLINTON: Well, I think that the fate of the Supreme Court hangs in the balance in this election. If we take Governor Bush at his word, his two favorite Justices are Scalia and Thomas, both of whom are committed to overturning Roe v. Wade, ending a woman's right to choose. I could not go along with that. In the Senate, I will be looking very carefully at the constitutional views that any nominee from, I hope, Vice President Gore, but in the event, unfortunately, of President Bush, as to what that nominee believes about basic, fundamental, constitutional rights. Just as I could not support a nominee who would vote to overturn Roe v. Wade, I wouldn't support someone who would vote to overturn Brown versus Board of Education. I have strong feelings about fundamental constitutional rights that I would take with me to the Senate.

KRAMER: OK, the next question is from Jeff Greenfield of CNN to Mrs. Clinton.

JEFF GREENFIELD, CNN SENIOR POLITICAL ANALYST: Mrs. Clinton, there are Democrats -- Senator Bob Kerrey one of them -- who thinks it's a good idea that workers should be able to take some of their money and invest it on their own. Your -- you say that's too risky, that the government's going to do that for them.

There are Democrats like Bob Reich, former labor secretary, who says it's really important that poor folks maybe get vouchers to get them out of a failed public school system. You're adamantly opposed to vouchers for those folks without the means, they're going to -- it's public schools or nothing. And there are Democrats -- John Kennedy was one of them -- who favored across-the-board tax cuts. You favor targeted tax cuts, which means that they go to people who engage in activities the government approves of.

My question is why are you so reluctant to let people without means make the choices that more affluent people make for themselves?

CLINTON: Well, Jeff, I believe strongly in empowering people to make the best decisions in their own lives. With respect to the Democratic Party, we have a broad range of views. There are Democrats who don't agree with me on a balanced budget or Welfare reform or the death penalty. So there's a very vigorous debate within the Democratic Party.

With respect to the issues you've raised, I think we are currently underfunding our inner-city schools, our urban school districts. I could not go along with siphoning money off for vouchers that would take money away from the schools that I go into around this state, schools that teachers are teaching in partitioned hallways, where the teacher has the only textbook in the classroom. Any voucher scheme that I've had described to me would be either too little or raise constitutional objections.

We know what works now in public education. If we can get class size down, if we can provide qualified teachers, if we can focus on the learning objectives, then I know that we can make a difference, and I have a plan to do that I've set forth in great specific detail. And we have differences, my opponent and I. I support adding 100,000 teachers to lower class size. He has voted against that. I support the bipartisan school construction funding authority that would permit New York to have the school construction it needs without raising property taxes. He's opposed that.

So on these issues, there is certainly vigorous disagreement, but I believe that when you have 90 percent of our children in the public schools, we need to pay attention to giving the public schools the resources they need.

KRAMER: Mr. Lazio, your rebuttal?

LAZIO: Well, I think we've heard some fiction. Now let's try the facts. I have voted twice to support hiring additional teachers for the classroom. And under my plan that I support, New York would not get shortchanged. Under Mrs. Clinton's plan, New Yorkers would once again be subsidizing Southern states.

Number two, I would say that I am in agreement with people who believe in empowerment, Jeff, who trust people. I think it's immoral to force a child to go to a school where they can't learn. There are over 107 schools in New York where children are trapped in failing schools. Some schools have been failing for 10 years. Poor parents want to have the choice to give their children the education that I want for my children. And they deserve to have that choice. They deserve to have their children go to a school where they can learn. I trust parents to make that decision, and that's a major philosophical difference.

KRAMER: Jeff, your next question is to Mr. Lazio.

GREENFIELD: Mr. Lazio, we heard Mrs. Clinton say she supports a woman's right to choose. I'm going to ask you, and I hope Mrs. Clinton, to help us see how you'd finish the sentence. Right now, a woman can choose to have an abortion for pretty much any reason: health, life, if she gets a sonogram that says she's carrying a girl and she wants a boy. And depending on what state you're in, she can abort that -- choose to abort a child either six months into the pregnancy or perhaps almost up to birth.

And I would like to know specifically, do you believe there are some circumstances where the government, as a matter of law, should say to a woman, "Under these circumstance, you don't have a right to choose"?

LAZIO: Well, I had a pro-choice record in the House, and I believe in a woman's right to choose, and my record clearly reflects that. But I do support a ban on partial-birth abortions. I think most New Yorkers support a ban on partial-birth abortions. Senator Moynihan called it "infanticide." Even former mayor Ed Koch agreed that this was too extreme a procedure. This is an area where I disagree with my opponent.

My opponent opposes a ban on partial-birth abortions. She is supported by NARAL, that is so extreme on this issue that it wants to kick the Vatican out of the U.N. because of its positions. And one of her supporters is a person who developed partial-birth abortions and who's done it hundreds of times. I don't agree with that. I think that's where we draw the line, on partial-birth abortions, but I do support a woman's right to choose, and my record reflects it.

CLINTON: Well, my opponent is just wrong. I have said many times that I can support a ban on late-term abortions, including partial-birth abortions, so long as the health and life of the mother is protected. I've met women who faced this heart-wrenching decision toward the end of a pregnancy. Of course it's a horrible procedure. No one would argue with that. But if your life is at stake, if your health is at stake, if the potential for having any more children is at stake, this must be a woman's choice.

Now, the Republicans, rather than wanting to craft legislation that would carve out the constitutional exception that Sandra Day O'Connor pointed to in her most recent decision about life and health, instead they'd rather play a political football game with this and put women's lives and health at risk.

KRAMER: OK, the next question is for Mrs. Clinton from Lars-Erik Nelson of the "Daily News."

LARS-ERIK NELSON, "NEW YORK DAILY NEWS": Ms. Clinton, good morning.

CLINTON: Good morning.

NELSON: In 1993, you were part of the health care task force that tried to extend coverage to more Americans -- in fact, all Americans. That failed, as you know. Now Mr. McDermott from Washington and Senator Wellstone from Minnesota both have universal coverage bills on the -- in the Congress. If you were elected, would you support those bills, or do you think -- have you been burned by the previous experience so you'd want to do it step by step?

CLINTON: Well, I'd rather refer to it as having been a learning experience, Lars Eric, because indeed, it was. And one of the things that I learned is that I think we need to take step-by-step progress toward the ultimate goal of providing quality affordable health insurance for every American. That's why when we weren't successful, I got back to work and worked to end drive-by deliveries, worked to expand Medicare to include mammography and worked especially on the Children's Health Insurance Program, which is doing very well here in New York, as a good example of what can be done.

I think that what we have to do now is add on these successes. That's why I'd like to expand the Children's Health Insurance Program further, all the way up to families making $51,000 a year. I'd like to make it possible for people between 55 and 65 to buy into Medicare. I'd like to make it also possible to deduct some of the cost of health insurance from families that don't have employer-based health care and aren't eligible for one of the publicly-supported programs. I want to see mental health considered on parity so that we treat a mental illness the same as we treat any other illness.

But there are big differences between me and my opponent. He's opposed the real "patients' bill of rights" that is supported in a bipartisan coalition, as well as by 300 medical and health groups. And he's gone for the Republican version of the prescription drug benefit on Medicare, which wouldn't cover 650,000 New Yorkers and millions of Americans.

So there's work to be done, and I'd like to be part of that work.

NELSON: Yeah.

LAZIO: First of all, let me just say that Mrs. Clinton's plan in 1993 would have been an unmitigated disaster for New York. No New Yorker would ever have written a bill that would have led to 75,000 jobs being destroyed, health care rationing and the destruction of many of our teaching hospitals, which are an incredible asset for New York.

I support biomedical discovery. I want to continue our search for a cure. That's why I've -- I have supported doubling the amount of money that we spend on health care research. I don't just talk about it, I have actually voted for deductibility for those employees who are not covered by an employer's plan to drive down the real cost of health care insurance and to allow full deductibility for the self-employed, which is an increasing percentage of New York's population in this new dot-com economy.

KRAMER: Lars, do you have another question for Mr. Lazio?

NELSON: Mr. Lazio, yes, sir. Good morning.

LAZIO: Good morning, Lars.

NELSON: The Senate is a lot closer than anybody once thought to maybe changing hands. There are races where Democrats are doing better and Republicans are doing worse. That would mean your election here as a senator could keep the Senate in the hands of a party that pretty much despises this state. We have Jesse Helms as chairman of Foreign Relations. We have Orrin Hatch as chairman of Judiciary. Why should a New Yorker want to vote to keep that line-up?

LAZIO: Let me, first of all, disagree with your characterization, Lars, with all due respect. As a matter of fact, Republicans who have run this state, like Governor George Pataki, who's in this audience -- I want to acknowledge him -- have turned this state around, have helped create hundreds of thousands of jobs and opportunity for New York, have driven down the Welfare rolls, that have helped New York, and Mayor Giuliani, who has brought safety back to our streets of New York City.

These are Republicans who care about New York and who are effective. And I think for New Yorkers, they need to have people that are effective legislators, who are effective representatives, and to have one person in each party. Now, we already have Chuck Schumer, who is a Democrat, and he's got his foot in one party. I think it's important for New Yorkers to have somebody who has a foot in the other party of influence. I disagree with you. It's the Republican Party.

But whether it's the Republican Party, Lars, or the Democratic Party, the point is, is that we want somebody who's got the flexibility, the independence, who's got the ability to cross party lines and work well with others to be effective and get the job done. That's what I've been doing as a member of the House of Representatives, to help New York on children's health, on protecting New York and its transportation formulas so that we can take care of our critical transportation needs, to make sure that we -- we provide enough affordable housing for our seniors, for the disabled. I've written legislation to do that.

I've worked closely with the people of New York to make sure that New York got treated not just fairly but well. That's because I am from New York. I'm from this state. My friends and family are here. My roots are here. And I'm going to protect and put New York first...

LAZIO: ... every single day in the Senate.

CLINTON: Well, I don't think I could defend Jesse Helms and Trent Lott and the people that Mr. Lazio will have to vote for. His first vote will be for continuing Trent Lott's majority leadership, unless what I think will happen, and that is the Democrats take over.

You know, I believe in bipartisanship, but there are certain things you cannot support, and there are certain votes that I would never make. And I would never be beholden to a Republican leadership that would say, "OK, it's time for us to have another one of those votes that we need." If you go back and look at my opponent's record, time and time again he's cast his lot with people who have not had New York's best interests or America's best interests in mind, as far as I'm concerned.

I think it's very likely that we'll have a Democratic Senate, but in any event, Chuck Schumer and I will be there fighting for New York.

KRAMER: OK, the next question for Mrs. Clinton is from Joyce Purnick of "The New York Times."

CLINTON: Good morning.

JOYCE PURNICK, "NEW YORK TIMES": Good morning.

CLINTON: How are you? PURNICK: Mrs. Clinton, I wanted to ask you about the drug war. We have been hearing increasingly from people on both sides of the aisle that it isn't working too well. A lot of people are saying that, in fact, it's failed, we've lost the drug war. We're spending $20 billion in federal money. There's still addiction. There are still -- there's still demand. There's still supply. And we have millions of people, many of them minorities, in prison. Some of them are there -- in fact, many of them because of non-violent, low-level drug connections and drug actions.

My question is, given the ramifications of this policy, and the cost, why the silence? Why haven't we heard from you -- and from you, Mr. Lazio, you will be rebutting on this question -- about an issue that has such an impact on so many people in this country?

CLINTON: Well, I have spoken out for quite some time, even before this race, on my belief that we should have drug courts that would serve as alternatives to the traditional criminal justice system for low-level offenders, for users. There are good examples around the country where such a court serves as a diversion. If the person comes before the court, agrees to stay clean, is subjected to drug tests once a week, at the end of the year, they are diverted from the criminal justice system.

I also believe strongly that we need more treatment. It is unfair to urge people to kick a habit, to get rid of their addiction, and not have the treatment facilities available that will be there when someone finally makes up their mind to go and get treatment.

On both of those counts, I think we have not done enough. And in the Senate, I would fight for especially New York having the kind of diversionary programs, more of them than what we do have now, but around the country it's important because drugs, as we know, go across borders. And I would fight hard for more treatment.

You know, we've made progress, though. I would have to take some issue with that. We have survived the terrible crack epidemic of the 1980s. We have a dropping rate of drug usage among many of the population groups in our society. But I couldn't disagree that we have more to do, and we should try different strategies that will make us more successful in both cutting the supply and the demand so that people can live without drugs.

LAZIO: Yeah. The truth is, Joyce, that, as a matter of fact, under this administration, under the Clinton administration, there has been a dramatic and troubling increase in drug use and drug abuse by our children. And that has not been addressed. In fact, it was many of us in Congress who sought to develop drug -- anti-drug tests for us at the community level.

I crossed party lines in 1994 and built a coalition of Republicans that passed the crime bill. If it were not for that, we would not have drug courts right now. We would not have community policing. We would not be addressing some of the prevention strategies that we are addressing now. We need to do a better job. But the fact is, we need to have somebody in Washington who's got the ability to cross party lines, to be independent, to bring others with him...

KRAMER: Mr. Lazio...

LAZIO: ... to get the job done.

KRAMER: ... out of time. The next question is from Joyce Purnick to Mr. Lazio.

PURNICK: I still don't know why you don't talk about it in the campaign, but I will move on.

PURNICK: I'd like to ask you about an issue that's come up in the last few days, which is campaign finance reform. I think it's fair to say that voluntary deals are not the best way to go about this, as we have learned. It's almost impossible to pull off. The McCain-Feingold bill that both of you support has loopholes and raises constitutional questions.

My question for you, Mr. Lazio, is will you reconsider supporting public financing of campaigns, as we have in New York City? Mayor Giuliani is here. You can ask him. He's a Republican. I believe he supports it. He participated in it. Can you change your mind and consider it, since it seems that everything else, when dealing with what John McCain says corrupts us all, seems not to work?

LAZIO: Well, I think, first of all, you correctly note that I have supported McCain-Feingold -- actually, Shays-Meehan in the House -- twice. I voted for a whole range of different campaign finance reform measures. And I have run this campaign with that intention by abiding by McCain-Feingold. We have not raised nor spent a dime of soft money to air any commercials in this race.

I do not agree with public financing because I think that people, the voters should decide who actually is elected. I think people should demonstrate that they get some grass-roots support. I've gotten the support of over 100,000 people who have given me, on average, checks of under $100. There's absolutely nothing wrong with that. I don't think that we should have Welfare for politicians.

I don't think the taxpayers should be forced to support a candidate that they don't believe in. I think it's the essence of democracy, frankly, for us, as people in public office and candidates, to go out and to make the appeal and to talk about the issues, talk about our experience, talk about whether or not we can be effective in representing them, and for people to make that choice as to whether or not they contribute.

I think that's very important. That's what I support.

CLINTON: Well, I certainly could support public financing. I have said that in the past. I think we need to change the system of campaign financing. But I just have to remark that Mr. Lazio's campaign violated the very simple agreement that we entered into. It was a self-enforceable agreement that anyone could follow and see whether we were abiding by it. "New York Times" editorial yesterday put it very well when he said that it violated the terms of the campaign financing agreement.

You know, last month, Mr. Lazio said that this was an issue of trust and character. He was right. And if New Yorkers can't trust him to keep his word for 10 days, how can they trust him for six years on issues like Social Security, Medicare, prescription drugs and education?

GRAMER: Mrs. Clinton, you were recently honored by the World Jewish Congress for your efforts to help Jewish victims of the Holocaust, many of whom worked in slave labor camps during World War II, and you helped them to get reparations from Switzerland, Germany and many other countries. My question is, are you now willing to help African-Americans whose ancestors were slaves here in the United States get reparations from our country for their years of slavery?

CLINTON: Marcia, I was very honored to be one of the people mentioned and given an honor by the World Jewish Congress for the work that -- although mine was a minor role, the work that led to the recovery of those assets. That was an important piece of history that had to be put to rest.

And on issues of reparations with respect to African-Americans, native Americans, we have some mental and emotional and psychological reparations to pay first. We have to admit that we haven't always treated the people in our own country fairly. We have some issues that we have to address when it comes to racial justice right now. So I'm willing to work hard to be a strong advocate for Civil Rights and human rights here at home and around the world. I want to do everything I can to make sure that the programs and policies that have helped generations of African-Americans have a better life in this country continue.

I think we should be focused on the present and on the future. I was very moved when I visited Gory (ph) Island twice, first on my own with my daughter, and then with my husband. And we do owe, as my husband said that day, an apology to African-Americans for hundreds of years of slavery. But I think that the people I know and the people that I work with want us to stay focused on the future, keep our economy going, keep providing good public education, quality affordable health care, do the things that will enable people to have the best futures for themselves. And that's what I'm committed to doing.

GRAMER: Mr. Lazio, your rebuttal?

LAZIO: Yeah. I need to go back to the last question, if I can. Mrs. Clinton, please, no lectures from Motel 1600 on campaign finance reform.

(LAUGHTER) LAZIO: I mean, the fact is, I took a legitimate contribution of clean hard money. My opponent objected. So because I have such a commitment to campaign finance reform and to this agreement that I fought so hard for, I refunded the money. I did that quickly. I did it responsibly. And I did it ethically.

Now, on this issue, let me say this. As someone who serves on the Holocaust Assets Commission, as somebody who wrote legislation to extend the commission and to fund the commission, I think this work is incredibly important. I believe in it deeply. I also believe that it is time for us to move past the issue of reparations among African- Americans and work for ways in which we can bring more opportunity and better educational opportunities to African-American children.

KRAMER: Mr. Lazio, your time is up.

And you get the next question. Mr. Lazio, a federal...

LAZIO: Please.

KRAMER: ... a federal panel has attacked the New York City Police Department for racial profiling. Mayor Giuliani has heatedly denied that there's racial profiling, but I ask you, do you agree with the federal panel? And what do you think should be done? Do you think a federal monitor should be appointed to oversee the New York City Police Department?

LAZIO: I believe that New Yorkers can take care of New Yorkers. I don't think we need more federal monitors in here to either tell us who we're going to resolve our land claims situation, kick off private land owners, which is what the Justice Department does or attempts to do, and try to tell us how to keep our streets safe. In fact, the streets of New York are at their safest point ever.

Do I believe in racial profiling? No, I do not. As a former prosecutor, I know that we can do the job without that tool, and we should do the job without that tool. We need to build confidence. Youth community policing. And I think the Giuliani administration has been doing the job for the people of New York. The streets are safer. People can go out again. You see children being wheeled around in carriages, and that's a good sign, families coming back into New York City. It's because people believe that the quality of life is increasing in New York City because of the work that's been done and the partnership that's been developed between Mayor Giuliani and Governor Pataki. And they're going to add one more partner next year in the Senate: Rick Lazio.

KRAMER: Hillary, a rebuttal?

CLINTON: Well, I would just point out to Mr. Lazio that the criticism of your grasping for loopholes came from the "New York Times," not from me.

I disapprove of racial profiling and believe that there's no room for it in any law enforcement effort. The report that's been referred to hasn't even been released yet. I'm going to withhold judgment on that.

But I've spoken out about the need to rebuild trust between our police officers who put themselves on the line every single day and the communities that they're pledged to protect. I want to go to the Senate to make sure that our police have the resources and tools they need to do the very best job, but I also want to go to make sure that our communities feel safe and well-protected. We need to protect and respect, and that's the kind of formula that I'll take to the Senate.

KRAMER: The next question is from Gregg Birnbaum to Mrs. Clinton. He's from the "New York Post."

GREGG BIRNBAUM, "NEW YORK POST": Mrs. Clinton, the United Nations Security Council has just passed a resolution condemning the excessive use of force by Israel against the Palestinians, but the resolution makes no mention of violence against Israelis. Some consider this to be one of the most anti-Israel resolutions in years. The United States didn't oppose it. The United States abstained. Mr. Lazio said the U.S. should have used its veto power and he charged the Clinton administration has unjustifiably vacillated in its support of Israel.

A statement released by you last night makes no mention of the United States' abstention. Do you believe America did the right thing?

CLINTON: No, I believe we should have vetoed it. I believe that it was a wrong move not to have vetoed it, that it was inaccurate and one-sided. It did not address the violence that I believe is fomented by Chairman Arafat and the Palestinian authority. It did not address what Israel has tried to do, such as showing good faith by pulling out of Lebanon and the fact that there's violence on that border. I was very disappointed because to me, the responsibility lies clearly with Chairman Arafat. I've said that on several occasions over this past week.

But we have to focus on ending the violence. It is escalating out of control. We're seeing the capture of Israeli soldiers, the desecration of Joseph's tomb. It's imperative that Chairman Arafat do everything in his power immediately to end the violence and that people get back to the negotiating table to try to resume moving toward a comprehensive peace settlement that would make it clear that Israel's security would be safe and guaranteed.

The United States remains the guarantor of Israel's security, and in the Senate, I would certainly be a strong voice for doing whatever was required. I've also called on ending -- on conditioning aid to the Palestinians on their willingness to end violence, on their willingness to rid their textbooks of anti-Semitic and anti-Israeli statements. I feel very strongly right now that we're at a moment of danger and peril. We need to have everyone speaking out, and Chairman Arafat and the Palestinians must respond.

KRAMER: Mrs. Clinton, that was time.

Mr. Lazio, your rebuttal. LAZIO: Well, Gregg, you correctly noted that, in fact, I did issue a statement immediately disagreeing and expressing my strong disappointment with the -- America not using its veto power. I don't know why we have a vote if we don't exercise it in a case like this.

For several generations and for -- and several administrations from both parties, we have had unequivocal support for the state of Israel. This sends all the wrong messages about whether or not we stand firmly behind our Democratic ally in the Middle East. They need to know that we stand behind them, stand by their side.

I do not support call for a Palestinian state. My record is one of 100 percent consistency for the security of the state of Israel and for our alliance.

KRAMER: Gregg, your next question.

BIRNBAUM: Mr. Lazio, I'd like to ask you about a quote from one of your recent speeches. I'll read it. "I think this is the most important race of my generation. This is a race that will determine whether character still counts in public service, whether or not integrity matters, whether the rule of law applies to all or just to some privileged people." That was in Watertown on September 29th. But you say those words almost every time you address a crowd. So I'd like to ask you to explain them and how they apply to Mrs. Clinton.

LAZIO: Well, let me talk about how they apply to Mrs. Clinton. I think it's more important that I talk about myself. For 17 years, I've served New York. I've served as a prosecutor, as a local legislator. And for the last eight years, I've served in the United States Congress.

I'm known as somebody who brings people together. I'm known as somebody whose word you can trust, you can work with. I believe that I have demonstrated an integrity in terms of my public service, and I've been effective for the people of New York. That's why the people of my district that sent me back by the widest margins in the history of my district: because they know they can count on me, that they believe in me. And they know that I will vote my conscience.

So when I say that, I think that what I'm trying to say is that I try to be a man of character. I try to be a good role model for my two little girls, Molly and Kelsey (ph), who are going to second and third grade right now. I'm going to try and be a good role model to other children as well. I'm going to stand up for the values that I believe have made New York strong.

As a grandson of immigrants that came over, saw the Statue of Liberty and then got processed through Ellis Island, as a son of a son small business owner that came back from World War II without a dime in his pocket and fulfilled his dream to start a small auto parts store, and now as somebody who's lived the dream himself of being able to go to represent the people of New York in Congress, I believe I have, not just an obligation but it's my sense of honor to go out and to make sure that I do the job the way I think they want me to do it.

Mrs. Clinton, your rebuttal.

CLINTON: Well, you know, I'm also the granddaughter of immigrants and the daughter of a small businessman, but I was raised to believe that we had to look out for each other and that we had to be willing to work hard to provide opportunities for ourselves, our families and others. I can't even imagine ever voting with Newt Gingrich to shut our government down. I can't even imagine being on the side of those who time and time again vote against our most fundamental beliefs, voting for the first two welfare reform bills that the president had to veto that would have been devastating to New York.

And time and time again, if you look at my opponent's record, he'll only tell you half the story. You've got to look behind it to understand exactly what he's talking about. You can just take me for what I say when I tell you that I will work for the issues I've worked on for 30 years.

KRAMER: OK, Mrs. Clinton, recently, a number of proposals have been put forth to build the large dome stadium on the west side of Manhattan. Do you think that taxpayer money should be used to build such a stadium?

CLINTON: Well, with all due respect to Mayor Giuliani sitting in the front row, the answer is no, I don't. I love sports and I love the opportunity for people to go to sports, but I don't think that's a good use of that space and place or of taxpayer dollars.

I think there is a lot of work that we need to do to upgrade the infrastructure of New York. That's why I support the Second Avenue subway. That's why I support the East Side connector, why I would support a rail link to La Guardia and to JFK. There is work we need to do to repair our bridges and roads, to make sure that we're prepared for the 21st century.

I've worked very hard to educate myself about all the infrastructure needs that are required around the state of New York because I think we have to follow in Senator Moynihan's footsteps and saying that we need to have public buildings and public works that really reflect the greatness of New York. I will go to the Senate to continue the work on Penn Station and others that Senator Moynihan has started.

And one of my fundamental disagreements during this campaign with my opponent was when he called for the repeal of the gas tax. Now the gas tax is one of those few taxes that New York actually gets more money from Washington than we send, and we are totally reliant on it to do things like finishing I-86 in the southern tier or the fast ferry harbor works up in Rochester, as well as the work we need to do here in the city.

So you can count on me to support infrastructure, but I'm sorry, mayor, I can't go with the dome stadium.

KRAMER: Mr. Lazio, your response.

LAZIO: First of all, let me say this. I think it's important that New York gets the Jets and the Giants back here. I think it's important that we have a focal point, where we build economic development. And this is not just a plan for a stadium; it's also a plan for expansion of convention space, which is very important.

I think private money needs to be on the line here as well, though. I don't think this should be funded with public money entirely. But I believe that this is an important development, an important initiative to try and build jobs, more jobs for New York.

I should note, and I think my opponent knows this, that when I did call for the repeal of the gas tax -- I know she loves the gas tax, but let me say this. We would not take one dime from the trust fund. We made that clear when we had the proposal. I voted against the gas tax cut in 1993.

LAZIO: I'm opposed to it now.

KRAMER: Your time is up but you get another opportunity to talk because I'm going to ask you another question.

LAZIO: Good.

KRAMER: Mr. Lazio, how would you address the dichotomy that has developed over regional jet air service in New York? On the one hand, upstate New York is woefully under served with direct flights, while in New York City and in the metropolitan area, the world's most congested air space, is plagued with delays and delays and delays. And airports like La Guardia have run out of runway space.

Now with Air 21, the federal government is allowing airlines to add hundreds of flights. In fact, at La Guardia alone, they're allowing them to add 200 flights a day to the 1,200 that already depart from that airport. How would you propose to fix this?

LAZIO: I think, first of all, we need to open up more of these slots to lower costs, competitive airlines that will bring the kind of quality service at low cost to some of our upstate areas that they desperately need to thrive economically. I did that down in Long Island. We partnered together with the local level with the town supervisor that controls the airport, a guy by the name of Pete McGowan (ph).

We made sure we went after Southwest Airline. I did my job. We made sure we delivered the federal dollars that were necessary to upgrade the airport so it made it more attractive for Southwest to come in. And because they came into Lsup (ph), they're now going into other areas throughout upstate at costs that are very low. That's good news. It's good news for other airlines, other low-cost airlines that come in and to compete with Southwest. I think the point is is that you've got to have the ability to work with local people to get the job done, to stay focused, to deliver federal resources. That's my experience. I think we need to make sure that we do not overburden our capacity for having safe flights in and out of our two busiest airports: JFK and La Guardia.

I also think it's important, though, for us to continue to open up new slots for lower costs, discount airlines, to service the upstate economy and those airports down on Long Island as well.

CLINTON: Well, I agree with what the congressman said. I think that we do need to make sure that those increase in slots will provide more low-cost transportation up to upstate. That's been part of my specific upstate economic plan for a year now, that we need to do more to get the price of transportation down and get the adequacy of it up all across upstate.

But I think we also have to be very concerned about the environmental effects and the safety implications of any expanded service. I think that we have to look carefully at La Guardia and JFK to make sure that we prioritize among the flights that are going in and that we don't overburden those flights and the neighbors who live in those areas who are already suffering under a lot of noise and other inconvenience to them.

KRAMER: Mrs. Clinton, your time is up. I have another question for you, though, so you can continue if you want to. But I'd like to ask you how you stand on Federal Bill 602P. I'm going to actually tell you what it is.

CLINTON: I have no idea.

(LAUGHTER)

KRAMER: I'm going to tell you what it is. Under the bill that's now before Congress, the U.S. Postal Service would be able to bill e-mail users five cents for each e-mail they send even though the post office provides no service. They want this to help recoup losses of about $230 million a year because of the proliferation of e-mails. But if you'll just send 10 e-mails a day, that would cost consumers an extra $180 a year. So I'm wondering if you would vote for this bill. And do you see the Internet as a source of revenue for the government in the years to come?

CLINTON: Well, based on your description, Marcia, I wouldn't vote for that bill. It sounds burdensome and not justifiable to me. I have been a supporter of the moratorium on taxation on the Internet. I think that we do have to let loose this extraordinary communication device and see how far it can go in connecting people up. And I'd like to monitor this closely and take a look at it in the time when the moratorium expires.

But is important that we do everything we can do build the infrastructure of New York to take advantage of the Internet. I have been all over this state to all 62 counties and I've been in countless schools, and some of them are the best in the world and the most highly wired and others are not. If we're going to take advantage of the new information economy, we have to be sure that all of our citizens and particularly our children are well prepared. That's why I have proposed high-tech infrastructure bonds as part of my economic plans that would enable us to provide low-cost Internet access and broadband access around the state. It's why I hope that we'll do a better job in providing the computers and Internet access to all of our children and all of our schools so that no child gets left behind. And it's why we need to close the digital divide throughout the state.

New York should be as Silicon Alley is: a beacon magnet throughout the state for the new economy. And I want to be partner with local officials, business, labor and others to make sure that happens. So I don't want anything to interfere with that kind of opportunity.

LAZIO: I am absolutely opposed to this. This is an example of the government's greedy hand in trying to take money from taxpayers that, frankly, it has not right to. We need to keep the government's hands off the Internet. It has a capacity for creating more jobs, more high-paying jobs for New Yorkers than any other potential sector in the future. That's why I have voted for a moratorium on taxes on the Internet. That's why I have a hundred percent record on high-tech issues because I know that's important to New York.

I've been building partnerships with local businesses to create jobs for our young people. And I'll tell you, it's very, very important for us to keep our taxes low. And I distance myself, frankly, from Mrs. Clinton's 15 different support -- 15 different tax increases...

KRAMER: Mr. Lazio, your time is up but I have another question for you.

LAZIO: OK.

KRAMER: I'd like to direct your attention again to the Middle East and to what is believed to be the thing that started it all off. And that was Ariel Sharon's visit to the Temple Mount. It has now escalated in Israel to the point where just yesterday, Palestinians attacked the sacred Jewish shrine, the tomb of Abraham. I'm wondering if you blame Ariel Sharon for setting off the violence and how you can guarantee Israel that other shrines it might have to give up in the peace process would not fall in a similar situation and can be protected.

LAZIO: I think that every Palestinian, every Israeli, every Jew from the world is really entitled to have access to Temple Mount. I don't think the fact that Ariel Sharon went there led to the violence. Let's put the blame where the blame is due and telling Yasser Arafat -- Yasser Arafat is the one who unleashed the violence. Yasser Arafat is the one who has been developing camps for Palestinian children to learn how to kill Israeli children. That's absolutely wrong.

The violence has occurred as a result of an orchestrated effort to try and undermine, I believe, the peace process. And I think the responsibility lies with Yasser Arafat. That's why it was so important for America to exercise its veto yesterday, and it failed to do that, and I'm greatly disappointed about that. That's why it's important for America not to vacillate, to stand in an unequivocal way and say, "We're going to stand four square behind the security of Israel." That's what I have done for my entire career in Congress because it's the right thing to do, because I believe that the survival of the Jewish people throughout the world depends on the survival of the Jewish state.

KRAMER: Mrs. Clinton.

CLINTON: Well, I have said that I think any person who shows respect toward any religious shrine or holy place should be permitted to visit. So I cannot point a finger or blame someone who did that. It should be open to all people. In fact, since Jerusalem was once again under Israeli control, that has been the case, that Jews, Christians, Muslims are all welcomed to come to the holy places that they revere.

The blame does belong on Chairman Arafat and his refusal to exercise his total authority and complete power to end the violence. People are losing their lives. Israeli soldiers are being captured, tombs are being desecrated. This must end.

KRAMER: OK, we have time for one last question. It's going to be addressed to both of you. You'll each have 90 seconds to answer the question.

Mrs. Clinton, you will go first. Mrs. Clinton, there is a term that has been thrown around a lot in this campaign. Very simply, define a New Yorker.

CLINTON: Well, you know, E.B. Wyatt (ph) and others have done that over the years and what's so great about being a New Yorker or defining a New Yorker is that New York has always been a magnet for people from literally all over the world. People are drawn to New York because this is a place that you can stake your claim, you can build a future, you can dream your dreams. It is the place that my grandparents came through as well. And it is a place that I've always known, welcomed everyone from everywhere including immigrants from Washington, D.C.

So for me, New York represents the best, not just of America, but of the entire world. There isn't anyplace like it. I have had the most extraordinary time this -- more than a year now, 15 months traveling throughout this state and being in this city, going from neighborhood to neighborhood, from borough to borough, from county to county, and I've met people literally from all over. The Census Bureau says that 40 percent of the people living in New York City were not even born in this country.

We have the opportunity to demonstrate in New York that what it means to be a New Yorker is to be the best human being you can be, to do the best with your life you can do, to dream the biggest dreams and to get along with everyone else, to demonstrate that we can make this wonderful patchwork quilt of a place not only work but demonstrate to the rest of the world that people from different backgrounds and experiences not only can get along but build a better future.

KRAMER: Mr. Lazio, your 90 seconds.

LAZIO: Well, I think New Yorkers have a saying. They say, "You know, you got to tell it like it is." And for me in my life, I think very much a lot of New Yorkers can relate with the things I've been talking about. I can relate with their lives, the fact that we have a great melting pot here in New York. Our ethnic diversity is our strength. It's dynamic. It's changing. It's exciting. It's why people from throughout the world want to come to New York.

We're tough, bottom-line people. Let's face it. We want to see results. We want people who are going to be effective. We don't want to hear a lot of stories and talk. We have a respect for people to get the job done and to tell the truth. We have a history of rolling up our sleeves, of building the tallest building in the world at the time, the Empire State Building, calling it the Empire State Building, of building the Brooklyn Bridge, the Erie Canal, of doing the things that help build the name that we call our state, the Empire State.

I'm very, very proud to have been a life-long resident of this state, to have had all my roots here, my friends and my family from this state. And I'm going to be very proud next year to go back with the voters' help, and God willing, to represent this great state in a way that will make it proud.

KRAMER: Well, you know, it turns out you've been so good at answering your questions that there's time for just one more question. And it's going to go to both of you. You'll each have a minute -- Mr. Lazio will go first. It's a conservation question. There are a lot of people who think that we're using too much oil and too much gas, and the way to do it is to conserve, doing things like asking the gas companies to make sure that their tanks get 30 miles per gallon, reducing the speed limit to 55, things like that. Your position on that.

LAZIO: I absolutely believe that we have -- need to develop a comprehensive energy strategy. I think this administration has got no energy strategy. I think in a moment of candor last year, Energy Secretary Bill Richardson, who I really like and I've worked with as a House member, said we were caught napping. He was right. Well, maybe he understands it. Maybe they were outright snoring, quite frankly.

The fact is that there was no strategy to develop alternative, renewable energy sources. There was no strategy to ask the allies that we went to bat for in Kuwait and Saudi Arabia to respect our needs and to boost their oil production. There was no real strategy in terms of developing the kind of new energy technology like plug power up in Albany, cell technology that is incredibly promising.

We need to open up the grid to competition to drive down the price of energy. That will help create jobs, create a more favorable business climate in upstate New York and throughout the whole state of New York. I think those things are very important. I think we need to have access for both natural gas and for oil. We need to do a better job in building public and private partnerships to get that done.

KRAMER: Your time is up, Mr. Lazio.

Mrs. Clinton.

CLINTON: Well, I've spoken about the need for an energy policy for many, many months and that energy policy would, of course, include conservation measures, possibilities that would include the kind of conservation tax credits that the Republicans have blocked for time after time in the last several years. The administration has put forth an energy policy that, you know, we just couldn't get through that Republican leadership that my opponent is part of.

Well, we need a new Congress that will take this energy conservation and energy efficiency issue seriously. I was pleased when the president did release some of the oil from the strategic reserve and it has resulted in lowering the price. But we've got to do a lot more. We need to make sure we have a Northeast oil reserve, something that I called for, my opponent missed the vote on and then Republicans in the House and Senate ripped it out of the final bill.

So we have work to do and it needs to be bipartisan, but it needs to be led by Democrats who understand that we shouldn't be beholden to big oil but instead should get out there and do what we need to do to be independent.

KRAMER: Mrs. Clinton, your time is up.

The question portion of the debate is now concluded. Now each candidate will have 60 seconds for their closing statements. By a flip of the coin, Mrs. Clinton will go first.

Mrs. Clinton.

CLINTON: Well, I want to thank you all for giving us this opportunity to talk about the issues. You know, for months now, my opponent has been sending out a campaign fund-raising letter which says that, "All you need to know about this election are six words: I'm running against Hillary Rodham Clinton." Well, I think New Yorkers deserve more than that. How about seven words? How about jobs, education, health, Social Security, environment, choice? How about the issues that New Yorkers talk to me about and that I've been talking about as I've been running a campaign on the issues?

I want to go to the Senate to make sure we keep the economy strong, that we do what's necessary to bring down the national debt, preserve Social Security, provide a prescription drug benefit for Medicare and offer affordable tax cuts like making college tuition tax deductible. And I want to fight for education, for health care, for the environment and for a woman's right to choose.

Now those are the kinds of issues that I will work on because they are part of what I've done my entire life and part of what I've done in this administration. And I would appreciate your help and your vote to be able to carry on that work.

KRAMER: Mr. Lazio.

LAZIO: Thank you, Marcia. Thank you for the opportunity.

At the beginning of this 21st century, the outcome of this race will define what New Yorkers value most. Will it be bipartisanship and effectiveness? Will it be building alliances and working well with others? Will it be a proven record for the job, relevant experience and a life-long devotion to this state, New York? These are the qualifications that I bring to this position, a position of high trust to the United States Senate.

Now I think we have an opportunity here in New York. We have an opportunity to send a message nationwide. Let our message be that it's people rather than government that we trust most, that the most compassion is a plan that works, that the right incentives can make things better, and that if you don't stand up for something, you'll put up with anything. I ask for your support.

KRAMER: Well, thank you, Mr. Lazio and Mrs. Clinton.

I also want to thank our panel of reporters, Jeff Greenfield, Lars-Erik Nelson, Joyce Purnick and Gregg Birnbaum. We also want to thank the members of the live studio audience for being here.

And even before the election day, you actually have a chance to be heard. You can log on to CBSnewyork.com and let us know who you feel won the debate.

I'm Marcia Kramer. Have a terrific Sunday.

BLITZER: You've been watching CNN's live coverage of this second debate between the New York Senate candidates Hillary Rodham Clinton and Rick Lazio.

Just ahead, a special post-debate "LATE EDITION." Among our guests, the Republican Senate candidate, Congressman Rick Lazio. "LATE EDITION" will begin right after this.

SHAW: This is orientation period for certain senators-elect on Capitol Hill. Two of them: Democrat Hillary Clinton from New York and Jon Corzine from New Jersey -- they talked to reporters. And this is some of what they had to say.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN.-ELECT HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Well, I've had a very good day. Jon and I have been going through orientation together. And I think that, for me, it's been the great privilege to be here, especially with the other new senators with whom I'll serve, all of whom are impressive and as committed as Jon and I are to the work ahead.

And I was just thinking, you know, I hadn't spent much time in this building since 1974, when I worked for the Congress, and 1968, when I was an intern. So I'm delighted to be back and rediscovering the beauty of the Capitol.

QUESTION: Senator, what was your meeting with Senate Majority Leader Lott like? Could you talk about that meeting a little bit?

CLINTON: I think -- let Jon say a few words first.

JON CORZINE (D), NEW JERSEY SENATOR-ELECT: Well, we -- I think all of us have a sense of the history. We just came out of a remarkable session with Senator Byrd, who gave a perspective and an imperative to all of us to take the responsibilities of being a United States senator, representing the separations of powers effectively and forcefully, in a way that I think is inspiring to all of us. And I'm sure it was to the first lady.

She's inspiring to all of us. But I think that this moment in history and that this institution is pretty remarkable. I think it catches anyone's attention, whatever your perspective.

CLINTON: I think that all of us who just listened to Senator Byrd were struck by not only the history, but the challenges that each time faces. He really put into perspective some of the early challenges that senators in the beginning of the 19th century faced, all the way to the present time. And that just increases our feeling of responsibility that this day has impressed upon us.

QUESTION: Senator Kay Bailey Hutchison today said that you are kind of a blank slate as far as the impressions up here are concerned. How will you make your mark? How do you plan to make your impression up here?

CLINTON: Well, I'm pleased to learn that I am...

(LAUGHTER)

CLINTON: That's very good news. I intend to work as hard as I can and to represent the people of New York to the best of my ability, to work hard to serve my constituents, to work with my colleagues, wherever and whenever I can, on behalf of our country. So I'm absolutely hoping to build relationships and create consensus with every senator.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WOODRUFF: First lady Hillary Rodham Clinton, Senator-elect Hillary Rodham Clinton, with New Jersey's new senator-elect, Jon Corzine.

LARRY KING, HOST: Tonight, the first lady and the new senator from New York, Hillary Rodham Clinton on politics and life at the White House.

And on day 34, all eyes turn to the U.S. Supreme Court. What will the justices decide? Joining us in Washington, the governor of Montana, Marc Racicot, he's close to Governor Bush; and in Tallahassee, Ron Klain, Gore campaign senior legal adviser; then in Washington, one of the men who argued before the U.S. Supreme Court, Ted Olson, Bush campaign attorney.

All that and our roundtable, next on LARRY KING LIVE.

We begin with our conversation taped earlier this afternoon with Mrs. Clinton.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

KING: We now welcome to LARRY KING LIVE -- another visit, she's been on frequently -- Hillary Rodham Clinton, the first lady of the United States, senator-elect in the state of New York, author of the new book, "An Invitation to the White House: At Home With History." We'll talk about that a little later on.

How do I address you now? I've known you so long. Is it Madam First Lady, Hillary, Hillary Rodham, Senator?

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D-NY), SENATOR-ELECT: It's a little confusing, isn't it?

KING: Yes. What do you like the best?

CLINTON: Well, I -- gee, all of those are, you know, really wonderful things.

KING: Do you call a senator-elect a senator?

CLINTON: I don't know. That's a good question. You know, I've been telling people that I'm not a senator until I'm sworn in on January 3. So, how about Hillary?

KING: Just senator-elect. Do you like the term senator?

CLINTON: I do like the term, yes. KING: It fits?

CLINTON: I feel very good about it. You know, it was a great campaign. I had the help of thousands and thousands of people across New York and lots of friends around the country.

And I'm very excited. I went to Senate school last week.

KING: What was that like?

CLINTON: It was great.

KING: Senate school.

CLINTON: Yes. I mean, it was wonderful. I mean, we had an opportunity to hear Senator Byrd talk about the history of the Senate, and we did it in the old Senate chambers where so much of that history took place.

I spent time meeting my new colleagues, both Democrats and Republicans. It was a really good way to start getting oriented toward the Senate.

KING: Did you get your office yet?

CLINTON: No. That won't happen for several months. We're all -- as the new freshman class, we're all in the basement of the Dirksen Building, waiting until we...

KING: You're in the basement?

CLINTON: In the basement, because we have to wait our turn to see what space is available. The seniority system works so that people can move. And people who retired or lost will obviously vacate their space and then...

KING: The next one moves up.

CLINTON: ... the next one moves up. And then, you know, I'm down toward the bottom of the order.

KING: Doesn't the Secret Service say, "We'd rather have her in this..."

CLINTON: No. It's all by seniority.

KING: They don't have clout?

CLINTON: No, no clout -- no clout.

But that's fine. We'll be -- you know, we'll have a good time no matter what.

KING: Lots of things to talk about, but first things first. What do you make of all this? And I don't even have to say what "all this" is. CLINTON: Well, you know, as we're speaking, the Supreme Court arguments are going on and we don't know what the outcome is going to be.

KING: So let's say what if. What if the outcome is they can't vote anymore -- they can't count anymore? Or what if it's Bush is -- will be president, do you expect Gore will give it up?

CLINTON: Well, you know, I'm not going to engage in the what-if game. I think that, you know, from everything I've seen and heard, more people probably did intend to vote for Vice President Gore. And I would hope that there will still be an opportunity to have the votes counted, because I think that's the best for whoever is inaugurated as president. But it's now in the courts, and we'll leave it to the Supreme Court, which we'll find out maybe later today or tomorrow.

KING: If the court says -- well, let's say they say it's Bush. Can you -- what is it going to be like, do you think, working with a president of the other party, with a 50-50 Senate?

CLINTON: Well, I think everyone's going to have to make a real effort to work together. There's too much at stake for the country. I certainly intend to work wherever I can in a bipartisan way, both with fellow senators and members of Congress across the aisle, as well as with anyone else, including a possible administration.

I think that on so many of the matters that the country cares about, we were divided nearly 50-50 in the presidential race; we are certainly divided very closely in the Congress. So I think that...

KING: Divided in the court.

CLINTON: And divided in the court.

So there has to be an effort to reach across party lines and look for ways that people can cooperate.

KING: Of course, you could make it a stagnation, right? Either party can do that.

CLINTON: Well, that certainly is the prerogative, I suppose, but I hope that's not the priority of either party or any leader of either party, because when you come to questions about the economy or education or health care, these are all matters that I think despite the closeness of the election, the American people have made clear they want some action taken.

KING: Do you think we ought to change our voting system? Do you think that the federal government ought to help local communities by supplying equipment? I mean, this is the year 2000. You would think that we could vote like an ATM machine.

CLINTON: Well, Larry, I think we have to take a hard look at how we vote, and particularly in federal elections. There ought to be a way for the federal government to perhaps provide some assistance, to work toward a standardized ballot that states would be asked to consider accepting. I think that these are all matters that will be taken up in the 107th Congress.

But it's critical that people have confidence in our electoral process.

You know, I went all over the state of New York, as I have on behalf of my husband and other candidates over the last 30 years, urging people to vote, trying to reverse the trend of the last 30 or 40 years of lower and lower voter turnout. I just don't think we can afford for people to believe that their vote wouldn't even be counted literally, so that when we tell and encourage Americans to get out and vote, we really mean it and that we'll have a system that can fairly and accurately count their intention to vote for the candidate they chose.

KING: Of course, it seems ridiculous if the chad doesn't get punched through and the machine can't read it, and there are so many things we can do electronically today that, that should be covered.

CLINTON: Absolutely.

KING: Didn't we think that everybody voted the same way? In New York City, when I grew up, we pulled levers.

CLINTON: Right.

KING: They still do that? They pull levers?

CLINTON: That's what I did in Westchester, right.

KING: That's the safest, because you can't vote for two people for the same office. You can change, turn the lever back, and when you open the gate it's open. Why can't that be standardized? It seems simple.

CLINTON: Well, yes, I like voting machines, because, just as you described them, they make voting very clear and you can't really make a mistake. If you try to vote for two people in the same office, the machine won't let you do it.

KING: Can't.

CLINTON: But in New York, for example, which does use those machines, people aren't even making some of the machines that are still used, they're hard to get spare parts for. So we have to take a hard look, perhaps with a commission or some kind of joint congressional committee, to look and see what is the best technology, the safest, most accurate technology, because questions can be raised about any form of voting.

You know, some people talk about online voting, but imagine if there were an electrical surge or a blackout and whole states or regions of the country lost their votes. How would we handle that? So every way we think about voting will have some questions.

But clearly we have to learn from this experience that in our democracy, the oldest surviving democracy in the history of the world, the most fundamental task for our government is to provide an election that people have confidence in, and so when they go to vote they know their vote will be counted.

KING: In a minute, we'll ask about whether you think this president, no matter who it is, it's a tainted presidency.

We'll be right back with Hillary Rodham Clinton, senator-elect, state of New York, first lady United States, mother, husband, wife. We'll be right back.

(LAUGHTER)

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

KING: You're an only, you're the only first lady ever to win elective office.

CLINTON: So far.

KING: Is it going to be -- the Secret Service won't be allowed on the Senate floor, will they?

CLINTON: No, no.

KING: They have to stay up in the gallery.

CLINTON: Well, they're working it out with the Capitol Police and the sergeant of arms, who have been very cooperative, they understand the issues that they have to take into account.

KING: Is this a tainted presidency?

CLINTON: I hope not. I mean, I really hope that however this is finally resolved, that the country will, you know, really decide that we need to act in a bipartisan way, and we'll do so.

KING: If you could change the Constitution, would you make it a popular vote?

CLINTON: Well, I would, because I think that, that really is the intent of one person, one vote.

But I have no illusions that, that is not likely to occur, because it would take a constitutional amendment. That's why I favor doing everything we can to make our electoral systems as fair and accurate as possible.

KING: Everyone has said, except maybe you, that you are going to run for president someday. So let's -- I mean, let's say Gore loses. That means the Democratic Party has no incumbent. Are you interested in that office in '04?

CLINTON: No, I'm not.

KING: Not at all? CLINTON: No, no. I am intent upon being the best senator that I can be. That is what I want to do. I really feel like the people of New York gave me a great honor to give me the opportunity to serve, and that's what I am interested in doing. You know, all of the work that I've done for 30 years now -- it's almost hard to imagine -- going back into my young adulthood, concerns, you know, children and families and education and economic opportunity and health care.

I think we will have an opportunity, no matter how our presidential campaign is finally resolved, for people of good faith to reach across party lines and try to hammer out some of the solutions that I really think the American people want us to work toward.

KING: Did you tell the people of New York that you are going to stay the six years?

CLINTON: Yes, I surely did.

KING: And you wouldn't change that?

CLINTON: No, I wouldn't.

KING: So that's as definitive as you can get, right?

CLINTON: As definitive as I can get.

KING: Are you complimented by the thought?

CLINTON: Well, people say a lot of things about me. Some of it is not complimentary.

KING: How did you react to the bitterness, the anger that, that campaign presented for a while? I mean, you won it rather clearly, but...

CLINTON: You know, I...

KING: Did you like it?

CLINTON: I loved campaigning.

KING: You did?

CLINTON: I did. And I absolutely fell in love with every part of New York. I cannot tell you how much I enjoyed the days that I spent on the campaign trail, traveling all over, staying in people's homes...

KING: Even Bensonhurst?

CLINTON: I loved everywhere -- everywhere. But now you said you were going with me, and you didn't come, so...

KING: My friends Sid (ph) and Ashley (ph), they were going to go with you.

CLINTON: Yes. So we'll have to reschedule that.

KING: You did well there, though.

CLINTON: I did. I did. I was very gratified by the outcome of the election.

KING: Committee chairmen, now, there's a movement here now to -- that the Republicans say since they -- it's 50-50, but they have the vice president if Bush is the president. The Democrats want committee chairmen shared. What do you think?

CLINTON: Well, I think there are a number of issues that Tom Daschle as the leader of the Democrats will be negotiating with Senator Lott, and that's one of them. But there are other issues, the seats on committees, staff and other budgetary considerations, the rules of how the Senate operates.

You know, I was very impressed by what Senator Byrd told us in his lecture about the way the Senate has always functioned, ever since the early 19th century, so that individual senators were able to present amendments, that matters could be brought to the floor. And I think we need to, you know, have an agreement to go back to having the Senate function the way the Senate historically has functioned.

So there's a lot at stake in these negotiations.

KING: You'd favor co-chairmanship, though?

CLINTON: No, not necessarily -- not necessarily.

KING: No? No?

CLINTON: No, because I think that it'll either be 51-49, or 50-50 with a vice presidential tie-breaking vote. And so, I think that that's something to be negotiated.

KING: Any committee you'd want to serve on?

CLINTON: Well, I'm open to a number of committees, and we're not going to...

KING: What would be your favorite if you could pick one?

CLINTON: Well, you know, I'm not going to get into that right now, because I'm standing in line like everybody else.

But we don't even know how the committees will be chosen, because as you just pointed out, we don't know how many members will be on the various committees. And I'm just going to wait my turn. The Democrats will make those decisions at the leadership level. And I'll work as hard as I can on whatever committee I'm appointed to.

KING: Did you take offense to Trent Lott's statement that you're -- don't expect anything, you're just another wheel in the -- cog in the wheel?

CLINTON: Well, you know, I'm just one of a hundred, and that is -- that's a factual statement.

KING: You didn't take -- you didn't...

CLINTON: You know, people say things sometimes in the heat of partisanship. And we've had a very cordial encounter in the Senate. We went from Senator Daschle's office to Senator Lott's office, and he gave us a wonderful history lesson about that office and the role that it's played in the history of the Congress.

KING: How did he treat you?

CLINTON: Very cordially. Very collegially, which is what I expected. I have gotten to know him and his wife over the last eight years, and I expect that, you know, there will be differences, obviously. He has a role to play and a party to represent.

But I imagine wherever we can, we'll try to work together. And certainly, I see no reason for us not to be in a very collegial, cordial relationship.

KING: So you're optimistic that this government can work, that this can be four fruitful years, no matter who's at the -- who's sitting at the -- your old -- in your old -- in this house?

CLINTON: Well, I believe that America is at heart an optimistic country, you know. We are people of an optimistic spirit. And we have work to do, and work doesn't get done if people are drawn into battles over issues that are not going to make a difference in the lives of ordinary Americans.

You know, my hope is that in my work and the work of those in the Senate, you know, we will be able to keep the economy strong and growing, we will be able to improve education and provide health care and protect the environment, all of the things that I campaigned on. You can't do that if you're more interested in scoring political points.

KING: How about the leftover vituperativeness?

CLINTON: Well, that's for others to judge. You know, I...

KING: You admit it's bitter?

CLINTON: Well, there has been a lot of bitter feelings and rhetoric, but I think that if you are willing to overlook that, not let it get in the way of trying to forge some solution to a problem, to try to help people, it certainly is possible, and that's what I'm going to try to do.

KING: We'll talk about this house, Christmas here, and with the lady of the house. She's still the lady of the house, Hillary Rodham Clinton, senator-elect New York. Don't go away.

KING: OK, you write "It Takes a Village," you write "Dear Socks, Dear Buddy: Kids Letters to First Pets," and now we have "An Invitation to the White House: At Home With History."

CLINTON: Right.

KING: And you don't make money from this, right? It goes to the White House Historical Association...

CLINTON: No, all of it goes to the White House Historical Association.

KING: Simon Shuster published.

This is what, the 200th anniversary?

CLINTON: This is the 200th anniversary of this wonderful house. You know, the first occupants were the Adams. And although President Washington chose the site and oversaw the construction, he never lived here.

KING: He surveyed it.

CLINTON: He surveyed it, absolutely. And Thomas Jefferson submitted an anonymous design plan, which wasn't chosen.

But over these 200 years this house has really served as a symbol of our democracy, as a office for the presidents, and a museum for American history and culture, as well as a home.

KING: So the book -- the book is a compendium of those years?

CLINTON: Yes. The book is really an inside look at what it's like to live here, both the informal moments that we spend together as a family, but the more formal, public moments as well, the historic peace treaty signings, the state visit of Nelson Mandela, the kinds of things that I wanted to give people a behind-the-scenes look at. And I wanted to share this experience, which has been not only unique, but so wonderful for me personally and for our family.

KING: Last Christmas here, thoughts on that.

CLINTON: Well, it's really kind of...

KING: Because you love Christmas.

CLINTON: I do. I love Christmas.

KING: You've spent a lot of Christmases here.

CLINTON: Yes, we have. This is our eighth Christmas. Well, it's a bittersweet moment, I mean, because it will be our last Christmas. But we are trying to enjoy every minute of it. I'm not sure that any of us will get much sleep between now and the end of the season, because we are trying to be as open and entertaining as we can of so many people who are going to come that we can say thank you to and good-bye to.

So it's been a reflection of the previous years, that's really the theme for this Christmas season.

KING: How'd you get the idea to do this book?

CLINTON: You know, people ask me all the time, you know, what's it like living there? And how many rooms are there? And what's a state dinner like? And how do you decide what to serve? What's it like meeting the famous people that you've met?

And this couldn't possibly cover everything that has happened, but it does really put the focus on the house, which no matter who the first family is, no matter what president sits here, this house is bigger than any of us, and it goes on and on.

And the permanent staff is such a treasure that I wanted everybody to know what I know about the people who serve no matter who the president is. They are here to make the house run, to keep it beautiful, and to help any first family.

KING: Do you have a favorite room?

CLINTON: You know, I have so many rooms.

You know, this one that we're in right now is the Map Room, and this is where President Franklin Roosevelt plotted our strategy for the Allied victory in World War II.

KING: This was the last map he saw, the German embankment right behind me.

CLINTON: Well, exactly. And when I got here, I asked, "Well, what is this room?" And I was told its historic significance. But there were no maps left. So I started a hunt that ended with finding a young -- at that time, a young lieutenant, still alive, who was serving President Roosevelt when he died at Warm Springs, Georgia.

And this was the map that President Roosevelt was working on when he died, and this young lieutenant rolled it up and took it away and has had it for all of these years. And when he heard that, now that he's an obviously much older man, that we were looking for something that would really signify the importance of this room, he donated it to the White House.

And I've walked in here for meetings, and I've seen people staring at it. One time I came in and there were tears running down a man's face because he'd been in the Allied forces that fought their way from Italy north. Another time, I came in and there was a very distinguished economist who was just standing before it in speechless wonder, because he at that time was a young man, a boy, living in Germany, and his father had been conscripted into the Nazi army and had been lost, and his mother and his sister were starving in Berlin, and they were liberated by the Allied forces.

So, that's what I love about this house, is that it is a living home, but it is also a repository of that history.

KING: Is it warm to you? CLINTON: I love it. It's warm; it's welcoming; and I've tried to make it that way, because...

KING: It's not unwelcoming?

CLINTON: No. I hope not, anyway, because...

KING: Well, of course, it can be...

CLINTON: Well, it can be overpowering, because of the awe that it inspires and the size that it is.

But that's why I wanted to take people behind the scenes in the book. I wanted everyone to see that here's a place that was our home as well as where we entertained for very special public events.

KING: Do you always feel like a tenant?

CLINTON: You know, that's a hard question to answer. I always feel in awe. I've never walked into this house, no matter what time of day, no matter how tired I was, where I was coming from, that I wasn't grateful and that I wasn't awestruck by it.

You know that you're just passing through; that it is a place that others lived before and will live after you. So in that sense, you always know that you're just temporary.

But we worked very hard to make it our home.

KING: Well, the book's a classic work of art.

CLINTON: Thank you.

KING: And giving it to the White House association, the historical association, is a great idea.

CLINTON: Thank you.

KING: One final thing, it's Inaugural Day. Somebody is being sworn in.

CLINTON: Right.

KING: Will that be a joyous occasion, no matter who? Or will it be, what's going on?

CLINTON: You know, it's going to be a poignant moment for me, because the eight years will be ending, my husband's presidency will be ending, I will be assuming a different role, my husband will be going on, I know, to do other things. So no matter what the outcome of the election, it's going to be poignant.

But it will also be very reinforcing. You know, I am such a strong believer in the fundamental strength of American values and institutions. You know, I'm just a dyed-in-the-wool, sort of sentimental patriot about what our country means. And the orderly, peaceful transfer of power is something that we have demonstrated for, you know, more than two centuries.

KING: So if it's George Bush raising his right hand, there's no biting of the bottom lip?

CLINTON: Not for me. For me, I'm hoping that when this is finally resolved -- and, of course, I believe strongly that the best evidence of the way it should be resolved are the votes of the people who actually voted in the election.

But it is in the courts. And when it is resolved, certainly, you know, I'm prepared to serve with and to -- you know, to watch whoever the next president is swear loyalty to our Constitution.

KING: Madam Senator-elect, First Lady, thank you very much.

CLINTON: Thank you. Thank you, Larry.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

KING: Governor Marc Racicot, Republican of Montana, is next.

Don't go away.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

REMARKS BY PRESIDENT BILL CLINTON AND FIRST LADY SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D-NY) AT A WOMEN AND CHILDREN'S HEALTH EVENT, 1/4/2001

ALSO SPEAKING: TANYA CONINE (SP), CANCER SURVIVOR

LOCATION: THE EAST ROOM OF THE WHITE HOUSE, WASHINGTON, D.C.

SEN. CLINTON: Thank you. Thank you. Please, please, be seated. And welcome to the East Room, and happy New Year. It is wonderful to see so many friends here gathered to mark the passage of not only a year but so much progress on behalf of women and women's health, and in particular the Breast and Cervical Cancer Act of 2000.

MEMBER OF THE AUDIENCE: Yes! (Prolonged cheers and applause.)

SEN. CLINTON: You know, there are a lot of wonderful achievements that we can look back on over the last eight years, but I don't think anything has been more rewarding than working with all of you in this room and so many others around our country to put health care and particularly women's and children's health on the very top of our national agenda, where they now are and where they must remain. (Applause, cheers.)

And there are many people to thank here. I could actually use up all my time, plus the president's and everyone else's, thanking all of you. But let me just mention a few people who deserve a special mention.

Let me start with the longest-serving and best secretary of HHS, Donna Shalala. (Cheers, applause.) You know, there are many reasons why Donna, in my view, will be recorded in history as the best secretary of HHS. But one of those reasons started in this room eight years ago, when we had the first meeting of the breast cancer advocates, who came to the White House with all of those petitions, and the president promised -- (cheers, applause) -- the president promised there would be a national action plan against breast cancer. And Donna Shalala was given the responsibility of shepherding that. And we have seen so much progress because of it. (Applause.)

I also want to thank the director of OPM, Janice Lachance, who's here, who has used -- (applause) -- has used the authority given to her to make the federal government a model employer, especially in the health care that it provides for its workers.

And I was pleased that as of New Year's Day, mental health parity will be considered part of the federal health plan. (Applause.)

And there are members of Congress who are here who have been such stalwart supporters of everything that has been achieved. And I particularly want to thank Louise Slaughter and Rosa DeLauro and Sherrod Brown and Anna Eshoo. (Applause, cheers.) You know, there were a lot of champions for this bill, but nobody started and persisted and continued to the very end, when we finally got it signed, the way Anna Eshoo did. And -- (interrupted by cheers, applause). And there are other members of Congress who also deserve to be mentioned: Sue Myrick, Rick Lazio, the late John Chafee, Senators Barbara Mikulski and Olympia Snowe, and my predecessor, Daniel Patrick Moynihan -- all of whom worked in the Congress to make the Breast and Cervical Cancer Act the law of the land.

And in a few minutes, we're going to hear from someone who will share with us her personal story. Tonya Conine (sp) came all the way from Oklahoma City to talk about the difficulties she has faced in affording treatment for her breast cancer. And for all of us who fought hard to ensure that no woman, because of economic circumstances, who is diagnosed with either breast or cervical cancer will again have to make the horrible choices between foregoing care or accruing massive debt will know that our work has really been important because of the story that Tonya will share with us.

I also want to thank especially Fran Visco and the National Breast Cancer Coalition. (Cheers, applause.) (Laughs.) (More cheers.) And with us as well is Dr. (name inaudible) -- Ball (sp), representing the American Cancer Society, the National Medical Association, the NAACP, the Breast Cancer Resources Committee, and everyone else who has made this great achievement possible.

Now, I know that many of you have heard my story about the first time I met Fran and the other NBCC members during the 1992 campaign. And on the way to the meeting that we had scheduled in Williamsburg, the advocates were on a bus that broke down, and so they ended up hitch-hiking. (Laughter.) And some hitched rides with truckers, they climbed into sheriffs' cars, and of course they all made it to the meeting on time.

I always thought that was a pretty good metaphor for the determination of all the survivors and the other advocates, in this room and around the country, who've worked tirelessly for themselves, for their daughters, for their sisters, for their friends, and to improve generally the health of women and children.

Well, it's paying off, and we have a lot to be grateful for. But we have a lot of work still ahead of us. There are still too many people who don't have access to quality health care, and we can't forget that. We have to keep fighting to make sure that we not only put the dollars into research that will create the breakthroughs that will be translated into the treatments, but we have to make sure that those treatments are affordable and available to everyone who needs them.

It's hard to imagine that this administration is drawing to a close, and I think sometimes Bill and I, you know, are overcome with our memories, but we have to keep focused on the future, as well. And I want to mention just a few other of the accomplishments that are represented by the women here because those, too, were part of the success of this last Congress under the president's leadership.

There are people here today who helped us enact and reauthorize the Violence Against Women Act. And -- (interrupted by loud cheers and applause). And because of that, we know there are more women and children who now have a hotline to call, a shelter to go to and a judge, a doctor or a police officer who will offer help when it's needed most.

There are people here who helped us enact, and then helped spread the word on the Children's Health Insurance Program, known as CHIP. And particularly I want to thank everyone who was part of the Children's Health Act of 2000. That was a very important bill that didn't get a lot of attention when it was passed and signed into law this fall, because of the election. Like so many other things, it didn't really get the spotlight it deserved. But there are many, many people who are grateful that you worked so hard on this bill. Children with autism, Fragile X, diabetes, asthma, epilepsy and other conditions now have more hope because of this commitment we have made to fight diseases that disproportionately affect these people. (Applause.)

I know also, many of us in this room have been on the forefront of the fight to improve reproductive health.

And that has often been in the face of great opposition.

From the very first days of this administration, we have seen what it means to have a pro-choice president and a pro-choice administration. (Applause.) You know, that meant overturning the gag rule on the very first week in office; it meant historic increases in domestic and international family planning, which I have personally seen the benefits of all over the world. It's meant working to protect women and their doctors from harassment, intimidation, and violence at reproductive health clinics.

Now it is up to every single one of us to ensure that we don't turn back the clock on women's health. We've made a lot of gains, but nothing is written in concrete. And much of what we have achieved can be undone by legal, legislative, or executive changes. And we will have to be vigilant and work very hard to make sure that doesn't happen.

I hope that the year ahead will only increase our commitment to ensuring equity and fairness in health care financing and access to affordable, quality health care, that will pass Louise Slaughter's bill against genetic discrimination -- (applause). But we will not be able to achieve that if we don't band together and make sure our voices are heard.

I am looking forward to working with people on both sides of the aisle in both the House and the Senate to make sure that the fight to improve women's and children's health continues, and I look forward to working with all of the advocates. Because, to me, the achievements of the last eight years are really best understood, not in terms of the dollars that we've accumulated for research or that we've put into treatment, not even in terms of the legislative accomplishments like the Breast and Cervical Cancer Act, but in the stories of individual women who come up to me or write me or talk on a program and tell the world what it has meant that all of a sudden their needs and problems were given the attention that they deserved to have.

And one such woman, who really does represent so many others, is with us today. I'd like to introduce her to come and share with you the importance of the commitment you have made as represented in the passage of this act and so much else we've done together the last eight years. Please welcome Tonya Conine (sp). (Applause.)

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton In Her Own Words

LARRY KING, HOST: Tonight, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton in her own words: Highlights from our conversations with the most controversial woman in American politics. Next on LARRY KING LIVE.

Thanks for joining us.

We saw history made this week in the U.S. Senate. Hillary Rodham Clinton became the first first lady ever to be sworn in as an elected official.

I've had a chance to interview her a number of times over the years. The first opportunity, October of '93, shortly after her congressional testimony about health care reform. She wowed a lot of people with that appearance, though that plan ultimately flopped. Mrs. Clinton was still settling into life at 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue when she sat down with me in the Vermeil Room of the White House.

KING: Do you get to feel like this is your house?

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON, FIRST LADY OF THE UNITED STATES: Yes.

KING: You do?

CLINTON: Yes.

KING: So it's not like you're renting here?

CLINTON: Well, it is public housing and so we are the tenants, but it is a place that overwhelms you. Every time you walk in, it makes you feel so proud and humble, I guess, but it's also our home and so we've worked hard to be make it that way.

KING: Nancy Reagan said to me the biggest surprise about this whole thing to her was that it wasn't Sacramento, that the press, the whole thing is just a whole different ball game, and being a governor's wife is not preparation for it. True?

CLINTON: True, that's very true, and, you know, you can imagine if Mrs. Reagan didn't think it was preparation being in California what I must have felt like coming from Arkansas where we knew everybody and where we could, you know, lead our own lives. I could drive my own car. I could go to work. I could take my daughter shopping. We had could go to a movie, and even if you think you have an idea what it's like because you've looked from afar and you watch a president and his family until you actually experience it, you don't really understand it.

KING: And what don't you like about it?

CLINTON: I don't like feeling confined, so that my movements are pretty much restricted; that I'm supposed to, you know, be driven places and I'm supposed to, you know, kind of have this protective security around me.

KING: It's 2:30. We'll go down here, then you'll turn left, then you'll turn right. This is Mr. Morris. Say hello.

CLINTON: Yes, I've tried to really limit that and both the president and I have worked hard on that. So, you know, we do try to keep in touch with our friends. We try to go out with people. We try to have as normal a life as possible, but there is no denying that it's very different.

KING: The Roosevelt kids, I got to know them all, said it is a tough place to grow up for a kid. This is not a kid's place. How's your daughter handling it?

CLINTON: She's doing pretty well, but this is not a kid's place and you have to work very hard to make it a good environment for a child. So she has her friends over; lots of overnights; lots of people and, girls, you know, going up and down the hallways and doing funny things that kids do, and we've tried very hard, as you know, to keep her out of the public eye; to try to give her a chance to have a lifetime with...

KING: How do you do that, though? I mean, like, she has friends come over?

CLINTON: Yes, she has friends come over -- lots of friends come over. She goes over to friends' houses...

KING: But there are Secret Service guys outside the house if she's there. It ain't a normal pillow party.

CLINTON: No, it's not normal, but it's as normal as we can make it and we're going to work very hard to keep it that way.

KING: What did you use to do that you can't do anymore that you miss the most?

CLINTON: Get in my car with my daughter, go to a store or go to a mall and spend a couple of hours just wandering around having a good time; stop and maybe having a cup of hot chocolate or a cookie and giggling, you know.

KING: The first lady of Arkansas could do that?

CLINTON: Yes.

KING: She could go to the mall, outside of Little Rock?

CLINTON: All the time. Went shopping all the time. No problem at all.

KING: When was the last time you drove?

CLINTON: Good question. I don't think I have driven since I've been in Washington. I have my car up here, but...

KING: Where's it parked?

CLINTON: It's parked on the grounds but I mostly let friends use it who come to visit and need a car.

KING: But you like sitting behind the wheel? You like driving?

CLINTON: Well, sure I mean...

KING: Is it impossible...

CLINTON: Well, I mean, you get in the car; you turn on the radio -- well, you've been in a car recently. You know what it's like. You know, I haven't. I can remember.

KING: I can't drive a car any more. I drive down a street it's a story.

CLINTON: Really, can you imagine? So, no, I just like to get in, turn on the radio. I have a terrible voice, but sing along with the radio; listen to you or somebody else yell at you on the radio; say, oh, that's not true and just be by yourself.

KING: What -- your first car -- we were talking about first cars. Mine was a '55 -- '53 Ford and yours was a '63 Olds.

CLINTON: Right.

KING: You were telling me you had to take the battery out.

CLINTON: Well, anybody listening to this will probably write and say, you know, this just shows you how crazy she is. My car had personality, my first car, and I was in law school and my car had a battery that did not like to be left in the car overnight. It would drain out if it were, especially in the New England cold.

KING: So what did you do with it?

CLINTON: I unhooked it every night and took it to my dorm room, and kept it warm and then I put it back in the next morning. And it made a very happy battery and a car that worked.

KING: Did it have a name? I think we're losing it here. It's been a long week, CLINTON: It did have a name. Yes, I called my car Julius.

KING: Julius.

CLINTON: Julius.

KING: Did the battery have a name?

CLINTON: No, I did not name the battery. I think it was Eveready or something like that.

KING: What's the car parked downstairs now?

CLINTON: It's an Oldsmobile.

KING: You've stayed loyal?

CLINTON: Yes, I did. I stayed loyal.

KING: New one?

CLINTON: Well, not new, no. It's about six or seven years old now.

KING: All right, that the you miss the most. What's the best part about this job?

CLINTON: The very best part is being part of doing what my husband is trying to do help the country and change it. I find that...

KING: You really feel that?

CLINTON: Oh, in my entire being I feel that. You know, I spent a lot of time working on issues that I cared about, whether it was public education or children's health or children's welfare, and I just never understood why we as a country just couldn't get it together and solve some of these problems because we were letting violence consume our kids; we were letting all kinds of things bad happen and now I begin to see people starting to work together, and, of course, I think my husband has had a lot to do with that, kind of telling people take responsibility; be hopeful, but be practical and let's move forward and so I'm thrilled by it.

KING: We'll be right back with Hillary Clinton. Don't go away.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

REP. DICK ARMEY (R), TEXAS: While I don't share the chairman's joy at holding hearings on a government-run health care system, I do share his intention to make the debate and the legislative process as exciting as possible.

CLINTON: I'm sure you will do that, Mr. Armey.

ARMEY: We'll do the best we can.

CLINTON: You and Dr. Kevorkian.

ARMEY: I have been told about your charm and wit and let me say, the reports on your charm are overstated and the reports on your wit are understated.

CLINTON: Thank you. Thank you very much.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE, OCTOBER 2, 1993)

KING: When you assumed this job and took over, he talked about activism before; did you say to your husband give me an area of responsibility? Did you know it would be health care? How did -- why you and health?

CLINTON: Well, that's a good question, Larry.

KING: Because you're healthy.

CLINTON: Well, thank goodness I am. I, you know...

KING: But why health?

CLINTON: I think because it's an issue that my husband cares a great deal about and when he was governor, he cared a great deal about education and he asked me to work on education and we worked together. And then coming into the presidency, he knows if we don't solve our health care problems, we're not going to be able to deal with a lot of our other problems in the country. And I think he decided that he would ask me to work on this the way he'd ask me to work on education.

Now, after it happened, about a day or two later, Governor Cuomo was he here, and I love him, and he came up to me and he said, what did you do? Have a fight with your husband, and I said, you know, I feel like that may be the way some people look at it because it's a huge responsibility. But it was a real -- you know, it was a real honor for me to be asked to work on this and I've really enjoyed it.

KING: Did you know it would become as hard as it was?

CLINTON: I didn't really know what I was getting into when my husband asked me to do it. I knew it was important and I knew that it was something he cared deeply about, but the amount of time I've spent on it has, you know, really been quite extensive.

KING: There's a CNN poll, I think it may have been out today, that has you more popular than your husband, that -- this has been a heck of a week for you. How do you deal with that?

CLINTON: Well, of course I'm grateful if people think that what I'm trying to do is the right thing and helpful.

KING: Now, the poll didn't say more popular, the poll put you as smarter than your husband. Every woman would dream of that, come on!

CLINTON: Yes, but they don't know my husband...

KING: That ticks him?

CLINTON: No, not at all, doesn't bother him at all. In fact, I think one of the secrets to his success is that he is the smartest person I've ever met; and yet he's so friendly and open and such a good guy that people sometimes underestimate him. And that's not always bad in the business he's in, as we've seen in the last several years.

KING: Does he ever close the door and go (SCREAMS)

CLINTON: Sure; sure. You know, sometimes you've just got to let it out, whether it's on the golf course or listening to loud music or whatever it is. Yes, we do a lot of that together.

KING: A lot of fighting, too.

CLINTON: No.

KING: No? How does Hillary let it out?

CLINTON: Well, I like to exercise. I like to listen to music and like to listen to it loud and sing along. I really do let a lot out that way. I like to sleep and get caught up so that I, maybe, am a little better rested than I would be under stressful circumstances.

We do a lot of different things, watch a lot of movies. We're big on movies.

KING: Rental movies, or...

CLINTON: Yes -- and you know what, you've got a movie theater here in the White House.

KING: I know. You didn't know that?

CLINTON: Well I didn't know it until I got here, and it was a wonderful surprise to find a movie theater...

KING: And can you call up the company and get the latest film, right?

CLINTON: Yes, they send them to us. And we are really lucky, because we get to see movies all the time. Apparently every president has enjoyed that.

KING: We are in the first lady's, kind of, here; Jackie Kennedy's over there and Lady Bird.

CLINTON: Right; got Pat Nixon and Eleanor Roosevelt.

KING: Now Eleanor Roosevelt's over there, and you've been most compared to her. First, is that a compliment? CLINTON: Well, to me it's an honor. I don't know that I deserve it; I think she's one of the great women of American history.

KING: Read a lot about her, interviewed her once.

CLINTON: Did you, really? Oh, I'm jealous.

KING: Yes I did; I was 23 years old.

OK, and here's what she said, and I'm going to ask you to comment, because I remember it very well. She always felt that Franklin, as she called him, deserved her opinion and had to hear it. Whether she carried the day or not, when she disagreed, he should hear it. Does Hillary Clinton feel the same?

CLINTON: I agree with that. I think that there are many things I don't have an opinion about that my husband deals with every day, but there are some things I have a strong opinion about. And if he asks me or I feel very strongly about it, like most wives that I know, I will share it with him.

That doesn't mean he always does what I believe or what my opinion is, but we have a wonderful relationship going back to our days in law school where we really liked to talk with each other. And over the years we've influence each other so much by trading opinions and saying, well, why do you believe this and how did you get to that point of view.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

KING: Mrs. Clinton's years in the White House have been a real rollercoaster; types of great triumph and terrible sadness. Vince Foster's death on July 20, 1993 rocked her deeply. We talked about the tragedy in a live interview in May of 1994.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE, MAY 5, 1994)

KING: We were there that night at the White House, that tragedy happened, interviewing your husband. In fact, he and I were the only two that didn't know it has happened. You knew it had happened while he was on.

CLINTON: Well, I was in Arkansas and, while he was on with you, as you remember, because you were there, Mac McClarty called to tell me what had happened and I think everyone just was in shock. I mean, you were there, you saw the faces, people were traumatized.

I mean, I was told they were crying in the hall, and just collapsed on the floor. It was a terrible, terrible experience.

KING: Were you shocked? Did you know there was something the matter?

CLINTON: No; I hadn't ever thought anything like that would happen to someone that I knew and someone who'd been such a good friend of ours for so long. And I hadn't seen nor talked to him in several weeks before it did happen. And I've talked with many people who had who also said, gee, you know, he was working hard and concerned about all the work he had to do, but nothing that really waved any flags in anybody's face.

KING: And no note leaves you with a kind of helpless feeling, doesn't it?

CLINTON: Yes; you know, I don't know if you've had friends or acquaintances who've committed suicide, but...

KING: One acquaintance, I wouldn't say friend.

CLINTON: Well, I have known a number of people, nobody as well as we knew Vince, of course; but lots of times there is no warning. Sometimes people make attempts and they want attention so that maybe they can be helped. But all too often, especially with men between about 40 and 60, as I have now learned, it is something they keep deep inside, often struggling with depression, that -- I've had a friend now come to me and tell me, I never knew before that he had contemplated suicide because of a deep depression.

And he told me that it was like being overwhelmed with blackness. Everywhere he looked he saw no way out. And, through a combination of circumstances, that didn't happen to him; but his efforts to try to explain to us what it must be like to be overcome by a deep, serious, profound depression -- I hope everybody in America learns something from this and maybe we can pick up the signals better.

KING: Your husband the other day criticized the vituperativeness that goes on in the angle. Why do you think you and him create such volatile feelings on the part of opponents? I mean, it's like hate; why do you think that?

CLINTON: Well, I think because he's really trying to change things; and I think that gets people who don't want to see anything changed -- like don't want bans on assault weapons that are going to be used to kill people -- it gets them very agitated.

So any time you really mean what you say and you stand up for it, you're going to create opposition. And if you go back and look at presidents who really made a difference, that's what happened to them.

KING: What do you make of the anger at you?

CLINTON: Oh, I think some of it is part of the fear and insecurity about what my husband's trying to do and the direction he's trying to take our country and get us all moving together again. I think some of it because I'm a kind of transition person in the history of our country.

KING: Even women?

CLINTON: Well, I think that, you know, for many women, the life that I've lead, trying to balance family and work, is what we are all trying to work out in our own lives. But we've never had somebody in my position before who had done that. And I've, you know, worked most of my life and I really believe in women having the full range of choices available to them.

I don't care what choice they make as long as they make the right choice for them; but I think some people would rather have stereotypes, it's easier that way.

KING: Our guests is the first lady of the United States, Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Don't go away.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE, MAY 5, 1994)

KING: OK, Hillary, the key question is: What's with the hair? What's with the hair?

CLINTON: It's different every day.

KING: Yes, we don't know what to expect. What is today's called?

CLINTON: Well, what is today's called? It's called spray it and hope it doesn't fall in your face when you're talking to Larry.

KING: Who does -- do you have...

CLINTON: Oh, I have great help with my hair. Yes. I need help.

KING: Is this your favorite?

CLINTON: Every one is my favorite. I can't make up my mind. That's the real problem.

KING: That's the problem. How long has this been going on, Hillary? Tell us about it.

CLINTON: Ever since I was a little girl, Larry. It's been something I've struggled with all my life. I'm hoping somebody's going to form a group hair anonymous I can join.

KING: And you have secret meetings and stand up...

CLINTON: Secret meetings and you stand up and you talk about your bad hair day.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

KING: A little more than two years after that exchange, the first lady sat down with me for another face to face. She had a lot more on her mind than bad hair days. Among the problems, fallout from the 1993 firing of seven people from the White House travel office.

KING: What about the allegations against you? How have you dealt with that?

CLINTON: Well, just as with these allegations against my husband. Every time there's been any kind of official investigator or report what people alleged has been proven to be not true and eventually that's what the American people will see of all of these politically inspired investigations.

KING: The Travelgate story; they were all on this show, all the travel office, and they said that their word that they got was that you wanted them out. I'd like to hear it from you.

CLINTON: Well, I have said repeatedly ever since that happened that I had no role in the decision of getting them out of the White House, but I did express concern and I think that that concern was well-founded that if somebody anywhere in the White House were misusing funds or negligent about the use of funds that should be looked into and taken seriously.

KING: The first thing, though, is if a first lady expresses concern that might appear to an underling to mean I better take some action.

CLINTON: Well, you know, I tell the story about being in France for a state dinner and a meeting -- this was when President Mitterand was in office -- and meeting with his wife earlier in the day and at the end of our conversation she said she felt so bad that there wouldn't be any flowers on the table at the state dinner.

And I said well why, and she said well because, you know, we were told that you would not let flowers be on any tables for dinners because of your husband's allergies. And I said, well, madame, I never said such a thing. I might have expressed some concern about my husband's allergies, but we have flowers on the table at our state dinners. Is it too late? Can you get flowers and she was greatly relieved. So, that was...

KING: So, you just expressed concern and they dumped the flowers. So, is it possible that you expressed concern and they fired people?

CLINTON: No, I don't know what's possibly because I can't speculate on what somebody heard. I know that I said, you know, if this is something that is a concern, it should be looked into. But I know that we have had some funny experiences in the past three or so years where, you know, my husband will say, gee, I want a banana and the next thing you know there's bananas everywhere. So, we have learned to be, you know, maybe a little bit more careful about that.

KING: Is it fair to say you've backed off since health care?

CLINTON: I don't think so, Larry. KING: You don't?

CLINTON: No, I mean I spent a lot of 1995 writing my book, which I cared very much about and which has some strong opinions in it about child rearing and what American society should do. I have kept a very active speaking schedule around the country. I just finished giving my second commencement this year. I give a third one on Thursday. So, I don't quite know where that came from, but I certainly don't feel given the pace of my life and all my obligations that I'm doing anything much different.

KING: So you will speak out on issues this campaign?

CLINTON: Certainly.

KING: We will know -- you're not going to be Mrs. Wallflower because some people have said that you've backed off and you're not in the combative mode that Hillary was in two years ago.

CLINTON: Well, I think that's a mischaracterization. You know, two years ago I was working on behalf of my husband's health care plan, which he and I both felt very strongly about. We spoke about it separately, together. We tried to explain it to people. And since then I have talked about a lot of other issues and have been, in many events in the White House and around the country on matters, but nothing that has risen to the level of public interest or controversy that the health care issue did. So people may not know everything I've been doing.

KING: Do you see yourself as a role model?

CLINTON: Well, I -- you know, I see myself as somebody who has tried to live my life according to what I believe in and what I think is important. And so when someone says that to me I always say, I hope you will find what's important to you and do that to the best of your ability and make choices that are right for you.

So if I am, to anybody, an example or a role model, I hope it's not to try to be like me, because I don't think there is any way to do that with anyone else but, perhaps, to just know what's right for you and to try to have the courage to do it despite what anybody else might say.

KING: How about dealing with a public marriage, you know, where both people are famous -- what about that aspect?

CLINTON: Well, you know, I married my husband 20-years plus ago and he wasn't famous. He had lost his only political race. I wasn't famous.

KING: So you got famous together?

CLINTON: Well, I don't think -- his career was a public career; and he, certainly now is famous, as president. But I think that we've just been together for so long and we've kind of grown up together, ever since we met each other in law school. So we see our marriage as very private and something that's so important and precious to us that the idea that it's of interest to other people or that people kind of look in and try to figure it out, you know, we just don't pay much attention to that.

KING: Does it surprise you that they do?

CLINTON: Well, I guess it doesn't surprise me because today, you know, people's personality and what they do is seemingly so important and the topic of such conversation.

But I don't think anybody can ever know very much about anybody else's life or their marriage; and so, so much of it is just, you know, kind of off-mark or idle gossip that doesn't really have any relation to reality. We laugh about it a lot.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

KING: More highlights from our interviews with Hillary Rodham Clinton ahead on this special edition of LARRY KING LIVE.

Stay tuned.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

KING: Mrs. Clinton was gracious enough to give us an interview in April of 1997 in the middle of a week celebrating my 40th anniversary of starting in broadcasting.

One subject we covered: the Whitewater controversy and the comments of another LARRY KING LIVE guest.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE, APRIL 29, 1997)

KING: OK, Jim McDougal was here a couple weeks ago, a very bitter, kind of sad case, and very hurt. And he says he was done wrong. What's your side?

CLINTON: I'm not going to comment on anything he has to say.

KING: Why?

CLINTON: I just don't think that's a useful thing for me to do. And this matter, as you know, being investigated, and looked into, and I just don't think that I will comment on Jim.

KING: All right, then forget what he said. How about the sadness of former friends?

CLINTON: Well...

KING: You had to go through that at the White House. "The New York Times" did a story about people who were and no longer are -- isn't that?

CLINTON: Well, that makes me sad. You know, I obviously am sad when misfortune befalls anyone, and especially people that I have any acquaintance or friendship with. And so I do, I'm very sorry about a lot of the things that have happened to people.

But I just, you know, I just believe that in the great scope of things, you know, the numbers of people who have been our friends, the kinds of friendships that Bill and I have had over a lifetime, have sustained us, and we have tried to be sustainable friends to people. So, of course, I'm sad when anyone has any kind of misfortune. But I'm also very heartened every day by the friends that we have, and the friendship that we continue to enjoy.

KING: The other day the press conference the president was asked, why shouldn't -- should he just say to Susan McDougal, just talk. You are not lying, just talk. Would you say the same thing -- he didn't respond. He said it is up to her and her lawyers.

CLINTON: I have nothing to add to what the president said about that.

KING: Wouldn't it help if she just had someone -- wouldn't you feel sorry about someone sitting?

CLINTON: I just don't have anything to add to what the president said. You know, there is a lot of questions about this, and we have just patiently waited, now for well the -- a lot of the questions have gone on for five years.

KING: Someone just reacted to the question.

CLINTON: Yes, indeed, and the investigation has gone on for a number of years; and we have just seen these things kind of ebb and flow; and, you know, we are just going to continue to get up every day, and do what we have to do and not get drawn into all of this.

KING: You may be too close to the forest for trees, but with all the attacks that have occurred, how do explain the popularity of Bill Clinton?

CLINTON: I think it is because the people in this country very much support and appreciate what he is doing as president, and discount dramatically -- as they should -- a lot of these attacks.

KING: They don't believe them?

CLINTON: I don't -- I think many people don't believe them. I think many people have seen these attacks grow in ferocity and then just fade into nothingness; and really what the American people want from a president is someone who is doing the business of governing the country. And I think people get a little frustrated by the diversions and the attacks, and the time spent on anything other than the people's business. And they know that my husband works many, many hours every day trying to do what he can to solve the problems of America, and that is what they want him to be doing.

KING: Does get annoyed? He is human.

CLINTON: Yeah, he is human, and from time to time over the last how many ever years, I'm sure he's felt annoyance from time to time, or frustration, but doesn't let that bother him, and he doesn't dwell on it. I mean he is one of the most optimistic and resilient human beings that I have every heard about, let alone known. And I think he is also leading by example in a very important way.

He is someone who does not wish those who wish him ill, any ill at all. He doesn't have a vengeful bone in his body. He turns the other cheek, because he just doesn't believe that as a man, or as a leader, he should be brought down to the level of engaging in the kind of bitter recrimination, accusation, falsehoods and slander that so many other people spend their time doing. From his perspective, you've got one life to live.

I heard a great line today, that was a Jackie Kennedy line. You know, life comes first, and if you allow yourself to get dragged down by other people's agendas or their particular slant on something instead of using your energy to do what you believe in doing, then basically you have ceded your life to them.

And I think that his example over the last five years as he has weathered all of these attacks is an example that Americans are beginning to really appreciate. And certainly the election showed that.

KING: All right, let's look at those years here.

CLINTON: Oh, my gosh.

KING: Biggest mistake -- your -- if you were to say, boy, if I had to do it over, I would.

CLINTON: Well, if there were a way that I think I could have known more about what I was getting into and understand more about, you know, the way Washington works and the expectations in Washington, I think I could have had a sort of smoother entry into Washington and maybe not have made some of the mistakes that I certainly did make in getting adjusted.

KING: What were -- If you were to say that, my biggest was?

CLINTON: Well, I think probably the biggest that my husband and I would say is, you know, not really understanding the way that Washington worked and the way the White House worked and having a clear sense from the beginning about what was possible and what wasn't possible. I mean, health care is an obvious example of that.

But I think that we are also very pleased by everything that he's been able to do, and we've loved being here. So, you know, it kind of...

KING: When you say the Washington ways, what...

CLINTON: ... balances itself out.

KING: Our guest is Hillary Rodham Clinton on this 40th anniversary of my entrance into broadcasting -- can't believe it. But she was 9 years old, right? At least that's a relief. At least she was around. We'll be right back.

Don't go away.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE, APRIL 29, 1997)

KING: Do you think about what you want to do in 2000? I mean you must. You're going to be very young.

CLINTON: Thank you, Larry, thank you very much.

KING: What does -- what does, for example, Bill talk about doing?

CLINTON: We don't talk about it.

KING: You don't at all?

CLINTON: Not at all. I mean, we know that he'll be leaving the White House and we'll have to do some other things.

KING: And, he'll be how old?

CLINTON: Gosh, let me see...

KING: Fifty?

CLINTON: Fifty-five, maybe, yeah.

KING: Young guy.

CLINTON: He'll be -- he'll still be 54 because he'll turn 55 in 2001. I don't know.

KING: He's been a politician all of his life.

CLINTON: Yeah, he's been in public life all of his life and he's loved every minute of it, but he is a very talented, able person and I think, anything he turns his mind to.

KING: Even like "Bill Clinton Live."

CLINTON: This is a good idea. What do you think?

KING: Would he do well with this show, he would do very well.

CLINTON: He would do very well.

KING: What about Hillary?

CLINTON: I want a long vacation when this is all over.

KING: How long, like a year? CLINTON: Oh, I don't know, a very long time. I have no idea what I am going to do. And, I don't really worry about it because I think you can't plan your life. I certainly didn't plan to be sitting here as I am talking to you. That's not anything I thought about when I was growing up or even when I was a young adult, so I don't really have any plans. I'll just wait and see what happens.

KING: Where do you live?

CLINTON: That we -- you know...

KING: You don't have a house?

CLINTON: We don't have a house, but you know, the president is going to build his library in Little Rock and we will be, obviously, spending a lot of our time and living there, and then I assume we'll travel and do some other things that are of interest to us.

KING: First time we interviewed you, you said you didn't know where your car was and you haven't driven a car. Have you driven a car?

CLINTON: I have driven a car a couple of times in the last four years.

KING: Sneaking out?

CLINTON: No, Secret Service and I have a deal that every once in a while, they'll let me drive.

KING: In the country or in the city?

CLINTON: Usually in the country. Usually not -- although I drove on Election Day in Little Rock. I drove a bunch of my friends from downtown to my mother's house, so that was a hair raising adventure.

KING: Of course, I know you told us how much you like driving. You had that favorite car. You love that car.

CLINTON: Yeah, I just -- you know, I haven't done it for so long, I probably would probably be a real hazard.

KING: When is the last time Bill drove?

CLINTON: Oh, he hasn't drove -- he hasn't driven for a long time, probably, gosh, probably back since '92 sometime.

KING: Because...

CLINTON: Oh, that's -- but, except I think he has maybe at Camp David driven a little bit, but not much.

KING: What's it like up there?

CLINTON: It's very peaceful and it's secluded and it's a place where you can really be alone when you get a chance to go there.

KING: Has the presidency drawn you closer?

CLINTON: Well, I think we have always been close, but we've gotten to spend a lot of time together because he works above the store, you might say. It's just down the hall. And, so we get to have a lot of meals together. We get to see each other a lot during the day if we have time. So, the time has been much more available to us.

KING: We're going to learn Hillary's college tomorrow, those who keep...

CLINTON: Chelsea's.

KING: Chelsea's -- Hillary's been there already.

CLINTON: Tomorrow's the last day, she has to.

KING: It ain't Georgetown. I know this, because you told us...

CLINTON: Well, it might have been because she loves Georgetown, but it's too close to home.

KING: She's out of town.

CLINTON: Yes, yes.

KING: Do you want to go live with her?

CLINTON: I do. I do. I want to be her roommate.

KING: Stuart, Florida for the first lady, hello.

CALLER: Yes, hello, Mrs. Clinton, first I'd like to say I think you're a great first lady.

CLINTON: Thank you.

CALLER: And are you considering running for office in the future?

CLINTON: No, no.

KING: At all?

CLINTON: No.

KING: No circumstance under which you would?

CLINTON: Not that I can imagine. No, that is not anything I have ever thought of for myself. I must say I really admire people like my husband, who are willing to fade the heat to be in politics, especially today.

(END VIDEOTAPE) (COMMERCIAL BREAK)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP, FEBRUARY 6, 2000)

CLINTON: I am honored today to announce my candidacy for the United States Senate from New York.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

KING: The next time we talked to Hillary Rodham Clinton was in August of last year. It was day one of the Democratic National Convention in Los Angeles. The first lady was a candidate by then, running hard for a U.S. Senate seat in New York.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE, AUGUST 14, 2000)

KING: Are you glad you're making this race?

CLINTON: I am having the time of my life.

KING: Now, that you have the advantage of hindsight, glad you did it?

CLINTON: Absolutely. I'm enjoying it so much. I didn't know what it would feel like to be a candidate because I'd never done it before.

KING: What does it feel like? What is it like?

CLINTON: Well, it's very different. You know, for 30 years I've worked on behalf of causes and candidates and particularly on behalf of my husband in his many races, and I've always enjoyed doing that, thought it was important, never really believed I would be on the other side of that line, being a candidate myself, and it takes some getting used to. There's a real learning curve. Even if you've been around it for years, as I have, once you're the person on the front line, who is, you know, making the statements and doing the interviews about not out what someone else believes whom you're supporting, but what you believe and what you'll fight for -- it's a very different feeling.

KING: So it's not "Vote for him"; it's "Vote for me."

CLINTON: That's right.

KING: How about fund raising? Some people have said the hardest thing in politics is to ask for money.

CLINTON: It's very hard.

KING: Now you're asking for you. It's thing to ask for someone else. Is that hard?

CLINTON: Well, it's hard, but you have to do it. I want to change the system; that's why I support campaign finance reform, because I don't think it's a good system for our democracy. But it is the system we have, and if you believe strongly, as I do, that we need to continue the progress of the last eight years and that it's important who is a partner in the Senate with Al and Joe, then you go out and you work as hard as you can, and that includes raising the money to make the campaign.

KING: An old friend of ours, Marvin Davis (ph), told me that you told him seven years ago you wanted to live in New York.

CLINTON: Yes, that's true.

KING: That this wasn't the -- way before this Senate jump.

CLINTON: I've always wanted to live in New York.

KING: Why?

CLINTON: Why not? I mean, there isn't any place like it.

KING: You're a Chicagoan, though. That's...

CLINTON: But I've been -- you know, I've...

KING: "Big Shoulders."

CLINTON: You know, I've had a wonderful life, because, look, I was born and raised in Chicago. I went to school in New England, and law school. I got to live in Arkansas, made the friends of a lifetime there. Got to live in Washington.

But like so many other people from all over the world, I've always wanted to live in New York. And I told Marvin, I've told a lot of people over the years that after the White House years I wanted to move to New York and have a chance to experience New York City and everything that goes with it.

KING: And when you can't -- you don't experience it as an everyday New Yorker. I mean, you have the Secret Service and...

CLINTON: Well, it's a little different, Because I used to love going and just being able to walk down the street before the White House years: going to a museum, going to a play, going out to a great restaurant. It is a lot harder for me now, but that will get easier after Bill's no longer president.

KING: And how is Chelsea enjoying being part of a campaign, Chelsea, who you've sheltered so well, who we, the public, really don't know.

CLINTON: Well, thank you. Thank you and the press for giving her the space...

KING: They have, haven't they?

CLINTON: They have, and I hope it continues with all the children involved in this presidential campaign. You know, the Bushes and the Gores and the Liebermans all have young children, not adults yet. So I hope that the pattern that has started with our daughter will continue.

But I am -- I'm enjoying having her with us. She has always been a part of our life, and politics has always been a part of our family. So she has been with her -- with her -- with my husband, her father, been with me from time to time. And it's been a great treat.

KING: She's enjoying it?

CLINTON: Yes, she likes it. You know, and she -- you know, she's good to have around.

KING: Not bad. The times I've known her, she's a terrific person.

CLINTON: Thank you.

KING: And how, frankly, are you doing, emotionally? I mean, you went through a tough thing. The whole world knew. You know, when you see the whole -- it's embarrassing. Hard to come through? It's got to be tough.

CLINTON: But, you know, that's my business. And I don't talk about my personal business, and I feel strongly that what goes on in a marriage or a family should remain in that marriage and in that family. And I'm very, you know, happy doing what I'm doing. I feel very committed to making this race, because I believe so strongly in these issues. I have worked on them for 30 years. It's what I care most about in public life, and that's what I do every day.

KING: And the rest is none of our business.

CLINTON: That's right.

CLINTON: Sixty-two counties, 16 months, three debates, two opponents and six black pants suits later, because of you, here we are.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

KING: Our most recent interview with Mrs. Clinton was less than a month ago in the White House. The country still wasn't sure who the next president was going to be, but the first lady was very definitely the Democratic senator-elect from New York.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

KING: How do I address you now? I've known you so long. Is it Madam First Lady, Hillary, Hillary Rodham, Senator? CLINTON: It's a little confusing, isn't it?

KING: Yes. What do you like the best?

CLINTON: Well, I -- gee, all of those are, you know, really wonderful things.

KING: Do you call a senator-elect a senator?

CLINTON: I don't know. That's a good question. You know, I've been telling people that I'm not a senator until I'm sworn in on January 3. So, how about Hillary?

KING: Just senator-elect. Do you like the term senator?

CLINTON: I do like the term, yes.

KING: It fits?

CLINTON: I feel very good about it. You know, it was a great campaign. I had the help of thousands and thousands of people across New York and lots of friends around the country.

And I'm very excited. I went to Senate school last week.

KING: What was that like?

CLINTON: It was great.

KING: Senate school.

CLINTON: Yes. I mean, it was wonderful. I mean, we had an opportunity to hear Senator Byrd talk about the history of the Senate, and we did it in the Old Senate Chambers, where so much of that history took place.

I spent time meeting my new colleagues, both Democrats and Republicans. It was a really good way to start getting oriented toward the Senate.

KING: Did you take offense to Trent Lott's statement that you're -- don't expect anything, you're just another wheel in the -- cog in the wheel?

CLINTON: Well, you know, I'm just one of a hundred, and that is -- that's a factual statement.

KING: You didn't take -- you didn't...

CLINTON: You know, people say things sometimes in the heat of partisanship. And we've had a very cordial encounter in the Senate. We went from Senator Daschle's office to Senator Lott's office, and he gave us a wonderful history lesson about that office and the role that it's played in the history of the Congress.

KING: How did he treat you? CLINTON: Very cordially. Very collegially, which is what I expected. I have gotten to know him and his wife over the last eight years, and I expect that, you know, there will be differences, obviously. He has a role to play and a party to represent.

But I imagine wherever we can, we'll try to work together. And certainly, I see no reason for us not to be in a very collegial, cordial relationship.

KING: So you're optimistic that this government can work, that this can be four fruitful years, no matter who's at the -- who's sitting at the -- your old -- in your old -- in this house?

CLINTON: Well, I believe that America is at heart an optimistic country, you know. We are people of an optimistic spirit. And we have work to do, and work doesn't get done if people are drawn into battles over issues that are not going to make a difference in the lives of ordinary Americans.

You know, my hope is that in my work and the work of those in the Senate, you know, we will be able to keep the economy strong and growing, we will be able to improve education and provide health care and protect the environment, all of the things that I campaigned on. You can't do that if you're more interested in scoring political points.

KING: Everyone has said, except maybe you, that you are going to run for president someday. So let's -- I mean, let's say Gore loses. That means the Democratic Party has no incumbent. Are you interested in that office in '04?

CLINTON: No, I'm not. You know...

KING: Not at all?

CLINTON: No, no. I am intent upon being the best senator that I can be. That is what I want to do. I really feel like the people of New York gave me a great honor to give me the opportunity to serve, and that's what I am interested in doing. You know, all of the work that I've done for 30 years now -- it's almost hard to imagine -- going back into my young adulthood, concerns, you know, children and families and education and economic opportunity and health care.

I think we will have an opportunity, no matter how our presidential campaign is finally resolved, for people of good faith to reach across party lines and try to hammer out some of the solutions that I really think the American people want us to work toward.

KING: Did you tell the people of New York that you are going to stay the six years?

CLINTON: Yes, I surely did.

KING: And you wouldn't change that?

CLINTON: No, I wouldn't. KING: So that's as definitive as you can get, right?

CLINTON: As definitive as I can get.

KING: One final thing, it's Inaugural Day. Somebody is being sworn in.

CLINTON: Right.

KING: Will that be a joyous occasion, no matter who? Or will it be -- what's going on?

CLINTON: Oh, you know, it's going to be a poignant moment for me, because the eight years will be ending, my husband's presidency will be ending, I will be assuming a different role, my husband will be going on, I know, to do other things. So no matter what the outcome of the election, it's going to be poignant.

But it will also be very reinforcing. You know, I am such a strong believer in the fundamental strength of American values and institutions. You know, I'm just a dyed-in-the-wool, sort of sentimental patriot about what our country means. And the orderly, peaceful transfer of power is something that we have demonstrated for, you know, more than two centuries.

KING: So if it's George Bush raising his right hand, there's no biting of the bottom lip?

CLINTON: Not for me. For me, I'm hoping that when this is finally resolved -- and, of course, I believe strongly that the best evidence of the way it should be resolved are the votes of the people who actually voted in the election.

But it is in the courts. And when it is resolved, certainly, you know, I'm prepared to serve with and to -- you know, to watch whoever the next president is swear loyalty to our Constitution.

KING: Madam Senator-elect, First Lady, thank you very much.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

KING: Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, a trailblazing first lady. It will be fascinating to see her in action in the U.S. Senate.

Thanks for watching this special edition of LARRY KING LIVE. Have a great weekend. Good night.

AL GORE, VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: Do you solemnly swear that you will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic, that you will bear truth faith and allegiance to the same, that you take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion, and that you will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which you are about to enter, so help you God. CLINTON: I do.

GORE: Congratulations.

HILLARY CLINTON'S LEGACY AS FIRST LADY

As President Clinton prepares to leave the White House at the end of this week, so too does Hillary Rodham Clinton. But as she closes the book on her days as first lady, she's already begun to write a new chapter in what is a most compelling personal story. Bill Plante has more.

BILL PLANTE reporting:

Her friends and colleagues are never at a loss for words of praise.

Ms. SARA EHRMAN (Friend of Hillary Clinton): A great sense of humor, a raucous laugh.

Ms. KAREN FINNEY (Former Press Secretary): A very hardworking person, a loyal person.

PLANTE: But if Hillary Rodham Clinton inspired her friends, she infuriated her enemies. The most non-traditional first lady since Eleanor Roosevelt, she arrived at the White House believing that she and her husband could offer the nation two-for-one in the Oval Office. She took on health care reform less than a week after her husband was inaugurated.

President BILL CLINTON: I think that in the coming months the American people will learn, as the people of our state did, that we have a first lady of many talents.

PLANTE: Her health care reform plan was massive and polarizing. The heat proved to be too much. And Mrs. Clinton was forced to back away.

Mr. DAVID GERGEN (Former White House Aide): The debacle over health care and then the loss of the House and Senate, those two together were a double blow to Mrs. Clinton. She had come hoping to be a co-president, in effect. Eleanor Roosevelt squared.

PLANTE: Instead, Hillary Clinton was a magnet for controversy over her commodities trading windfall, which she tried to explain in a news conference...

Mrs. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON: And I did occasionally read, you know, publications like The Journal.

PLANTE: ...over her legal work in Arkansas. An independent counsel was appointed to look into the circumstances of the Clintons' investment in a real estate deal known as Whitewater.

Mr. GERGEN: She just endured an enormous amount of personal criticism and a lot of attacks.

PLANTE: So, Hillary Clinton modified her role, balancing her issues with the more traditional duties of a first lady.

Ms. FINNEY: Even when we were working on health care, you know, she would spend a day in policy meetings all day or on the Hill, and then, come home and have to think about a state dinner that might be coming up.

PLANTE: She ventured, often with daughter Chelsea, to lands far and wide to talk about the welfare of children and women's rights.

But then in early 1998, came the revelation of her husband's infidelity, which threatened to end not only his presidency but perhaps their marriage as well.

Despite the public humiliation, Hillary Clinton, who once said she wasn't like Tammy Wynette, 'Standing by her man,' chose to do just that, and she emerged with a new image and a new role to play.

Mrs. CLINTON: I want to be your senator from New York. Thank you all very much.

Ms. EHRMAN: My first comment was, 'Are you out of your mind?'

Ms. FINNEY: I think particularly what people liked in the Senate race was that she demonstrated how hard she was willing to work.

PLANTE: And after a hard-fought campaign, Hillary Clinton became the first first lady elected to the United States Senate.

Ms. EHRMAN: Mrs. Clinton is a woman with a mission.

PLANTE: It's a mission that may one day take her even beyond the Senate, back to the White House.

“CNN Newsroom,” CNN, 1/18/2001

The atmosphere was more cordial at the confirmation hearings of four other Bush nominees: Paul O'Neill for Treasury secretary, Mel Martinez for secretary of Housing and Urban Development, Colin Powell for secretary of state and Christie Whitman for the Environmental Protection Agency. New Jersey Gov. Christie Whitman won both Democratic and Republican support Wednesday from senators considering her nomination as the head of the Environmental Protection Agency. Several other Cabinet nominees also earned high marks from senators.

Jonathan Karl has details.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: I'm looking forward to working on behalf of the issues that this committee is concerned with.

JONATHAN KARL, CNN CORRESPONDENT (voice-over): In her first committee hearing, New York's junior senator was a studious freshman, one of just two senators who stayed for Christie Todd Whitman's entire confirmation hearing. Clinton seemed eager to show she'd done her homework.

SEN. CLINTON: We suffer from acid rain that comes from two geographic locations: power plants in the Midwest, and then increasingly some power plants in Canada.

KARL: Clinton said she'd vote yes on George W. Bush's choice to run the Environmental Protection Agency. She also offered to bridge ideological and regional divides to work with Ohio Republican George Voinovich on combating acid rain.

SEN. CLINTON: I'd love to take you up to the Adirondacks. I'll come visit some of the plants and we'll see if we can't bring people together around this.

SEN. GEORGE VOINOVICH (R), OHIO: I look forward to joining in the Voinovich-Clinton or Clinton-Voinovich Bill.

SEN. CLINTON: Voinovich-Clinton. I'm well aware of seniority here.

U.S. SENATOR JAMES JEFFORDS (R-VT) HOLDS CONFIRMATION HEARING FOR LABOR SECRETARY- DESIGNATE ELAINE CHAO, 1/24/2001

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I join in welcoming Ms. Chao and also her family, who are constituents of mine in New York. And I'm delighted that they could be here for this very important event.

I thank you for your service in the past and look forward to working with you in the future. I echo the comments of all who have spoken before me and will not repeat the issues that they raised, and will look forward to the questions.

But I do think that it's important to emphasize something Senator Collins has said, and that is, of course, the globalization of the economy and the challenges that it still poses to our work force here in the United States.

There's a tremendous opportunity for us to put into place 21st-century labor and economic policies that will enable us to put a human face on globalization and to make us as productive as we need to be in the future, as we have been over the last several years.

In particular, I'm concerned about pension plans that remove the reliability that workers should be able to count on as they go through their work life. I'm concerned about the need for better training that is really matched with work force capacity that we have to fill; the Family and Medical Leave Act and other issues that try to help workers balance family and work responsibilities, which become increasingly important. And along that line, the whole issue about compensatory leave, as opposed to paying workers for overtime work, is one that I'm concerned about.

But I just wanted to focus in my brief comments on pensions, because pension reform is, for me, an issue that is just looming out there. There are a lot of unfunded and underfunded pension responsibilities, a lot of corporate decisions that are using pension funds for purposes other than what they were intended to. So we need to have a plan about how to improve asset portability and strengthen legal protections for pension plan participants. Because certainly in our global economy, we have to increase savings and retirement security for all of our workers.

I look very much forward to working with you on behalf of American workers. And am very pleased by this nomination and the commitment and experience that you will bring to the task.

JEFFORDS: Senator Sessions?

SESSIONS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I first would like to express my congratulations and appreciation for the service of former Secretary Alexis Herman from my town of Mobile, Alabama. She worked extremely hard in this position, was extraordinarily responsive to the requests of this Congress, and I think made quite a number of changes. But some more need to be made.

This is a $40 billion agency with 17,000 employees, and it's going to be a great challenge. I believe that in Elaine Chao we have a nominee that can more than meet those challenges, who, from my conversations with her, is just so anxious to get started and so committed to doing the right thing effectively, that I just know she's going to be successful.

And with a background as deputy secretary of the Department of Transportation in which she had to deal with quite a number of challenges, including the Hurricane Hugo, the earthquake, Pan Am, and Exxon Valdez, none of which you caused, but had to respond to. I guess perhaps living with Mitch, you're used to cleaning up messes; I'm not sure.

But that is a great record.

And then you took over the Peace Corps and served as leader of the Peace Corps and then as president and CEO of United Way of America after it had suffered great credibility losses and was really in a state of disarray. You brought that together and left there after having reinvigorated that great institution.

You have a tremendous record of achievement. And I believe we probably need more bipartisanship in the labor force; we need more teamwork between workers; we need more flexibility. We need to convert our labor laws from the '30s mentalities to a new century, a new millennium of partnership between workers and labor. And I believe you'll do a great job.

We're delighted you're here. And it's a delight also to have your family with you.

Thank you.

JEFFORDS: Senator Dodd?

DODD: Welcome. Very nice to see you. I'm very impressed that you have Senator Bunning and Senator Leahy with you here. I don't know who the other fellow is to your right there that's along with you, the other side of Kentucky, but we welcome him as well. And we're honored that you're before the committee and congratulate you and President Bush for submitting your name to the committee.

I had the wonderful pleasure on inauguration morning of meeting your parents. And I'm delighted they're here with us as well. And we welcome you both.

And let me second the comments made by Jeff Sessions about Alexis Herman as well. She did a wonderful job as secretary of labor. We're all deeply proud of her record, and know that you're going to pursue similar goals and values that she brought to the job.

We had the pleasure of working together when you were director of the Peace Corps. And as a former volunteer and on the committee that has jurisdiction over the Peace Corps in the Foreign Relations Committee, you did a very fine job there. And I know that many of the former volunteers and staff at the Peace Corps speak highly of your service as the director of the Peace Corps.

I'll wait for the question period to raise issues. We had a wonderful conversation in the office the other day about a number of things that I'm interested in pursuing. Family and medical leave is an issue that I have a deep interest in, having authored the bill along with my good friends Kit Bond from Missouri, who is here with us on this committee today, and a number of others, Arlen Specter. There was a very bipartisan effort. Senator Kennedy played a very important role.

I always took great pride in the fact that the very first piece of legislation signed by President Clinton was the Family and Medical Leave Act on a February morning back eight years ago. And I know he was very proud of the legislation.

Some 35 million people have taken advantage of that Family and Medical Leave Act. So we'd like to pursue that. We had good reports a few weeks ago on how well it's working, on surveys done by employers who had felt that the law was working very, very well. And so we want to pursue that and discuss that with you and see what efforts we can make to enhance and strengthen even that law.

So I look forward to your service. Pleased you have decided to come back into public life. You've distinguished yourself over the years with your service. And I'm confident you will again. I look forward to supporting your nomination. And I do welcome my chairman from the Rules Committee here, Mitch McConnell. He's been a good friend. And I look forward to your working with the committee.

CHAO: Thank you.

JEFFORDS: Senator DeWine?

DEWINE: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

And I join my colleagues in welcoming Elaine Chao as the nominee. I can't exceed the laudatory comments and smart cracks of my colleague from Alabama. I will not try. But I would second all of the nice things that have been said.

Certainly, based on our discussions and your background, I am confident, Elaine, that you are the right person to pursue the noble and lofty goals of improving the welfare, the job opportunities and the well-being of the working men and women of America. And I know that you take that very seriously in your commitment came through in our discussions.

I would, however, point out that one of the things that we have to be concerned about when we are trying to accomplish all these great purposes in the laws of unintended consequences, and federal laws often have those unintended consequences.

As Senator Dodd, lead cosponsor of Family and Medical Leave, I was concerned about making sure that we didn't force small businesses out of operation and cost jobs. And that's why we put the job -- the 50-employee limit on Family and Medical Leave. And as my colleague from Wyoming has pointed out, by trying to do good things in too heavy-handed a way, we may not only force small businesses out of business, but cost the people we try to help, jobs.

The minimum wage, several years ago the New York Times said the proper minimum wage is now 0.00. They recognized that too high a minimum wage could, in some circumstances, force out of the workplace the teenagers trying to get the first step on the ladder, particularly minority teenagers. That's why it's worthwhile that we consider flexibility. That has been discussed in the minimum wage.

Also, as one who chairs the Small Business Committee, I would urge you to take a look at the ergonomics regulations. Small businesses understand just as large businesses do that ergonomics injuries are not only harmful and painful, they are very costly. That's why they have worked together to bring down the level of ergonomics injuries in recent years.

Unfortunately, what OSHA has done is not to provide working guidelines or help for injuries, but to impose penalties. And this may have a negative impact.

Finally, you have in the Department of Labor a newly established office for Small Business Programs. As we've discussed, I believe we can work together on job training programs to make sure that, for example, the hub zone opportunities where small businesses will get jobs in inner cities from selling to the government, gives not only the Labor Department an opportunity to purchase there, but to bring job training programs in. And we, small business, look forward to working with you to see small business creating the jobs with that the men and women of America need.

I thank you and I wish you well and I look forward to working with you.

JEFFORDS: Senator Reed?

REED: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

And welcome, Ms. Chao and your family, and Senator McConnell and Senator Bunning and Senator Leahy. It was a pleasure to meet with you last week.

As my colleagues have so well-explained, you bring extraordinary range of talents to this job, in addition to your intellect and your reputation for fairness and integrity. So we're all confident that you're going to do a very, very good job.

You will assume these responsibilities at a very interesting time in our history. We've enjoyed unprecedented prosperity over the last several years, and yet, in the midst of that prosperity, there are still families struggling to make ends meet.

Now, you'll find that we have some different views here on the committee. And one view that I have is that the minimum wage should be increased. If you look at the statistics, if there is a worker at a minimum wage job working 40 hours a week, all through the year there will earn about $10,700. And that's $3,400 below the poverty line. I think it's something that we have to address, because we want to make work rewarding. We certainly want to make it a way out of poverty. And that, I think, can be done by increasing the minimum wage. I hope you will address that issue.

And there's another that you are, I'm sure, concerned about, and that is the disparity in the types of income and wages that women earn in our society. I think we have to work creatively and hopefully with business to ensure that an individual is rewarded based upon their talents and not based upon stereotypes. And your efforts in that regard will be deeply appreciated.

There is also a major challenge in making sure that our work force, particularly young workers have all the skills they need. And one program at the Department of Labor has sponsored for generations, at least several decades, has been the Job Corps. That is a very important program. We're very pleased, as I explained in the office, to have a Job Corps center being developed in Rhode Island, our first center. We will join the ranks of most the others states with a Job Corps center. But I would hope that you would continue to invigorate the Job Corps, support it and make it an accessed opportunity for countless Americans who need that chance to succeed in the workplace.

I look forward to working with you and wish you well. And thank you very much for being here today. And I'm eager to here your responses.

Thank you.

JEFFORDS: Senator Warner, congratulations on your fight to get back on this committee. Some might question your sanity, but I praise you for your courage.

WARNER: Mr. Chairman, I thank you for the opportunity to rejoin this committee and be among members for whom I have the greatest respect. I've known the ranking member, I guess, some 40 years. And we'll have a tussle or two, as we've had in the past.

But this is a great committee. It's a strong committee. And the leadership through the years, certainly the current leadership, have propelled it right to the forefront of the Senate responsibilities.

And I thank our distinguished nominee for rejoining the public sector. It's not an easy decision, given the diversity of background that you've had in many jobs and the challenges and the opportunities in the private sector today, to return. But on behalf of the nation, we commend the president. We thank you very much.

Because this nation can be no stronger than the men and women who get up every day, accept the challenges to go out into the workplace, return home to care for their families, and their selves, and indeed their neighborhoods.

So you'll be a great leader. You'll be a role model for generations of younger Americans that are coming along who aspire likewise to achieve the goals that you have.

I wish you luck. And if I may say on a personal note, having known you fairly well through the years, whether it's in the private sector or the public sector, you've accepted the challenges, pursued your responsibilities, with firmness, fairness, always with a quiet dignity. Good luck.

JEFFORDS: Senator Mikulski?

MIKULSKI: Thank you very much, Senator Jeffords. But I note that I was late coming. I'm happy to yield to Senator Clinton because she was here first...

(CROSSTALK)

CLINTON: Thank you for that kindness, Senator.

MIKULSKI: Ms. Chao, hi. When you called me about right after President Bush designated you, I said I felt very comfortable with your nomination. And I felt comfortable because I have three criteria: competence, integrity and a commitment to the mission of the Department of Labor.

I believe you're very competent to do this job, and I think you bring great personal integrity. Your resume speaks for itself. In the way you served the United Way, brought it through a difficult time, restored integrity, public confidence, built coalitions, worked with the labor unions, who are major contributors. Your leadership at the Peace Corps, moving it during a very difficult post-Cold War period. Transportation. All your awards. You have an extraordinary resume.

What I believe is that because of your background you also have a deep commitment to an opportunity ladder in this society. I take President Bush at his word where on Saturday he said he wants to have a single nation, with justice and opportunity and an atmosphere of civility. And I feel you will be -- I have confidence, even looking -- both knowing you and your testimony, to talk about an opportunity ladder.

I'm going to be looking forward, after you give your testimony, to hear about what we talked about on the telephone, which is that we don't have a worker shortage in this country, we have a skill shortage in this country, and that what we need to do is to make sure that everybody who wants to work has the tools to participate in the new economy. And even the old economy, our smokestack economy, is now a cyber-stack.

So I look forward to hearing to make sure that we do not have a digital divide, either through our K through 12, but also in our skill shortage, as well as being very sensitive to the new occupational safety challenges that are affecting us in the new workplaces and the others.

I know we really want to hear from you and the wonderful team out there waiting to introduce you. I look forward to conversations on how we get the job done so people have jobs when all is said and done.

CHAO: Thank you.

JEFFORDS: Senator Gregg?

GREGG: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And it's great to have you here, Ms. Chao. And, you know, you so epitomize the American story and the American dream that your choice as secretary of labor by President Bush, I think, is a reinforcement of that dream. And I just congratulate you on all that you've done that's been so extraordinary.

CHAO: Thank you.

GREGG: I listened to your press conference when you were announced and it was just such an overwhelming story of success and hard work and perseverance, coming to this nation when you were 8 years old and jumping in with both feet, and now becoming secretary of labor. And along the way having contributed so much to the betterment of our country in your various activities at the Peace Corps and with the United Way.

So I'm very excited that you decided to take this opportunity on, and the nation is better because of it, and I look forward to voting for you.

CHAO: Thank you very much.

JEFFORDS: Senator Harkin?

HARKIN: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. And I apologize for being late.

I want to extend a warm welcome to Ms. Chao. Appreciate the opportunity to discuss the challenges that lie before us.

Ms. Chao, as we discussed when we met earlier, I wear a couple of hats. I'm on the authorizing committee here, but I also serve as the ranking member on the Labor, Health and Human Services Appropriations Committee, and so we'll be working with also on budgetary items. In that regard, again, I just want to mention a couple of things that I hope that we can work together on that you will focus on.

Last year -- let me just phrase it this way: We look out across America and we see most people employed. We have low rates of unemployment. That's good for America. But among people with disabilities, and especially people with severe disabilities, you're looking at as high as 80 percent unemployment rates among people with disabilities and severe disabilities.

And so last year I worked with Senator Specter and my colleagues on the Appropriations Committee to fund an Office of Disability Policy at the Department of Labor with an assistant secretary position. So this is something new, it's never been created before. And so you'll be in the position of hiring the first assistant secretary for disability policy.

The office is intended to improve job opportunities for people with disabilities. And so I think the Department of Labor now has a real opportunity to reach out that that sector of America that is severely unemployed and to begin to create the kind of work opportunities and enhancements that people with disabilities need in order to become employed.

And so I am hopeful that you will look for an individual to fill that assistant secretary position who really understands and knows what it means to have to overcome disabilities to get to work every day, and what they face in terms of high unemployment rates.

Lastly, or secondly, Ms. Chao, I've been working for several years, as I mentioned to you earlier, to provide increases in funding to developing countries for the purposes of eliminating child labor. Again, I commend to you to look at the five volumes that have been done in the Department of Labor on child labor around the world. It's really the seminal work on the issue of child labor globally. And I hope, again, that you will continue what your predecessors have done to get the Department of Labor involved in working with IPEC and with ILO to eliminate child labor globally and to improve access to basic education in those areas, and working with the Department of Education.

Two last things, fair pay, you hear a lot about equal pay for equal work, to a great extent, that has been taken care of. But we need to enforce it more and you need some more enforcement. But the big issue is equal pay for comparable work. We have too many women in this country who are working in jobs that are designated as female-oriented jobs. And right now, they're making probably less than 70 cents on the dollar for what a man makes for a comparable job. And I think we need to look at the problem of underpaying workers in what has been traditionally female-dominated jobs, such as nursing homes, hospitals, day care, child care, that type of thing.

And so those are the issues I hope to be working together with you on.

Let me just conclude by saying that organized labor has done a lot for this country. I believe that many of the freedoms and many of the quality of life aspects that we enjoy in America have been brought to us because of the efforts of organized labor over many years. I come out of organized labor, that's where my father came from, and I just again hope that you'll have a close working relationship with organized labor. I know you have in the past with United Way, and I have every assurance that you will continue that.

So, again, I welcome and look forward to working with you.

JEFFORDS: Senator Frist?

FRIST: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I join in applauding President Bush for your nomination as secretary of labor. Your list of accomplishments are already outlined in so many different fields, whether it's business or whether it's government or the non-profit sector, really is truly remarkable. You distinguished yourself as a leader, as a decision-maker, as one who really does touch something and that something grows, becomes better, of higher quality, more compassionate. It's consistent as one follows throughout your, as I said, remarkable career.

The path that lays ahead of you as we've gone down and addressed some of those and introduced some of those, indeed will be difficult, but as you look back over your past, whether it is in the Peace Corps or at the Department of Transportation or as CEO of United Way, each and every time, you've brought to the table the maturity, the judgment, the careful thought processes, the common sense to address these complicated, these numerous problems. And I expect -- and I guess we all expect -- that you'll be taking that same set of skills, same set of leadership and management skills to your new position as secretary of labor.

I hope to have the opportunity to address really two issues. And one has been mentioned in part, and that is the new economy, the globalization aspects of the new economy that we see, and in addition to that, the information technology aspects as it affects both the domestic economy, the job creation as well as the globalization which has been mentioned. How will we best prepare this current work force to address the new economy?

The other issue is one that Senator Harkin mentioned, that is, addressing the whole concept of individuals with disabilities, of maximizing the opportunity, the potential of individuals with disabilities. He pointed to Secretary Herman's announcement of the Office of Disability Policy, and I think that is a tremendous first step that we can concentrate, that we can focus and address the whole issue of how to increase the employment rate of individuals with disabilities.

President Bush -- and I look forward to hearing more about that, hopefully over the course of the morning -- had made helping people with disabilities a high priority in terms of quality employment. And he's proposed a comprehensive New Freedom Initiative that will help integrate Americans with disabilities into the workplace.

Again, congratulations. I am delighted. I'm very excited about working with you on a number of these issues as we come forward.

JEFFORDS: Senator Bingaman?

BINGAMAN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Congratulations to you. I certainly intend to support your nomination. I think you're well-qualified for the position. I will be in touch with you on a couple of issues also. Let me just mention them briefly.

One is, we passed a bill this last year to provide compensation to workers who have worked in our nuclear weapons production complex and who have been injured either from exposure to beryllium or radiation or whatever. The responsibility for administering that law has been put at the Department of Labor. And I want to follow up with you to be sure that that's given priority.

I think the law becomes effective in July. So I will certainly be in touch with you on that.

BINGAMAN: The other is trade adjustment assistance. I'm persuaded that it's time for us to modernize our trade adjustment assistance laws. And I hope very much to work with you on that as well.

Congratulations to you. And I wish you well in this new position.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

JEFFORDS: I thank my colleagues for excellent statements. It's now our time to turn to the introduction.

Now, to those who will introduce the nominee and I turn first to the senator from Kentucky, the junior senator, for his remarks.

MCCONNELL: Mr. Chairman, if you don't mind, I think we'll have Senator Leahy lead off and then Senator Bunning and then myself. Would that be all right?

JEFFORDS: Well, that's all right. I had it the other way around, but that's quite all right.

LEAHY: Whatever you say, Mr. Chairman. I understand that there's been some concern, and I thank my friends...

JEFFORDS: Certainly, Senator, please proceed.

LEAHY: ... from Kentucky. I really am honored to be here with Elaine Chao. And I think the president made an excellent choice.

Everything has been said about her, I believe, and everybody has said it, but I will put most of this statement in the record. But I wanted to emphasize the high regard there is for Elaine Chao on both sides of the aisle, and also to say how wonderful it is her mother and father and family could be here with her.

Elaine, I can only begin to imagine the sense of pride they're feeling for you, but the sense of pride you must have in having them here.

I first got to know Elaine when she was the director of the Peace Corps, and that, with all the other positions she's held, all of which she's done very, very well, this was an extraordinary one. She expanded the Peace Corps mission beyond its traditional areas of agricultural and health and education. She tried to bring it into the former Soviet republics. What she did was to recruit volunteers with graduate degrees in business. That took the Peace Corps way beyond where it had been, but it focused resources on strengthening the private sector that could be the economic growth in so many of these developing countries.

During the time when I worked with her, I never saw an instance where she did not put our nation's ideas first. I never saw her take political positions or whether those positions that would strengthen the ideas of our country.

Senator Dodd has served and served with distinction, as did some others, in the Peace Corps. And this is the one area where we can really make the ideas of the country shine and she did that.

Same way she did when she went to United Way and restored the tarnished reputation of that organization. That organization has done so much good and would have had to stop doing that good has she not come in there and restored it.

And she also happens to be married to Senator Mitch McConnell. Now Senator McConnell and I are very good friends, but I would say that their marriage is more about his good judgment than anything else. And while we may be different in some political things, we share the common bond that both of us have married way above ourselves.

And this is a case where I saw, I remember when Elaine and Senator McConnell and my wife, Marcelle, and I took a trip to the former Soviet Union together. And, again, how beneficial it was having her there.

Mr. Chairman, I'll just close with this: I consider a great honor to even be asked to be one of the introducers. I think the president has made a very wise choice. I know that you and Senator Kennedy and the committee will hear all the testimony, but I would hope we would have a very early vote on Ms. Chao on the Senate floor and I intend to vote for her.

JEFFORDS: Thank you, Senator Leahy.

Senator Bunning?

BUNNING: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

I don't know if I can add too much to what my senior senator will have to say. He obviously has a pretty good reference. But I'm proud and excited to be here today to help introduce the woman who is going to be the first Cabinet secretary from Kentucky in over 50 years.

I'm extremely happy that the president nominated Elaine to be our labor secretary. She is exceptionally smart and qualified, and someone whose managerial background and temperament will suit here well in that position.

Elaine's biography and experience are impeccable and impressive. The president has made a great choice. She has run government agencies, she has help steer the United Way out of deep trouble. She has worked in the private sector and the academic community. Elaine Chao has done it all, and we're lucky that she wants to serve her country again.

Mr. Chairman, Elaine is living proof that the American dream is alive and well and continues to be alive and well. For all those who think that opportunity is not here in America, she is living proof that it is.

When her family arrived in America, she couldn't speak a single word of English. She is now about to become a Cabinet secretary. Her life story is an inspiration for American workers who struggle to succeed and every day try to do better for themselves and their families.

In Kentucky we take great pride in our people, in our commonwealth. I have always been very, very proud to say that I am a Kentuckian by birth. But in Kentucky we are especially proud of those like Elaine who are Kentuckians by choice. It's just another example of her good judgment.

Mr. Chairman, Elaine Chao will make a great secretary of labor and I hope you confirm her quickly.

Thank you very much.

JEFFORDS: Thank you very much.

I'll turn to the senior senator from Kentucky, who, I believe, has an unusual perspective on the nominee and I would accept, perhaps, that this is the first time that this has occurred in the Senate.

KENNEDY: I want him sworn, Mr...

(LAUGHTER)

(CROSSTALK)

JEFFORDS: Senator McConnell?

MCCONNELL: I thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. And as you can imagine, the last couple of weeks have been overwhelming for our family. The encouragement and positive support Elaine has received since President Bush nominated her for this position has really been stunning. Particularly among the Asian-American community for whom she's been a role model for a long time, extraordinary excitement.

I want to say how incredibly honored I am to be here today, not as the senior senator from Kentucky, but as the proud spouse of a woman I believe will be one of the best secretaries of labor our country has ever had. You all have all addressed her extraordinary accomplishments, and Jim has mentioned the attitude at home; 55 years is a long time since the last Cabinet secretary from Kentucky and our people are just thrilled that this has occurred.

And on a personal note, all of us who have been in politics, I think -- and won elections probably think the great thrills are the nights that we win. But I must tell you, Elaine's selection by President Bush was more exciting than anything I have ever experienced in my entire life. He made a fantastic choice. I hope the committee will do the same.

And now I'm going to do what I do best, and that is to shut up and let Elaine do the talking.

JEFFORDS: Thank you all for...

(UNKNOWN): Mr. Chairman, in the spirit of honesty, I don't know whether that's what he does best, but I want to thank all of the nominations, the speeches and all and now we will turn -- but first before we turn to your word, I wish you would introduce your family, if you might do that for us, so we can know who's here with you.

CHAO: Now that Mitch has adopted the sense of the adoring spouse, I would love to introduce my family: my father, James Chao -- stand up, Dad -- and my mother, Ruth Chao; my sister, Mae Chao; my younger sister, Angela Chao; and my brother-in-law, Jeff Wong (ph).

Thank you.

(APPLAUSE)

JEFFORDS: Now, please proceed. We look forward to your statement.

CHAO: Thank you. Good morning, Chairman Jeffords, Ranking Member Kennedy, and also members of the committee. Thank you very much for allowing me the opportunity to be with you here today.

I'm honored to be accompanied today by the two senators from my home state of Kentucky, Senator Mitch McConnell, with whom I'm moderately acquainted, and Senator Jim Bunning. Much can be said about both of these men, their integrity, their stature, their achievements. But the most important thing about them is that they have two of the most wonderful wives you've ever seen.

(LAUGHTER)

I also want to thank Senator Leahy of Vermont for coming to introduce me today as well. Senator Leahy and I have worked together in the past, and I truly appreciate his support as I prepare for this position today.

As you have seen, I'm also very blessed to have with me a group of people who are the reason I'm able to come before you in this capacity. And that's my family -- my mother and father, Ruth and James Chao; my sister, Mae Chao, and her husband, Jeff Wong (ph) -- and they're all from New York; and my younger sister, Angela Chao, who flew in from Boston.

Also present in the audience here and other places are many members of the Asian-American community who share pride in my nomination, as I am only the second Asian-American and the first Asian-American female to be nominated to the U.S. Cabinet. I appreciate deeply their support and their encouragement.

Today is also Chinese New Year, a traditionally auspicious day, and I hope that it will be auspicious for me as well. And there are many, many other friends, co-workers and former associates who are here, and I thank them for their support.

You know, surrounded by so many special people like this, who have played such significant roles in my life, I'm reminded that even though I'm personally honored to have been nominated for this position by President Bush, I know that this is not just for me. This is also for all of those immigrant families who come to this country with nothing but their essentials and an unswerving faith in themselves, in the promise of America, and in God. This is also for those struggling families where one or more parents hold down several jobs just to make ends meet, and they have little bargaining power with an employer over issues of pay, benefits and safety.

This is for those who have encountered barriers to getting good jobs, whether that barrier is a physical disability or some form of prejudice or, as in the case of many immigrant families like my own, barriers of language and culture.

This is for the many thousands of Americans I encountered as president and CEO of United Way of America, those who are served by the charities that it supports, who want to leave behind a destructive lifestyle and need a helping hand to lift them up into productive, healthy, dignified lives. These are the people who have been helped by Welfare to Work and who are counting on it to being reauthorized.

And this is also for all of those women in the work force who were once told not many years ago that the highest position to which they could aspire was to become a secretary, and with your guidance and support, that's exactly what I hope to become.

(LAUGHTER)

Through the diverse experiences that I've had, from struggling to learn English as a young child to serving as deputy secretary of transportation, director of the Peace Corps, president and CEO of United Way of America, I have seen that all work is worthy of respect and virtually all workers need appropriate protection.

And the way I see it, the Department of Labor represents all workers, both those who choose to join unions and those who do not. It represents those who have been denied equal access to good jobs or advancement because of residual prejudice against their race, gender, ethnicity, national origin or religion.

It represents veterans and those returning from temporary military service who want to start or renew careers in the private sector.

And it represents those who have not been allowed to reach their full potential because of physical disability. In the last decade, we have made tremendous progress in opening the workplace to disabled Americans, starting with the Americans with Disabilities Act that was signed by former President Bush nearly a decade ago.

Today, through the work of Senator Harkin and others on this committee, we have a new Office of Disability Policy as well as a new assistant secretary to oversee that mission.

Now, President Bush does want to go further, and he has proposed a new freedom initiative that will harness the latest technology to give disabled Americans even greater access to work opportunity.

These changes are a reflection of what work truly means to most of us, and that is that it's not just a way of paying the bills but also a pathway to gaining respect and human dignity.

In that same light, I commend the Department of Labor for taking steps to recognize and value the kind of work that most of our mothers did, running a household and raising a family. And if we think that that's not work, then we don't really know what work really is.

So, thanks, Mom.

As I've been preparing for the awesome responsibility of serving as secretary of labor, should you extend me that honor, I have been struck by the rich heritage of this department. I am very much aware that so much of the work force protection that we now take for granted in this country were born out of the Labor Department, that labor movement.

The labor struggles of the early part of the last century and the laws that grew out of them are a critical part of this nation's historic commitment to justice for all. The balances that these laws strike between labor and management are a critical source of stability in economy as well as a guarantee of fairness in the workplace. And in recent years, we have seen how these two forces must come together and work cooperatively in order to compete successfully in the world economy.

For all of these reasons, I believe that a critical part of my responsibility, should I be confirmed as secretary of labor, is to fully, fairly and evenly enforce the labor laws of this country. And I believe further that any change in our labor laws or in their interpretation must be carefully and solemnly considered, giving respectful and full attention to the views of every participant in the labor-management equation.

At the same time, it will be my goal as secretary of labor to make sure that the department, its programs and its mission are in step with a dramatically new economy that continues to evolve right before our eyes.

If the ongoing activities of the Department of Labor do not reflect the emerging realities of a new economy, then sooner or later, the department will be unable to fulfill its responsibilities to the workplace that it is supposed to serve.

To me, perhaps the greatest challenge faced by the Department of Labor and one that demands immediate attention is represented by what I am holding in my hand today. This is a recently published listing of unfilled high-tech positions all across America. This publication and others like it advertise thousands upon thousands of well-paying jobs, most of them with unlimited future opportunities, and earning potential unmet, and employers so hungry for applicants that they offer to pay all travel expenses for perspective employees, and a demand for a qualified labor that is so great that all historical barriers of race and gender and disability are almost irrelevant.

So you might ask: What's the problem? It sounds like a utopia. And yet, unfortunately, as of this moment, it is only a promise that we must work to fulfill, because in America today there are thousands, tens of thousands, perhaps hundreds of thousands, of high-tech jobs that cannot be filled, while at the same time there are millions of Americans who cannot currently fill them. That, I believe, is a supreme challenge that this Labor Department faces at the threshold of a new millennium.

And that's why President Bush has expressed a strong commitment to build upon and improve our national job training efforts. We need to ensure that job training funds are targeted to bridge this gap between these high-paying, but high-skilled positions that need qualified workers and the millions of Americans who need additional training to be able to fill them.

We also need to recognize how broadly this new economy is revolutionizing the workplace. We now live in a world where workers are being empowered to be managers as well as shareholders and even owners of the companies in which they work. Younger workers are increasingly taking their retirement into their hands, rather than relying on the government or an employer or union to provide it for them.

In one sense, the new economy is deconstructing work with jobs that cannot be pigeonholed into traditional workday or work week, and corporate structures that, in some cases, are eliminating the need for workplace altogether.

Workers themselves are demanding more autonomy, more freedom, more customization of the terms and conditions of their employment. And as we invest in critical job training, we're giving workers the bargaining power they need to custom design their jobs around their lives, instead of the other way around.

So in order to remain relevant and responsive to workers' needs, even the Department of Labor will need to adapt to the reality of the changing economy. It's not that there's a new administration in town; there's a whole new world that we need to respond to.

CHAO: What changes need to take place, how and when they need to be implemented, should be the subject of a continuing and robust dialogue between the department, the Congress and all those who play a role in labor-management relations.

It's been said many times in the last few years that we need to build a bridge to the 21st century. Well, I believe the best way to build a bridge, figuratively speaking, is for people on both sides, on all sides, to get working and find an appropriate meeting place somewhere in the middle. I look forward to that process, which I started even today as you share with me your concerns and your ideas in this hearing.

I may not be able to fully answer all your questions today, but I pledge to maintain an open line of communication so that together we can best serve the working men and women of this country.

Thank you very much, and I'd be delighted to answer any questions.

JEFFORDS: Thank you very much. I want to say that's one of the most articulate, incisive and moving statements I've ever heard from someone coming before this committee.

CHAO: Thank you.

JEFFORDS: And I praise you for that.

We will now have the opportunity for each member to ask questions for five minutes. That includes the answers, so you can probably control that to a certain extent.

(LAUGHTER)

CHAO: Thank you.

JEFFORDS: I would hope you would allow us to listen to you, to the answers to these questions.

I'll start. It's one that I expect you know we are going to get.

Here in Congress, one issue we seem to continue to grapple with is our federal minimum wage. But I do not believe that the minimum wage is the only way or even the best way to give folks in need a helping hand to get out of poverty. I do believe that the time has come to raise the minimum wage again. An increase will go a long way toward helping those workers obtain the basic needs for themselves and their families. Now, I recognize that raising the minimum wage is our job. However, I'm wondering if you could tell us what your view is on this subject? Or the administration's?

CHAO: Sure. The president's position on the minimum wage is that it should be increased. And his proposal would also include that the community should have some flexibility to ensure that any minimum wage increase would not hurt employment in rural and economically depressed areas. And I support that.

We need to remember that the real minimum wage is always zero and people who truly need work are effectively shut out of the labor pool by a nationally mandated minimum wage that restricts employment in economically stricken areas. However, under the president's plan, even in these rural communities with a lower cost of living, employers should still be required to abide by the current federal minimum wage, and this flexible plan is a fair proposal, designed to save jobs as well.

As secretary of labor, you should have no doubt that I will vigorously enforce our nation's wage laws and strive to guarantee that an honest day's work results in an honest day's pay.

Thank you.

JEFFORDS: As I indicated in my statement, I look forward to working with you on job training also and the continued implementation of the Workforce Investment Act. One of the key provisions of the act was the importance of coordinating job training with vocational and technical education. What are your thoughts as to how the relationship between job training, run through DOL, and vocational education, being run by the Department of Education, can be improved or coordinated or what are your views on this?

CHAO: Let me say at the outset that training, developing and modernizing America's work force is one of my highest priorities. I want to ensure that the department job training programs are designed to make our work force as prepared as possible for the challenges of the 21st century. I will also ensure that President Bush's efforts to reauthorize Welfare to Work are complemented by new, one-step job training centers administered at the local level, as provided by the new Workforce Investment Act.

Secondly, quality job training must be available so that aspiring workers can get the job that they need in our new economy. This would require the full commitment of and coordination among federal, state and local governments, as well as organized labor and businesses. There is broad consensus on the need for such an effort, and I look forward to coordinating and being a part of helping and facilitating that effort.

Thirdly, to lead the global economy, we've got to continue to have the most skilled, trained and versatile work force in the world, and no worker should be left behind. The Department of Labor must provide our work force with the skills necessary to compete in America and around the world as we continue to move into a new and more global economy.

And with Secretary Paige having been confirmed, I look forward to working with the Department of Education in a very coordinated and a close fashion to ensure that both our departments are working in a coordinated fashion to ensure that all workers are prepared to face a new economy, a global marketplace, from K-12 and from thereafter.

JEFFORDS: The last question, I'm going to turn to the questions of health care. Health care premiums are increasing again, and for the third year in a row, U.S. employers can count on the average increases for the next year, 10 to 13 percent. Historically, premium increases have caused more people to become uninsured. Today, there are 43 million Americans with no health insurance. An important part of any managed care reform debate is impact on cost. Do you have any thoughts on how we can draft a patients' bill of rights so it does not increase the cost of health care?

CHAO: Senator, I wish I could draft a ideal patients' bill of rights. I suspect if I were, I would be the hero of this country. But as you know, the president will support a strong patients' bill of rights. And he wants a bill, obviously, that will not increase the number of uninsured Americans. And I support that as well.

Employers are not required to offer health plans to their employees at this point. They do so because it is an attractive benefit for employees and their families. Such arrangements should be encouraged, not hindered, by higher insurance costs and increased exposure to liability. What we need to do is carefully assess the impact of competing proposals on employer-sponsored health insurance plans. And the last thing that any one of us want to do is to pass a bill that causes hundreds of thousands of employees to lose their health benefits.

But as secretary, I will enforce any provision of a patients' bill of rights that is assigned to my department.

JEFFORDS: Thank you.

Senator Dodd?

DODD: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

And I too want to commend you, Ms. Chao, for your statement. I thought it was an excellent statement you made.

And while I know this is new territory for you, having had a background in the transportation area, I'm a great believer, bright people with good sense, common sense, coming in, that you'll quickly learn the issues here at the Department of Labor.

I want to thank Senator Harkin as well -- I wish I had said it in my opening remarks -- talking organized labor. And we need to get beyond this issue of sort of seeing organized labor as the enemy. And the numbers are dropping of people who are part of organized labor in the country, at least the numbers are today. And I just take it from your background and experience at United Way and elsewhere, how closely you've worked with leaders who have made a huge difference, not only in the lives of their members, but for working people generally.

I've always said, I know very few other organizations who battle as hard on behalf of people who are not their members. There's not a single member of organized labor in this country who earns the minimum wage.

DODD: There's not a single member or very few members who are actually getting the benefits of family and medical leave, in a sense. I mean, these are issues that went beyond their own constituency. So I have great respect for the work they've done and the difference they've made in contributing to the strength and well-being of America, and I know you share those views.

I just want to touch on three subject matters. I'm may only get to one or two of them in five minutes, and I suspect others may pick up on them, so I'll follow through. And that is what I've mentioned, the family and medical leave and also the Employment and Training Act. This is an extremely important issue for us here. And you addressed it -- the administration, excuse me -- by raising that newspaper column and talking about what Senator Mikulski addressed on numerous occasions. And that is -- she said again this morning -- it's not a worker shortage; it's a skill shortage.

And I'm just going over -- looking at the budget for the employment and training administration from the previous few years. And, obviously, there are a lot of pressures on these areas. But if you look down that whole budget area on training and employment services, Work Force Investment Act, youth opportunity grants, it's been pretty much a flat line over the last number of years.

And you made the point eloquently about how we've got to do a better job. A lot of us are hounded to death by constituents and businesses for the H1B visas, but we've dealt with it up here. And in the absence of anything else, we've been supportive of providing those visas for people because our businesses need them in order to fill the skilled job levels they have.

But I know in Fairfield County, alone, in Connecticut, there were some 50,000 jobs a few years ago that were going unmet by people in my own state because the skill levels were not being met. And so we spent a lot of time trying to bring people in from India, Pakistan, Bangladesh other places where the skill levels were high. And it seems to me, while that has been helpful, that the real issue is finding or providing the skill level and training for our own citizens here to be able to apply and meet those job requirements.

I always say -- and certainly something you'd agree with, too -- the influx of people contribute greatly to the strength of our country. But, obviously, being able to provide some training -- I'm not going to ask you to get into the numbers discussion with me here except to take note of it.

If you'd take a look at it as the budget battles come up, are there tax incentives which can be helpful? Sometimes these direct appropriations, which can get and improve the job training programs, can most directly meet the needs we discussed.

And secondly -- and then I'll just finish this on the family and leave, and I'll leave the occupational safety issues to others who may raise them. And that is, just if might express here some thoughts on the family and medical leave issue. Again, I mention these reports that have come out in the last few weeks that indicate that while there are some problems for business, that overall the bottom line has been a strong one here.

And there's some discussion -- Senator Bond mentioned, that we settled on the number of 50 for employees. We did that as a political compromise at the time. Actually, I could have lowered it to 25. In 1993, I had the votes to change that, and I had a president who would have signed it. Since that number is historically used to define small business: 25 and less.

And we've served now some 35 million people, but we're missing about 15 million people who fall into that category -- most of them women -- for birth and adoption, which it will be so critical, those early days of a child's life, to have a parent around who can be with them. Again, I'm preaching to the choir here. I know you understand this.

And I'm not asking you to take a position on that particular point, but if you might just share some general thoughts on the Family and Medical Leave Act and how good a law you may think it is or problems that you may have thought about that need to be addressed.

CHAO: Well, first of all, I want to thank you very much for sharing with me your concerns and the issues that you want to pay particular attention to.

And to every other member of the committee, I want to thank you also. I do need guidance, and I do need want to seek counsel from all of you as I begin this new position should I be confirmed. And I will look again very much forward to your counsel. So, it's helpful to me to know what you're interested in.

On the whole issue of budget, I'm glad you're not going to ask me any questions on that, because even though I pride myself with being pretty good with numbers, the department's budget is one that I've not studied in depth. And as everyone knows, the budget is pretty much set for this year. And there will be areas which we can adjust and tweak, but pretty much the budget will be submitted Congress as is from the previous administration.

I will take note, of course, of the straight-line trend that you have pointed out, and I will study and take a look at it and see what was behind it and study it a bit.

As for the Family and Medical Leave Act, I think that has brought about a great deal of benefits for working families that need flexibility. I am also cognizant and sensitive, however, to small businesses. And you are right: The 25-employee threshold is one that's traditionally been used. In this case, in this particular act, it's at 50.

I know that this is going to be an issue of robust debate. There are those who will be on both sides of the issue. And I think at this point, I want to keep an open mind. I want to listen to what people have to say on both sides. And hopefully, I will be a fast student and that I will be a receptive student as well.

DODD: Thank you for that.

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

JEFFORDS: Senator Gregg?

GREGG: Thank you. I don't want to get into too many specifics, but the Family and Medical Leave Act is an issue. Not because it isn't a great idea. It's an excellent idea. It's just that the way it's been administered by the department has created some chaos in the marketplace. For example, at one point, they were saying that colds and the common flu were not subject to family medical leave, and the next year, they said it was.

And then they have notification requirements which are very complicated and very hard to administer for many small businesses, especially, where you have to have written notification within two days that the event is a family medical leave event.

And then there is the fact that the way it's structured now, companies which reward people for attendance end up having to abandon those reward programs, which often works against the employee in many instances, because employees who have high attendance end up losing those reward programs, which in many cases they use for their vacation time when they take their family on trips or things, depend on what the reward program is.

So, the Family and Medical Leave Act does have some technical issues that need, I think, to be worked on. And I know you'll hear a lot about them. And I know you're going to take a hard and long look at them.

GREGG: One of them is the proposal -- as a former governor, that I found very difficult to accept that a person should receive unemployment compensation for a family and medical leave event. Unemployment compensation is an insurance program which states, like mine that went through the recession of the early '90s, found their unemployment insurance programs drained and they ended up with huge financial problems. And traditionally, unemployment insurance has been used for a termination event, not for a voluntary event. And so I do hope you'll take a look at that issue as well.

The thing I wanted to talk to you about specifically, though, was your question here on technology. I find this very appropriate that you're going to focus on the issue of how we get more people trained to do our technology jobs, which are the cutting edge of our economy and the cutting edge of employment. At least in my state and in the Northeast and many other regions, obviously, but certainly in our state, more people are employed in technology than any other state on a per capital basis in the country.

So I'd be interested in if you could just give us a few minutes of -- maybe you haven't gotten it formulated yet -- but what you're thinking about; how we make these training programs, which we've all worked very hard on over the years to make relevant, how we make them more relevant to the communication economy and the technology economy?

CHAO: Well, the high-tech industry in America is really the envy the world over. And clearly it's been an engine of growth for this great, robust economy that we're experiencing.

If we expect to continue this robust growth, clearly they need more experienced, more skilled workers. And this gap that we have just talked about here, where there is a tremendous need for skilled workers and the lack of skills on the part of so many Americans, who are unable to fulfill them, I think is an initiative that needs to receive increased priority. Because if we talk about the modern workplace, if we talk about empowerment, we really want to be able to empower workers to take advantage of all these opportunities.

So I would hope that one of the first steps in addressing this issue is to acknowledge how important it is, and to be able to prioritize it as one of your department's priorities, and devote it the requisite to management, as well as the financial resources to the extent possible. But more important, the management attention.

And I would hope that I would bring into this discussion the best and the brightest minds on how do we bridge this gap. And what are the requirements on one side? What are the assets of the other? And how can we mesh the two together?

GREGG: I think that's the right priority. I would hope that you would include in that exercise the fact that there's a lot of creative activity occurring out in the states. Especially at the technical college level, I know in my state. And that unfortunately there tends to be a one-brush-fits-all approach when we get to regulations coming from Washington in how we manage the technical training aspects.

And so I would hope you would create atmospheres where experimentation of approaches and ideas that aren't necessarily appropriate to all communities that can be tried by others will be more readily received by the federal agencies.

CHAO: I think there are lots of opportunities for public-private partners. And I understand your advice and I look forward to following up on that.

GREGG: Thank you.

JEFFORDS: Senator Kennedy?

KENNEDY: Thank you. And let me apologize: We had a brief meeting of the Judiciary Committee, which I needed to attend for a few moments.

I want to come back to an issue I know that was raised previously by our chair, and that is the minimum wage. And I feel strongly about that issue. I understand the president's position about letting states affectively opt out. We have states now that are down to $1.50 an hour for minimum wage and some at $2.80 and another at $3.50.

KENNEDY: I mean, they really don't provide any, kind of, adequate resources for these workers.

And the workers we're talking about, as you understand, Ms. Chao, we're talking about assistant teachers, we're talking about men and women that work in our nursing homes. We're talking primarily about women, because the great majority of minimum wage workers are women. We're talking about children, because a great percent of the women have children. We're talking about as a civil rights issue, because great numbers of those that earn the minimum wage are men and women of color.

And, most of all, we're talking about a fairness issue. I mean, it's been supported by Republican presidents as well as Democrats and all.

And, what bothers me, quite frankly, is we were very, very quite in the last Congress to increase the pay for members of Congress. We didn't hesitate. We didn't need a study. We didn't know what the economic impact was going to be. But, nonetheless, we went right out and increased all of the members of the Congress on that, but we were still unwilling to deal with an issue which is of such basic fundamental importance for people trying to survive on this.

So this is an issue of enormous importance. I know you've thought about it and I know you'll be carrying through the president's position about it, but I wanted to just mention it again to you so that you had a sense about, again, the importance of it in terms of what I think is fairness.

The greatest economy in the history of the country and we've already lost the increases that we had two years ago on the increase. We provided $11 billion in tax incentives in the last time that we had increase. The first time we ever had to do it (inaudible) from 11 to 18, and we were told last -- in the last Congress, we had to provide $73 billion in tax reductions in order to have an increase in the minimum wage, which is basically holding these 11 million people hostage to tax breaks for the wealthy individuals and that's an untenable position, I think, and we are going to press this along and we're going to try -- we want to work with you on it.

And I know we have some understanding of your position, but I hope you also have a pretty good sense about the, sort of, intensity of those that feel that fairness demands that working people, and we're talking about people that are working, more often than not have two jobs, have rare times -- the average minimum wage worker now has 25 hours a week less with their children than they did 10 years ago, just to spend time with their children. And I just hope that, you know, as we move on through this process, we can continue to raise this with you and talk about it and hear your points. But I hope that you have a sense about where we're coming from.

CHAO: Senator, I appreciate very much your sharing with me your viewpoint. Obviously, you're very passionate about this issue and I understand that.

Let me just clarify. My previous comments were not meant to be interpreted as any attempt to dismantle the federal minimum wage. And obviously, the president's proposal will maintain the current $5.15 even in high-employment rural counties. So, I will...

KENNEDY: We won't get in the most -- really, the studies show that it really hasn't had -- we've got the highest employment in minority teenagers. Their parents are all for it. They're not trying to -- minority groups are all for it. They're not throwing over the interest of teenagers and the rest of it. We'll have a chance to come back.

I want to, in the time that's left, focus on the ergonomics. Now, this is what we had on the ergonomics as early as 1989. Ann McLaughlin, President Reagan's secretary, praised the settlement agreement in ergonomic cases -- "an industry-wide blueprint for dealing with ergonomic problems and to provide other industries with valuable information for handling their own cumulative trauma disorders."

In 1990, President Bush's secretary of labor, Elizabeth Dole, said that, "eliminating the hazards of cumulative trauma disorders back injury, tendon disorders will be one of the most important work issues of the '90s." In '92, Secretary of Labor, Lynn Martin, continued to work on ergonomic rule-making.

We've got, as I mentioned, 1,800,000 people that have these problems. More than 600,000 workers lose time.

KENNEDY: Most of the studies show that actually it saves the employers funds.

And the interesting point about it is the implementation doesn't go into effect until there's an injury. I mean, I think that's a weakness of the provisions myself.

You've indicated in your testimony that before you altered or changed any of the policies dealing with labor that, "And further, I believe that any change" -- this is on page 4 -- "I believe that any change in labor laws or their interpretation must be carefully and soundly considered, giving respectful attention to the views of every participant in the labor-management equation." Will you give us those assurances on this issue, on the ergonomic issue?

CHAO: Absolutely. If there is one thing that I have already learned since the week and a half that I've been informed that I will be the labor secretary nominee, is that this is the most, probably, visible issue in the department. This is a final rule that became effective on January 16 of this year. It clearly is very, very visible. There's a great deal of opinions on both sides about it. The National Academy of Sciences has issued a study on this.

The overall conclusion that I draw is that it's an extremely complicated issue, a very complex issue. And I can assure you that, should I be confirmed, I will give this issue the greatest thought and effort and study.

And, of course, as you well know, this is in litigation right now, so it's probably inappropriate for me to say very much beyond that.

KENNEDY: Well, the promulgation have already been -- are out at the present time.

CHAO: Yes. But the final rule is January 16.

KENNEDY: My time is up, Mr. Chairman.

JEFFORDS: Senator Frist?

FRIST: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And I'd like to come back to a couple of the issues that I mentioned in our brief opening statement. Before doing that, on the Patient Bill of Rights -- and I agree with your comments in response to the chairman's question -- I think the principles do need to be to return -- medical decision-making be made by physicians, people in the medical arena, in consultation with the patients, and not having HMO bureaucrats do that.

Number two, we do have to avoid a litigation lottery, which many of the proposals have put forward.

Number three, we have to have an internal and external appeals process that is rapid, that is responsive, with ultimately final decisions being made by physicians, as long as they have to do with medical decisions.

And fourth, respect of state efforts, and the many state efforts that have been put forward that have respected the great strides that many employers have made in terms of making sure that the best benefits are offered in a way that respects individuals, respects consumers and patients.

Going back one other time to the disabilities issue, and it's been mentioned several times, and the February 9 announcement by Secretary Herman in creating the Office of Disability Policy has been stated, and their purpose and their direction has been spelled out with responsibilities of the office, including ensuring that people with disabilities get full consideration in all programs funded or managed by the department, evaluating all laws enforced by the department to remove any barriers that may exist for people with disabilities, ensuring that all services of one-stop centers created by the Work Force Investment Act are accessible for people with disabilities.

Again, many of us are very excited about that, think it gives true focus.

Could you comment on President Bush's initiative? President Bush has put forward an initiative which I think complements these overall efforts very well. It's been called the New Freedom Initiative. He's proposed what is a comprehensive initiative to help integrate Americans with disabilities into the workplace.

I'm not sure, again, because of the brevity of time, how much thought you've been able to give about the role of a new agency that might play a part, and maybe a major part of this New Freedom Initiative. Could you comment on how you might integrate these two in a way that would respect the initiatives both of Secretary Herman, Senator Harkin, as mentioned, as well as President Bush?

CHAO: I'd be delighted to. The president and I strongly support implementation of his, if you have heard, New Freedom Initiative.

CHAO: This is a 10-year, $1 billion, multi-departmental effort to enhance independence, employment opportunities and the community involvement for millions of Americans with disabilities. As the range in efficacy of assisted technology grows, an increasing number of disabled Americans want to acquire this revolutionary, but often very expensive, equipment. And so the president and I will support loan programs and guarantees that will enable people with disabilities to purchase the technology that they need to be independent and productive. We'll also promote stronger investments in research and development to make assistive technology more widely available.

As I've talked about before, the changing nature of the American work force and the increased potential for telework also holds great promise for many Americans, especially those with disabilities.

Employers faced with employee and workspace shortages are coming to realize the value of telework. And we need to make sure that disabled Americans are permitted to take advantage of these new working arrangements.

I am pleased that the Department of Labor has been given a new office for disability policy and that there will be a new assistant secretary to oversee the mission.

I look forward to utilizing this new office of the department to help disabled Americans realize their full potential in America's work force and this new office would compliment the important work that the Office of Veterans' Training already does now to help veterans, disabled veterans with job training.

FRIST: Thank you. The other issue that I mentioned -- I have just a few seconds -- is the new economy. We've mentioned the globalization, information technology. Senator Gregg also mentioned the importance of appropriate training.

Because we don't have time, probably for you answer the question or comment for very long, but yesterday the president introduced his education proposal, a blueprint as looking to the future. As part of that, he focused on enhancing education through technology: sending more dollars to schools, the public schools K through 12 for technology; allowing funds to be used in a certain way to promote job training; offer matching grants for community technology centers.

I just want to encourage you, as we look for continuity from those early years to the later years, to have the department in job training, in maximizing the resources that hopefully we will increasingly place in the K through 12 to integrate those in a way that is seamless that makes sense as we prepare for this new economy.

I guess my time is up, Mr. Chairman.

CHAO: I totally agree with that. One of the things that I have been finding is the need for the Department of Labor to work with the Department of Education. Education always takes care of K through 12 and Department of Labor works with people who have been through a good education or not so good education. So the two departments do need to work closely together.

FRIST: Thank you.

JEFFORDS: Thank you.

Senator Hutchinson?

HUTCHINSON: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

And, Ms. Chao, thank you very much for a very outstanding statement. And all of the things you were saying about using the department to enhance the ability of people with disabilities to find meaningful employment is, indeed, music to my ears and I'm sure to a lot of us. We look forward to working with you in those efforts.

To further integrate Americans with disabilities in the work force requires a multifaceted approach. For example, same things I know you're already aware of, but when a perspective employee goes in for an interview, if they're qualified, they'd be offered the job. The perspective employer never asks, "Can you get to work? You got a car? Can you get on the subway?" I mean, that's left to you, the employee to get to work. However, for millions of Americans with disabilities transportation may be one of the keys for them to get meaningful employment.

The other one is job training. Many people with disabilities are qualified, but they need some additional training, especially in the new technologies.

Many people with disabilities also need community support services; some type of an attendant service, for example. For example, my nephew, who's quadriplegic, has to have a nurse to make sure he gets out of bed in the morning. Gets him ready to go. Gets him his exercises. Does all this stuff. But after that he's fine. He can go to work. And when he comes home he has to have the same thing at night. If that were not there, he could not be gainfully employed.

HUTCHINSON: And so, I guess what I'm asking you is, again -- I talked to Governor Thompson about this last week at HHS, is we really need inter-agency, kind of, cooperation on this.

Now, the Office of Disability Policy that you mentioned in your statement, that you will have jurisdiction over in the Department of Labor, I believe could be the coordinating agency within the federal government for transportation, for Health and Human Services, for community support services, your area of DOL and job training; that type of thing.

And so I'm hopeful that you will look upon this office as, sort of, the central office to coordinate and to reach out to coordinate all of these various activities. I just want to ask you for any views you might have on it.

CHAO: I think that will be very exciting.

HUTCHINSON: And I think you'll find Governor Thompson very willing to move ahead on that.

The other two areas that I had that I just wanted to question briefly on was -- we just had a long -- I think it lasted -- well, it's been on the docket now for almost 10 years, and that's the ergonomics rule. In fact, Secretary Elizabeth Dole is the one, in 1990, who called for action in which she recognized, as I quote, "One of the nation's most debilitating across the board workers' safety and health illnesses of the 1990s." Secretary Dole committed the department to develop an ergonomic standard. And she stated, and I quote again: "These painful and sometimes crippling illnesses now make up 48 percent of all recordable industrial work place illnesses. We must do our utmost to protect workers from these hazards, not only in the red meat industry but all U.S. industries."

The ergonomic standard, we had that, and we debated it ad nauseum for three or four years here. And it finally got through, and it's been reworked and reworked a number of times and was finally put into the record, I believe, in November, if I'm not mistaken. I think it was November -- it was published in the record, I believe, in November.

CHAO: Final rule came out January 16.

HUTCHINSON: Yes, it's implemented. It's been implemented now. Again, I just want to ask your opinion of the ergonomic standard, and do you agree with Secretary Dole that a standard is needed to protect workers? And are you fully committed to implementing and carrying out the standard as it is now implemented as of this month?

CHAO: I don't think there's anybody in this room who's not committed to ensuring worker safety. I think employers have a vested interest in safety as well. I mean, it's to their benefit in this very, very tight labor market where each employee represents a major investment in training and development.

I'm obviously very concerned, as the new secretary of labor, on the physical safety of every worker. From what I understand based on my brief introduction to this issue, it is apparently a very complicated issue. There is a department's 1,800-page ergonomics regulatory proposal. There is also a 300-page report by the National Academy of Sciences. So, I understand the concern that people have on this.

The final rule just went out January 16. It's been litigated already. I can assure you that my commitment to you is that I will want to have an open and full dialogue with all of you to the extent possible, and I will take every point of view into consideration.

Again, it's a very -- I know enough to know that it is a very complicated issue.

HUTCHINSON: But one that's important to a lot of, again, women and minorities in this country. I hope that you would work with the National Safety Council in terms of the regulations in OSHA and what OSHA's doing. They have really been great in their efforts in terms of providing worker safety protections, especially in agriculture.

One last thing, on child labor, the Child Labor Coalition which is a group of NGOs here in this country have come up with what they call the National Program of Action to make sure that we are in compliance with the ILO Convention 182.

Well, the United States ratified -- or Senate ratified last year ILO Convention 182 concerning the prohibition and immediate action for the elimination of the worst forms of child labor. We were the third nation to ratify it. But this has a lot to do, sometimes, with domestic child labor in this country.

And so, the Child Labor Coalition is a group of NGOs who have come up with a National Program of Action. And again, if you are not familiar with this now, I'd hope that you would be and to take the lead on the development of a National Program of Action to ensure that the United States will be in compliance with ILO Convention 182, which we just ratified last year.

And under your leadership, will the Labor Department continue its active support of international efforts and programs to end abusive child labor?

CHAO: Well, Senator, you and I have discussed this during our meeting together, and as you well know, during my tenure as director of the Peace Corps, I personally have seen the horrific condition that children have to labor in in some of these countries.

CHAO: And so you can be assured that I will support vigorous enforcement of U.S. laws prohibiting the use of child labor. The president and I are also committed to using our influence to encourage other nations to restrict the use of child labor. And as you mentioned, the Senate recently ratified the ILO convention prohibiting the worst child labor abuses.

I understand that your concern now is the child labor abuses here in our country, and I can assure you that it will receive my full attention and my concern.

HUTCHINSON: Thank you very much.

JEFFORDS: Thank you, Senator.

We're going to have a vote at 11:30. I would suggest that -- I'm going down the group here, and so I would suggest that maybe those that are a ways away from their time could go and vote now and so we won't have to interrupt the proceedings. And the same over here.

Senator Enzi?

ENZI: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And I want to thank Secretary-designate Chao for the time that she spent meeting with me and talking about a number of these issues.

What you may not realize is that the Subcommittee on Employment Safety and Training, that I chair and that Senator Wellstone is the ranking member on, is one of the most bipartisan committees here. I'm sure that comes as a surprise to a lot of people. But actually, during my tenure here, we have passed the first legislative changes in OSHA in the nearly 30 years that it's been in existence. And we've done that by unanimous consent, which doesn't get any publicity, which is why you may not have heard about that.

But we have frequent meetings with, particularly, the assistant secretary for the department which deals with OSHA. And one of the things that he has lamented, and that I certainly have to agree with, is that the rule-making process for OSHA does not allow for us to update the process to comply with changes that have happened in the nearly 30 years that it's been in existence. Not one rule that OSHA has promulgated has ever had a change to it in nearly 30 years. Business has changed dramatically.

I hope that you will work with me to change that process for OSHA so that it can have more flexibility, more responsiveness to the businesses. Would you be willing to do that?

CHAO: Absolutely, you have my commitment on that.

ENZI: Thank you.

Earlier, Senator Dodd mentioned that we've got to quit looking at the unions as being the enemy. I want to emphasize that we've got to quit looking at business as being the enemy as well. One of the things we have to do with all of the people involved in employment safety and training is try to encourage the good and try to punish the bad. And I think that's kind of what OSHA and MSHA and a number of the agencies that come under your jurisdiction are charged with.

One of the difficulties is that small businesses have these tremendous volumes of law that they have to go through. You mentioned the 800 pages of the ergonomics law. That's a lot for a small business to go through.

We've held some hearings in Wyoming on it. I do remember that one of the news media folks came up to me afterwards and said, "Well, you only had about 100 people here. That's not very good."

I said, "Well, take into consideration the size of the town first, and secondly that the people that we heard from are the small business people. If they had enough people to send them to a day's hearing, they'd fire them because it would be too much of an overload for what they're trying to do."

So I want to mention that our subcommittee has also gotten approval from the Senate as a whole in the last two appropriations processes that half of the increase in money that goes to OSHA would be spent on consultation, so that we can help these small businesses to understand that.

What can you do to include small business in the regulatory and compliance process?

CHAO: I think that there should be great comfort in the fact that I have worked with organized labor and I have also worked with small business.

CHAO: I think you're right, I think sometimes both sides tend to view the worst in each other, and I pride myself on being someone who can work with diverse groups, who can find the mutual ground of commonality, and who has the trust on both sides.

In terms of organized labor, I have worked with organized labor in the very lofty ideals of America's number one charity, and organized labor is a full partner with corporate America in raising the financial resources available to help those in need.

I have also worked with small businesses and understand the tremendous pressures that they face on a daily basis -- in trying to meet a payroll, in trying to find enough resources to be able to handle the myriad of crisis and management issues that erupt on a daily basis -- and how we can help small businesses deal with this plethora of regulations that is coming out of Washington.

And I believe that if we work together, if we maintain open dialogue, and if we use smartly the resources of the federal government in a better matched, coordinated fashion, I think we can accomplish a great deal.

So to that extent, for example, in terms of small business, the Department of Labor can work with the SBA, with the Commerce Department, which of course is larger businesses, with the Small Business Administration.

The Small Business Administration very often holds these annual or semiannual workshops or summits, and clearly the Department of Labor can partner with SBA to reach out to small businesses to help them understand the regulations that are involved; and also in the process of looking at future legislation as well, to be cognizant of the regulatory burdens that are placed on small businesses.

I think everyone recognizes that the largest number of new jobs are created by small businesses, and so the issue is how do we foster that continued increase in new jobs, yet provide protection for our workers which they deserve and thus is the responsibility of the Department of Labor and the secretary of labor, that is to ensure the physical safety and security and opportunities for working men and women of America and to ensure that those opportunities are still there.

So it's going to require balance, and it's going to require someone who's willing to listen and understand both sides and who's had a track record in working with people from all different spectrums. And I hope I'm that person and I look forward to tackling those issues.

Thank you.

ENZI: Thank you very much. I look working to with you.

JEFFORDS: Senator Mikulski?

MIKULSKI: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

And Ms. Chao, first of all, it's just wonderful to see your family.

CHAO: Thank you.

MIKULSKI: And it was wonderful to hear your story. I've read about this very compelling story and poignant story, but to see your dad and mom and your sisters and brother-in-law, really I know how proud they are of you today. But we're proud of them for what they've done and so on. So anyway, our respect to you and our joy for you on this happy occasion.

I'd like to come back to the skill shortage issue. And I don't know if your microphone is as bad as I am, I hear the conversations up here better.

CHAO: That's better. Thank you.

MIKULSKI: Thank you.

But you have a predecessor in Senator -- Bill Brock...

CHAO: Yes.

MIKULSKI: ... was an excellent secretary of labor. And one of the things that he did was kind of do a report on America's work force shortage. And a lot of us came out of the Humphrey-Hawkins bill background, you know, big government, big (inaudible). And what Bill Brock said was, at the time he did his analysis, that because of demography, population, we would have enough work for everybody in this nation if they had the training.

MIKULSKI: I really strongly recommend that you go back to the Brock report and perhaps do a Brock-Chao II, because I think we need an inventory of kind of where we are in terms of work force needs in this country and then really have strategic goals and plans for achieving them. It was an excellent report. It was a nonpartisan report. And I think it's a document we could all work from. So I commend this to you.

I'm concerned about shortages, not only in computer technology and systems analysis, but in the trades. You know, I truly believe that I could get President Bush on the phone today, if I needed to, but I don't know if I could get a plumber or an electrician. And it might be harder to get an appointment to see them.

(LAUGHTER)

And it's really not a laughing -- but because we so emphasize college, we've also got a...

CHAO: You're absolutely right.

MIKULSKI: ... shortage in machinists. I've go to my high-tech places and there's fabrication; shortages in nurses, lab technicians; in the field of gerontology. But I get bits and pieces. And I think if we had from the Department of Labor kind of this inventory document, later in the year and so on, that we could all be working from, I think it would help us focus on it. So I commend that to your attention.

Second, I'd like to come back to the skill shortage area, just as we've talked about trades, et cetera. Have you thought about the kinds of partnerships, because the Department of Labor cannot do this alone.

CHAO: Right.

MIKULSKI: And it would be a flawed effort. Do you have thoughts on how you would pursue this -- job training, tech training?

CHAO: I think there are so many opportunities for the Department of Labor to partner with other groups, to partner with other departments, to partner with other agencies in the executive branch, and also to partner with nonprofit organizations, for example, and also the private sector. And I think the key is to be innovative and to reach out to hitherto uninvolved groups.

And I hope that during my tenure, because of my experience in all three sectors -- the public, the private and the nonprofit -- and with my contacts and connections, that I'll be able to reach out and draw upon those groups, as well.

MIKULSKI: Well, if I could, I'd like to offer some suggestions. And I'm so glad to just hear your framework.

First of all, I think it requires creativity, working on lessons learned. Picking up even what Mr. Enzi said about, Let's not make anybody the enemy, poverty is the enemy.

CHAO: Right.

MIKULSKI: Poverty's the enemy.

And I would commend a couple of things to your attention. Number one, take a look at the community colleges, echoing what Senator Gregg said. They are the gateway. And often for people who are intimidated about higher ed, through certificate programs that lead to degrees.

I know steel workers that in order to keep their job had to take certificate at the Baltimore County Community College, but it was a certificate here, a certificate there. Many of these men and some women are eligible for community college degrees now. These are the gateways.

The other, the community centers. You come from a very strong Asian-American community. As you know, ethnic heritage groups often live in same communities. Community centers, where adults could learn by day, kids could have structured after-school activities.

And last, veterans.

MIKULSKI: That's (inaudible). Yes, veteran's health care is such burgeoning, we forget job training.

One last story, because I want to make sure -- Senator Collins has a question, has an opportunity before we go to vote.

SBA, fantastic opportunity. One last cameo story. I got a special purpose grant -- that's called a line item in HUD -- to go to Wheaton, Maryland, because we have over 1,000 small businesses, primarily from immigrant communities, many learning language for the first time. But I created a small business tech center. They were being ripped off in web site design. They were being ripped off by people saying -- they were really being gouged, because they didn't have access to technology and didn't learn how to use it. We are focusing on this. And this is empowering.

First of all, it stops fraud against them. But because they can't afford to buy a computer, take the time to learn how to use the computer, and so, by having the community center right where they are, they're coming in almost 24-hours-7 to have access to technology and learn how to use it. This is kind of the partnerships I'm talking about. And I'm so enthusiastic about working with you on this.

CHAO: Thank you very much.

MIKULSKI: I didn't mean to give a speech.

CHAO: No, I appreciate that actually.

MIKULSKI: Your framework is kind of along the lines we're talking about. Is this in alignment with your...

CHAO: Absolutely. I think there has to be innovative ways to approach education. Educational institutions themselves are under pressure to respond to the changing workplace in a very different way. Distance learning, for example. All these certificate programs that you mentioned. There are now lots and lots of different ways to train people. And schools and the nonprofit organizations, for-profit organizations within the private sector are all going to have to work together. And I think it's a real exciting time.

MIKULSKI: And I do hope you take a look at the Brock report and see how we could do...

CHAO: In fact, the secretary and I missed each other, in fact, right before the meeting here. So it has been my intent to give him a call and we are going to discuss this.

JEFFORDS: We have a sort of a messy situation, because there's two votes. First, I'd like to ask you, would you like a break?

CHAO: I will do whatever the committee would like.

(LAUGHTER)

JEFFORDS: Well, let's put it this way, I'll give you a break.

CHAO: OK.

JEFFORDS: So we'll take a 10-minute break. And then Senator Enzi will take over until I get back. And I'm going over there and get back as fast as I can.

CHAO: Great. Thank you.

(RECESS)

ENZI: We'll call the committee back to order. Senator Jeffords will be casting the second vote and then he'll be returning to chair this, as will other members of the committee.

WARNER: Are there two votes or one?

ENZI: There are two votes.

WARNER: Is it to two now?

ENZI: Yes.

And this is still the first vote.

WARNER: Well, when did they shift? They didn't.

ENZI: I'm not sure when they did. It came as a surprise to just about all of us here so...

WARNER: Thank you for that.

ENZI: So we'll go ahead with your questions and then you and I can do a second vote.

WARNER: Thank you very much. I welcome this opportunity.

I've been privileged to represent the Commonwealth of Virginia for 23 years now in the United States Senate. And with a little luck, I'll be hanging in for awhile. But throughout that period, I have had, I think, very even-handed and fair treatment from the unions. I think my bottom line is unions are essential -- absolutely essential to achieve a balance between certain segments of workers and the private sector and other interests that are important to those workers, whether it's health care or many other interests.

But from time to time, any organization, I think, fall onto programs which concern me. And you have undoubtedly followed the vigorous debate for several years in the campaign finance arena primarily about the automatic or mandatory or however it's properly addressed check-off of the dues, whereby union workers are required to have their paychecks deducted before they even get the check for dues that go in for purposes for the union leaders to make decisions as to which candidate to support and not support.

This troubles me just fundamentally that an individual, who otherwise might wish to give their sum of money to politics, are lacking the ability to exercise discretion over the manner in which those funds are spent. They could be desirous of doing their political contribution to say, the school boards or the local city council as opposed to congressional races and so forth.

What is the history of this to the best of your knowledge? And what actions have been taken by any of your predecessors to examine this policy simply from the standpoint of fairness and equity to an individual's right to decide for themselves how to spend their own funds which they've earned and to which they're entitled?

CHAO: Senator, I think that's an excellent question in which you obviously are concerned. I probably would not be the best person to give you a historical perspective, seeing that I haven't even set foot on the Department of Labor building yet.

However, I will say this: All of my jobs in the for-profit, non-profit and the public sector, an overriding philosophy is that disclosure is always a good thing. And insofar as we can disclose whatever activities an organization is doing or any entity is doing, I think each member will become that much more empowered and that much more knowledgeable. And so it's a worthwhile goal to ensure that there's full and adequate disclosure.

And on issue that you've just raised, that clearly would be the position that certain people would want to take. And I know they could be very controversial, but again, I just can't...

WARNER: We will be addressing the important subject of campaign finance reform. This will come up. Whether or not Congress will try to strike some balance in this area, such that a worker has a measure of discretion, I know not. You have this one law case, whereby they can opt out, but that puts them in a very tenuous position with regard to the other workers and a lot of peer pressure and so forth. So we'll look at it.

But I wondered if you would at least commit to say that you will examine what is the authority within the framework of laws that you are enforcing, or indeed maybe an initiative to Congress from your department to help this situation in the event Congress does not come to some resolution of this issue in the course of the campaign finance reform measure. I just think it's only fair to the workers to do that.

CHAO: Again, as secretary of labor, should I be confirmed, I will always be concerned about equipping workers in an empowered and modern workplace that they can make their own decisions.

WARNER: Good. Well, that's...

CHAO: And to that extent, disclosure, I think, would be a...

WARNER: ... very reassuring and I think as much as you can state at this point in time.

Second question relates to the high-tech industry. We're fortunate, in the Commonwealth of Virginia, to have, depending on what evaluation you make, one of the largest, maybe the fastest growing in Northern Virginia and other parts of our state. We welcome it.

And I wasn't able to read the banner on your newspaper there, but the Washington Post and other people here and published it every weekend, I've used it many times in speeches.

CHAO: That's exactly what it is. Yes, just a high-tech listing of jobs.

WARNER: I've used it many times in speeches.

But as hard as I and others have worked on this issue, we've not come into any program that is significantly benefiting workers so that they can begin to prepare for this.

It comes down to the fact that in America, regrettably, very few young people want to take on the arduous educational course involving science and technology. And I happen to come up through the engineering side of life, not a professional engineer, but majored in mathematics and physics and things like that, because I had a natural bent and was quite interested in it. But look at any statistic worldwide, we're at the lower level in terms of our educational structure to help provide to meet this requirement in the job market.

Now, you could work with the secretary of education. Let me give you an example, and I'm going to touch on hallowed ground, where I get in trouble every time, but I'm going to go ahead and do it.

The Pell grant program, billions, billions of taxpayers dollars. Fine program, but should we not, maybe build in some incentives in this enormous sum of money that goes out every year to try and encourage those receiving Pell grants to begin to prepare themselves for this job market? Because it gets down to the taxpayers' dollar, which we, the Congress, then take from them and taxation, turn it right around and put it out in a Pell grant. And it's to the interest of this country to maintain our position in this one world global economy, a stronger position in the high-tech world. So I would hope that you would look at that and talk to the secretary of education and see what you can do.

CHAO: Again, I have emphasized on many occasions, and especially my visits with members, that it's really important to reinforce and strengthen this critical link between Department of Education and the Department of Labor. Clearly, when you talk about the inadequate preparation of our young people today in the sciences and in math in particular, which are the foundations of any career in high-tech world, it is of concern.

And there are a whole host of other issues. You know, why is this developing. There are issues of young people where it's not cool to learn, I mean, there's a whole host of other issues involved which the Education Department needs to address, as well.

But, clearly, the Labor Department and the labor force is impacted by the quality of workers that are, quote-unquote, "delivered" to the workplace at age 21, 22, 18, 19. So the two departments do need to work very closely together. And, again, I'm all for that.

WARNER: Let me go to a third subject. You once served as chairman of the Federal Maritime Administration. And I've had a modest association with the sea in my lifetime, working in the Navy Department as secretary and now on the Armed Service Committee these 23 years.

I've watched our Merchant Marine go from the largest in the world. I mean, it's the end of World War II, tens of thousands of ships proudly flying the American flag all over the world. And, again, I'm not pointing fingers at the unions, but slowly this thing has gotten down to where it's just a few hundred ships, at most.

CHAO: How I view...

WARNER: The Jones Act, you've got a whole framework of laws, which you're very familiar with. And I think and I represent a state which proudly has a number of facilities which serve today's Merchant Marine.

I'd like to see more American flags afloat. I'd like to see America strengthen its Merchant Marines. I guarantee our entire concept of defense, except now for a growing need of homeland defense, is predicated on forward deployment, projecting beyond the shores of this nation our military to deter war or if necessary to join with our allies in bringing peace and freedom to other countries.

This surface transportation is absolutely essential -- absolutely essential to our national defense. And I would hope that I could work with you and seeing what we could do, and indeed the unions and the industry, to be reinvigorating the magnificence of our once proud heritage in the Merchant Marines.

Is this an area in which I can hopefully work with you and stimulate a little?

CHAO: Absolutely, Senator. We have worked in the past on Maritime issues. And you know that I am a very, very strong proponent of the Merchant Marine. And, clearly, in the Gulf War of 1991, we saw how important and viable and robust American Merchant Marine meant to national security, because they were the ships that brought the logistical supplies and troops to the Middle East. So I'm very, very cognizant of the need for a strong Merchant Marine and one that clearly supports our national security.

I think the problem is very difficult, because of the cost disparities that now exist between construction of these ships, as well as manning levels.

CHAO: The "marketplace," quote/unquote, if not very hospitable, and the issue is how do we work with labor people in this sector to ensure that there are adequate seagoing jobs, because there are a lot of shoreside jobs, but seagoing jobs; and also are we encouraging young people to go into a field that has adequate opportunities for them? There are five tremendous academies, King's Point and the state maritime academies, that are doing a wonderful job in turning out seafarers.

WARNER: And once they're turned out, there are no jobs.

CHAO: And so we need to work with...

WARNER: What a concept. Here's a starving need in the high-tech industry, too few. Here we have the taxpayers educating men and women to assume the wonderful, historical career at sea, and no ships on which to go.

CHAO: This is a larger issue about national security, but certainly I look forward to working with the Department of Transportation, the maritime academies, King's Point, addressing these issues.

WARNER: Well, I'm going to some initiatives.

CHAO: I look forward to working with you.

WARNER: It's just so important that labor be a part of it. Labor take the lead, if necessary.

I thank you and wish you luck. And you have my support.

CHAO: Thank you.

JEFFORDS: Senator Wellstone?

WELLSTONE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And I'll say to Senator Warner, another marriage that's ready to take place, and you mentioned this earlier, is you've got the communication technology industry looking for skilled workers and you've got people in rural communities that have a great work ethic -- and this ought to be put together -- who can telework; who can do it from their homes; who can do it from a satellite office if we have the infrastructure. And I appreciate your commitment to that.

Let me ask some direct questions, if I could, Ms. Chao.

One is, on the ergonomic standard, I think the National Academy of Science report was very important, because we kept hearing if the science is there, and this report says, "Look, there's a direct connection between workplace practices and ergonomic injuries and as a matter of fact, there is also conclusive evidence that the interventions in the workplace can play a large role in reducing these debilitating injuries or illnesses."

As secretary of labor, would you attempt or support any attempt to stay or rescind -- I mean, the regulations are on the books -- or otherwise modify this ergonomics regulation?

CHAO: I can't answer that question right now, because I'm not there yet. And I think that, again, this is a very, very complicated issue. The final rule was issued on January 16. It took years to get the final rule out. And now it's in litigation already.

So I think one of my first responsibilities is to make sure that I understand this issue, and that I understand the viewpoints of all sides, the pros and the cons. And I will commit to you that I will study this issue very carefully and I will make a very informed choice.

WELLSTONE: Well, listen, I don't have any doubt about your good faith in answering that part of the question. My question is, this regulation has been promulgated. Can you make the commitment to enforce this regulation right now, until there's evidence otherwise? I mean, it's the law of the land.

CHAO: I don't know. I don't know what the prerogatives of the secretary of labor is, so I can't answer that.

WELLSTONE: I mentioned when you dropped by my interest in coal dust regulation and what MSHA has done. I couldn't believe it. I know that Eastern Kentucky is near and dear to your heart and to Senator McConnell's heart. I just couldn't believe it when I drove my wife drove my wife, Sally, that way, and I met with people, and all of the reports of not being able to see six inches in front of them -- and MSHA's worked long and hard, and now we have a regulation which is at OMB which basically says, there's too much evidence of, basically, cheating -- I don't know any other way to say it -- by the companies. It shouldn't be the companies that do this regulation, but rather MSHA would come in and independently do it.

And I guess my question for you is whether or not you would be committed to making sure that this regulation goes through. It's so important to the health and safety of the miners. I just feel so strongly about this when you want to prevent black lung disease. And a lot of work's gone into this.

CHAO: I think the two rules that you mentioned were just issued in the last few weeks or so. So again, as part of my responsibilities, going in as the new secretary of labor, I would expect that I would review them carefully and try to understand them as to the full ramifications before coming to any further.

I will say this, though. I do understand that the black lung trust fund is $7 billion in debt, and I'm very concerned about that. Because if this fund is supposed to help people who are in need of these resources, then potentially its insolvency will, obviously, fall short of its obligations.

CHAO: And so I'm going to be very concerned about that. And that I will also look very carefully at.

WELLSTONE: Well, I appreciate the second part of your answer, but what I'm trying to get at is, how is it that we make sure that people in the first place aren't having to struggle with black lung disease and don't need the help in the first place?

And you're absolutely right, I mean, a lot of work went into this. A lot of sweat and tears went into the regulation. And at the very end, OMB couldn't go through.

But my question is, whether or not you, as secretary of labor, would do everything you can to see that the regulation is enacted. I mean, it's coal dust levels. We know what the problem is. We know something needs to be done. You've got this regulation, it's key to health and safety of workers, in this particular case, miners. And I'm trying to ask you, as a future secretary of labor, whether or not you would do everything you could to see that this regulation would be enacted. That's really my question.

CHAO: I think in concept I care deeply about this regulation, and I'm concerned about the plight of coal miners.

I have to say also to you, I don't know exactly what this regulation does. And so before I enact it, I would have to understand what it does. And I will commit to you that I will study it very carefully.

JEFFORDS: OK.

Senator Hutchinson?

HUTCHINSON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Ms. Chao, there will be a number of legislative issues that I will look forward to discussing with you and corresponding with you about, and this is probably not the day to get into a long discussion. We don't have time to get into a long discussion on them.

But the ergonomics issue, which has come up repeatedly, I think the NAS study was helpful. The question is not now and hasn't really been whether we do something, it's how we do it. And as you pointed out, it's in the courts already. So this issue may well need to be addressed again.

Senator Enzi had lengthy hearings pointing out problems in the approach that has been taken on the ergonomics issue. And so I look forward on that issue.

Salting is an issue -- salting abuse is an issue that I have been concerned about. The blacklisting rule which was finalized January 19, which, in my opinion, really, under that rule, mandates that the federal government discriminate in the awarding of contracts, discriminating against non-union contractors. That also I suspect will be in legislation.

And the area of OSHA reform -- and Senator Enzi has led the fight in the Senate to improve OSHA and to modernize OSHA. And that's going to be a recurring issue.

But this afternoon, I would just like to focus for a moment upon the department itself. Millions of Americans at least, and certainly all of us on this committee were shocked last year when the word came out that OSHA was looking at regulating the home workplace. And, of course, there was a quick retreat on that. And Senator Enzi and myself had some meetings on how that came about.

And I think the General Accounting Office, in their annual report on major management challenges and program risks at the Department of Labor, kind of hit the nail on the head. They talked about decentralization and how that has intensified the department's coordination challenge, the lack of policy management by the department and the multitude of individualized policy shops located in each agency.

So it would appear that the department's Office of Policy doesn't have the level of control over the agencies that it used to, and that I think it should. Would you address that management issue?

CHAO: Senator, you're not the first one that has brought that to my attention. Apparently in past administrations, the assistant secretary for policy was a centralized place and it was a clearance for all policy issues. And since that time, I think in the last seven or eight years, there's apparently been a decentralization of the office. There has been enough concerns expressed on this issue that I realize that it's an issue that I've got to address, at least examine and look at when I get in, and I will do so.

HUTCHINSON: I appreciate that. I think in that initial review, this is something that certainly deserves scrutiny, and I appreciate your assurance that you'll be doing that.

The other issue that I just wanted to mention briefly is that we talked earlier about the Patients' Bill of Rights and the difficulty we've had in arriving at one. One of the issues that was on the conference committee -- one of the issues that we addressed was the Association Health Plan issue, the AHPs, which I strongly support. I've introduced legislation in the past, will be introducing legislation, to allow small businesses, which do not have the buying power of our great retailer in Arkansas, Wal-Mart, and many of the other retailers that have large health plans, but small businesses that could work together and operate under ERISA, assuming that we then will have patient protections under the ERISA, will really, I think, attack the problem of the increasing numbers of uninsured.

And I appreciated, during the campaign, President Bush's support of that concept. And I hope that, as we move forward with legislation on that, we can work together to insure that a lot of these small businesses will be able to bring down the premiums and provide better health care for their employees.

CHAO: I know that this is an issue that you've been very concerned about and you've championed, so I will certainly be very mindful of it.

HUTCHINSON: I thank you, and I think that's all I need to bring up. I appreciate the very candid answers you've given today. And we look forward to having an ally for American workers again in the Department of Labor.

CHAO: Thank you.

JEFFORDS: Thank you, Senator.

Senator Clinton?

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and I apologize for having to leave to cast the votes. And I'm sorry to have missed any of the conversation.

I just wanted to touch on a few issues that are of concern to me. One is that our emphasis on the need for skilled workers is very timely, and I look forward to working with you on that.

But I'm also concerned about the shortage of workers in certain professions that there's an increasing demand for, such as nursing homes, home health aids, other kinds of service professions where we're having a very difficult time recruiting and keeping such people. I think there's both a skills issue and a wage issue that the market will respond to, but I think there has to be some attention paid to that in terms of incentives for moving that along, especially with the increased aging of the population.

Secondly, I think it's also very important that we make decisions based on good information. And I look forward to talking with Senator Gregg about his comments about the Family and Medical Leave Act, which in my experience are really not borne out based on the evidence of the analyses that have been done about the Family and Medical Leave Act.

So I think there has to be some meeting of the minds about what evidentiary basis we used to make any kind of policy decisions on. And the Family and Medical Leave Act is of particular concern to many millions of Americans, and you've had that addressed to you from several different vantage points.

But I do want to emphasize the larger issue that's raised about making policy based on good information. And I'll look forward to talking with you and Senator Gregg about that further.

I want to turn now to pensions, which falls under your responsibility. And I know certainly in New York there has been a great deal of concern about companies changing to cash balance plans or attempting to change to cash balance plans, which is a move away from rewarding workers for longevity, which is really what the contract that these original workers thought they were buying into at the time they started employment with a lot of these companies.

And I think that it's important that, although the new economy is here and globalization is changing the way we work, it hasn't really penetrated into many of the work sectors in our economy, and there are many people who have planned their retirement and have really made a very strong commitment to a company based on the pension plan.

And I know that pension law is governed by federal statute. And I would be interested in your views about how you ensure that employees who start off under one system and work for decades, often, are given a fair chance to have some voice in any corporate decision that might undermine or eliminate their pension rights.

CHAO: Well, the secretary of labor, obviously, has responsibility for ensuring the financial stability of the American working man and woman as well.

The issue that you raise is an enormously complicated one. I am sure you are much, much versed in it than many, many others in this room, because of your past experience and work in this area.

I'm very sympathetic, obviously, to ensuring that workers who have put in a tremendous amount of dedication and commitment to their employers not be forsaken and that their past labors not be forgotten.

On the other hand, there is also the very difficult issue of companies who are faced with increasingly hefty and burdensome pension benefits that over time they're unable to bear, to the point where many of these companies are suffering financial consequences.

So there must be some way in which we, as a creative nation, can work on this issue and take care of the financial security of our increasing seniors and also make sure the companies are not bankrupted either.

I don't have the solution to this, but clearly it's a concern of yours. I will certainly be mindful of that. And I hope that we can work together on it, because it's a very important issue, especially with the aging of our population as well.

CLINTON: And I think your point about being creative is a good one. We need to look for ways that balance the needs that you outlined. And I would very much like to work with you on that.

There's been a lot of questions to you about work force development. I'm particularly interested in finding ways that we can really target programs and encourage communities to make the assessment of their own educational and training capacity, working with business and labor and the educational communities, using the regional skills alliances model, which I think has proven successful in a number of areas that I have reviewed.

And then continuing what has been started, which are a lot of the school-to-work programs, because a lot of our young people need the kind of support and direction that these programs provide. We have a grant, for example, up in Rochester that is giving externships to many of the high school students there. And I think it's important to take a good look at what has been working, because the school-to-work partnerships sunset this year.

So I would like, again, to work with you and to have you pay particular attention to what we've learned from this experience, what has worked well. I'm a strong believer in continuing what works and discontinuing what doesn't work, and being flexible and creative and creating the kind of opportunities that will provide the, sort of, skills development that the work force needs. And so I would very much like to have your feedback on that once you get into the department and figure out what's going on.

I wanted to finally just raise some issues concerning the federal contract compliance program, which, as you know, really is founded on the proposition that our government should not send funds to anyone, anywhere, that support illegal discrimination against women and minorities. And this program requires contractors to pledge not to discriminate, and requires them also to adopt affirmative action plans with goals and timetables for ensuring equal opportunity. It does not require quotas, which I'm opposed to, it does not in any way permit or promote the hiring of unqualified personnel.

But ever since it's been in place, since the Nixon administration added the goals and timetables requirement, there has been steady progress in a lot of the areas of the economy that traditionally were closed to women and minorities, the so-called nontraditional areas that are now much more integrated.

And I would hope that we could continue to, you know, use the clout of the federal government in its contracting capacity to urge people to think more broadly about who is hireable and promotable. And I wanted to ask if you would support the vigorous enforcement of the contract compliance program.

JEFFORDS: Senator, I hate to interrupt, but we have one member who hasn't voted yet, and your time has expired.

Senator Collins?

COLLINS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Ms. Chao, I am only going to be able to touch on a few issues very quickly, in order to go vote.

COLLINS: I do want to follow up on the point made by Senator Enzi about the burden of well-intentioned but very complex and complicated and lengthy regulations on our small businesses. And I want to do so by giving you an example of a true case in the state of Maine that I think really defied common sense.

Last summer, a small restaurant in Damariscotta, Maine, was fined $8,400 by the Department of Labor for allowing a teenaged-worker to use a standard Kitchen Aid mixer to whip up a soft cheese mix. Now, here's where it gets complicated. The small businessman contacted my office and asked us to look into this. Well, as we started going through the regulations and talking with the Department of Labor, we discovered that teenagers were allowed to use this exact mixer if they were whipping up cream, egg whites or icing. It was silent on the issue of soft cheeses.

It also said you weren't allowed to use this mixer to do heavy bread doughs. Now, how in the world was this small business, this small restaurant, this mom and pop operation in Damariscotta, Maine, supposed to figure out that whipping out egg whites and cream was fine, but mixing up this soft cheese mix was not?

Now, I want to give credit to the Department of Labor, because upon further discussions with the officials, they agreed to rescind the fine and to close the case. But I wanted you to be aware of this case, because I can't think of a better example of an unfair burden on a small business owner who is doing everything possible to try to comply with the law, but was really faced with a regulation that was just impossible to understand what was allowed and what was covered.

So I would hope that you consider reviewing regulations like that and working, as you have pledged to do, not only with SBA, but with the small business community so we can avoid these kinds of really absurd situations in the future.

CHAO: I think all of us care about physical security and safety of workers. And I don't think any one of us would say that we're not in support of that.

Obviously, the Department of Labor has a humongous responsibility in enforcing the many regulations that it is responsible. The Department of Labor supposedly is one of the largest regulators in the federal government. And I would hope that every single employee in the Department of Labor understands the gravity of that responsibility and will work to ensure the safety and security of workers, but also work to ensure that there's common sense in regulations involved, as well.

COLLINS: Well, again, I do want to salute the department's employees for ultimately exercising that common sense. But the fact that this regulation existed in the way that it did, again, well- intentioned, but clearly defied common sense in its execution; it's a real problem.

The second issues I just want to touch on quickly is my concern about the trade adjustment assistance programs, which will need to be reauthorized at the end of this fiscal year. One of the most difficult experiences that I have had as a United States senator, was meeting with displaced shoe workers in my state, who had spent their entire lives working in factories doing a great job with excellent craftsmanship, turning out shoes only to find that they were going to lose their jobs because of a flood of cheap imports.

Trade adjustment assistance has been absolutely essential in assisting these individuals, not only with extended unemployment assistance, but more important with new training and new skills. I have to tell you, it's still very difficult, if you've worked in a small town in Maine at the shoe factory your whole life and you're in your early 50s and your health isn't very good, to be told all of a sudden you've got to learn a whole new career or move to a new town, it's very difficult.

But these programs are essential and I hope you will pledge to work with us to support them, to strengthen them and improve them to make sure that we are attentive to the needs of those displaced workers in this new economy.

CHAO: I certainly will be.

COLLINS: And finally, I do want to just let you know of my interest and support for the Job Corps program. We are fortunate to have two Job Corps sites in Maine that do an excellent job in Bangor and in Northern Maine. And I would invite you to visit those sites, once you get settled into your new job.

CHAO: I look forward to that.

COLLINS: Thank you very much.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

JEFFORDS: Senator Sessions?

SESSIONS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Maybe Senator Clinton didn't get to finish. I'm sure you can't see that little light, it's awfully subdued there. If you need to finish your question, I'd yield to you.

CLINTON: That's so kind of you, Senator.

I just wanted to ask Ms. Chao to respond to a question about enforcing the contract compliance program, including its affirmative action component, with goals and timetables. If you had an opinion on that, at this point.

CHAO: I think, clearly, we are against discrimination of any sort, and I will enforce the law as it is enacted.

But it is interesting, from what little I understand about this topic, apparently, a lot of the federal acquisition controlling office -- and I can't remember what the proper name is -- they've been very concerned about how to apply this law, because the amount of regulations that impinge upon federal contracting is so lengthy and voluminous that the contracting officer's concern about whose role is it to try to see whether one contractor has abided by all the regulations. So I think there is a concern there as to how that can be done.

But if you want to know the standards, it's applied applicable to the federal acquisition process are not set by the Department of Labor. And they're the sole responsibility of the FAR council. And Secretary Herman herself has said that it's up to the agencies that comprise this council to set those standards. But there are set, obviously, we will enforce them.

CLINTON: Thank you, Senator Sessions.

SESSIONS: Ms. Chao, on the size of this agency, 17,000 employees and $40 billion in expenditures, I would urge that you really apply some tough management decisions, the total quality management vision, identifying what the goal is, in trying to do so with the least possible expense. And I believe if that's done, there could be some savings in Labor that could be used for other programs that are worthwhile and even allowing some of the American people to keep a little more of their money. I would urge you to make that a priority.

I think, also, one of your goals will need to be how you can further flexibility in the work force. A lot of businesses feel hampered by wage and hour laws that haven't really changed since the Depression and it complicates their lives.

For example, federal employees could volunteer to work Saturday if they had a child that needed to be in school Monday and they could get credit for working Saturday and they could take off Monday. And that's not available for most businesses under present wage and hour laws. You think we could make some progress in that regard?

CHAO: You're talking about compensatory time off, which I think is a very important issue.

SESSIONS: I was just saying no federal worker that I know would want to give that right up. They see that as a worker benefit, not a burden of the federal government on them.

CHAO: I know how strongly organized labor feel about this, as well. And right now we have a bifurcated work force. If you work in the government, you can have compensatory time off. But if you have a household with one person working for the federal government and the other one working for the private sector, there is a dichotomy; the one in the federal sector can have comp time and flexible hours and the one in the private sector cannot.

This, obviously, was the subject of a great deal of discussion in the last Congress.

CHAO: It's going to come up again and even in terms of the Family and Medical Leave Act, in terms of allowing parents to take time off for adoptions. I mean, all of these are all issues that will be discussed.

And I can assure everyone on both sides that I'm going to be a real good listener in all of this, and I want to work with both sides and hopefully find a field of commonality that we can all agree upon.

SESSIONS: And to follow up on Senator Enzi's leadership on OSHA, I would suggest, first of all, that he really has studied this to an extraordinary degree, and you would find Senator Enzi a valuable resource on OSHA questions.

I would note that we've had a hearing involving a Mr. Ron Hayes (ph) near Mobile, Alabama, my home town, who lost a son in an industrial accident. He has become a national expert and spokesman for safety in the workplace. And I think I can sum up his passionate concern, and it is this, that Labor Department officials have lost sight of their ultimate goal and are more, maybe, focused on moving the paper work from place A to place B and not actually going out into the workplace in a cooperative way to work with businesses and industry to identify what might be dangerous practices and improve them.

I would urge you to think about how you can make OSHA an aider, a facilitator for improved workplace safety rather than somebody who comes in after an accident and starts assessing blame. It will have to do that, I'm sure. But if you can avoid the accident, that's preferable.

CHAO: I think that's a very good suggestion. OSHA needs to take more care with helping companies in the preventive side. And I would hope that we would do that under my tenure.

SESSIONS: And finally, on job training, it has great potential, but the constant demand -- and this is just constant -- is to make sure that training that's being given to a young person or a person who is seeking a second employment, that that training is relevant to what's available in the community for them to work.

And in some instances, I believe, training might be better in partnership with the very industry itself because perhaps they only have a certain type of equipment. And the job training center cannot train them on that equipment. Some sort of subsidy that would encourage them to take unemployed and to train them for precisely the job they will be doing and give them a job would be a good direction for us to move.

CHAO: I appreciate that advice.

SESSIONS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

JEFFORDS: Thank you, Senator.

Senator Kennedy?

KENNEDY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I want to just mention something about the OSHA. I'm a very strong believer in it, and no one excuses the kinds of examples that we are given today. But listen to these figures: During the Reagan administration, there was a systematic weakening of OSHA under the banner of regulatory reform, and OSHA regulations were rolled back, enforcement weakened to the point of being meaningless, programs to train and educate workers were cut, and workers and union rights guaranteed by law were virtually ignored.

Rather than focus on protecting workers, the agency instead focused on accommodating businesses through weakening regulation and easing up on enforcement. Budget and personnel were also cut. Dedicated staff were pressured into leaving. The cumulative result was a significant increase in workplace injuries and illnesses: The injury rate increasing from 7.6 per 100 in 1983 to 8.9 per 100 in 1992.

Now, during the Clinton administration, where Charles Jeffress, who, I think, is just an extraordinary leader and has done really an outstanding job on OSHA. The foundation of OSHA programs was enforced, standard-setting, supplemented and balanced by compliance assistance, consultation, outreach, training and education. During this period, there was significant reduction in injury rates, with injury rates falling from 8.3 in '93 to 6.3 per 100 in '99, the lowest OSHA in 30 years of history.

KENNEDY: So, this doesn't lend itself to simple, easy answers. H.L. Mencken said that. "For complicated issues, there's a simple, easy answer, and it's wrong."

And we don't want to have a lot of simple, easy answers here today. This is a complex issue, but when there is vigorous enforcement and Charles Jeffress has done an outstanding job. If you had a few extra moments, I would suggest spending some time. Enormously --- he had an incredible record in North Carolina. He had strong bipartisan support when he came up here initially. I think he's done an outstanding job, but it is incredibly important, as you understand.

Now, going along quickly, on the Office of Contract Compliance, let me just mention this if I could, Ms. Chao. Between '94 and '98, the Office of Contract Compliance -- it's a general question, so you don't, I'm not trying to flyspeck you on this -- the Office of Contract Compliance recovered more than $175 million in total financial settlements for victims of discrimination. In '93 and '94, conducted 53 glass ceiling reviews, covering 29 different industries and 1.4 million workers.

Eighty percent of those reviews incurred serious problems on glass ceiling issues. From just eight of those reviews, obtained $1.4 million in remedy to pay discrimination, and discriminations in promotions for women in our society. Fiscal year '99, conducted 3,800 compliance reviews.

So the enforcement actions really must continue and I think must be strengthened. And I just want to ask -- repeat the question of Senator Clinton whether we have assurances from you whether this is going to -- it's been in effect now for 35 years, and whether we're going to have, will you commit to continued enforcement and strengthening this.

CHAO: I think from what I understand of the Office of Federal Contract Compliance Program, once the employer's awarded a contract, enforcing will occur. There's no question about that.

KENNEDY: But in terms of the program itself that's in effect, your response is that you support that program.

CHAO: I do. I am concerned, however, that there are contracting officers who are in the job of trying to make sure that all the compliance is in place and they are expressing some concern. And I want to listen to them as well.

KENNEDY: If there are individuals, but I would think if there's going to be changes, in light of what you mentioned earlier about willing to deal with all the stakeholders, we're a stakeholders in this. This committee is, as well. We would definitely wanted to be alerted on that.

CHAO: I would certainly be willing. Yes, absolutely.

KENNEDY: Let me mention another area quickly, again. On overtime and family hours, as I mentioned quickly before, particularly in lower income workers, are working considerably more -- 416 hours in the last 20 years more today. And, in many instances they don't have -- we have these examples where the -- I'd just finish with this if I could, Mr. Chairman -- we've had examples particularly in hospitals. But there are many examples; we had in our own state of Massachusetts, St. Vincent's Nursing Hospital, where nurses were working 20 straight hours often with a few moments' notice, disrupting their family lives and threatening their ability to provide the care on forced overtime.

We had that example that we received a lot of national attention. Brent Churchill, a 30-year old powerline man in Maine died on the job accident where he went two and a half days on five hours of sleep. Workers should have some control over these overtime issues.

We had the most recent study was a Department of Labor study of the poultry processing survey which uncovered overtime violations in 100 percent of the companies surveyed. And I hope you will give this issue of mandatory overtime, required overtime, abuses in these overtime, give this some attention in the department, because it's having this impact on people's lives that is enormously health threatening in instances, and in particularly in the health area, it's adverse in terms of the patients themselves. And people in our own economy ought to have a greater control over their lives.

My time is up.

CHAO: Thank you.

JEFFORDS: Well, thank you very much.

And that concludes our hearing. Under the rules, however, members may put questions in writing within a reasonable time and they will be looked at and answered to.

KENNEDY: If I could I would ask the disposition of the chair in considering when we might vote on the nomination, however?

JEFFORDS: As soon as possible. And I'll have to let you know. We haven't made a specific determination of exactly when that will happen.

KENNEDY: I think you have to gather that it's going to be a very positive, favorable and we'll certainly try to expedite it.

JEFFORDS: There are no further questions, but I also would like to thank you for your testimony, Ms. Chao.

CHAO: Thank you very much, Senator.

If I could just end with this, these are very, very tough issues. And I think we all care passionately about these issues, and if I can pledge this committee that I will work very hard, again, to find common ground and I will listen very carefully. Thank you.

JEFFORDS: Well, thank you again. You've been a fantastic witness and we deeply appreciate your willingness to serve and I'm sure that we will be expediting your confirmation as soon as possible.

CHAO: Thank you very much.

KENNEDY: Thanks, Chairman, thank you.

"World News Tonight," ABC News, 1/29/2001

President Bush makes a lot of news in the beginning of his second week in office. He said today he was troubled by the former President Clinton's pardon of Marc Rich, the fugitive billionaire who was wanted for financial crimes. He said he won't try to revoke the pardon, saying it was within Mr. Clinton's power to do so. Mr. Clinton, obviously, thought it was fine. Senator Clinton doesn't want to talk about it. ABC's Linda Douglass is with us this evening. Today the senator tried to give her first news conference and couldn't stay on message.

LINDA DOUGLASS reporting:

That's right. Peter. She tried to come out and talk about how she's going to vote against President Bush's nominees for attorney general and for interior secretary. But she just could not keep the focus away from herself.

Unidentified Man: Senator, do you have any plans right now?

DOUGLASS: (VO) The New York press pelted her with questions about the Clintons' controversial final days in the White House--their acceptance of lavish gifts and Mr. Clinton's last-minute pardon of several felons. Senator Clinton tried to dismiss it all as so much ancient history.

Senator HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (Democrat, New York): The White House years, the administration of my husband are over, and I'm going to be focused solely on the job that I can do to help New York.

DOUGLASS: (VO) She was grilled about her husband's last-minute pardon of fugitive billionaire Marc Rich, which has enraged US prosecutors, including former prosecutor, now New York mayor, Rudy Giuliani.

Sen. CLINTON: That is something that I don't have an opinion on one way or the other.

DOUGLASS: (VO) Marc Rich's ex-wife contributed a million dollars to the Democratic Party and gave the Clintons themselves $ 7,000 worth of furniture. Senator Clinton brushed aside criticism about the $ 200,000 in gifts they took from the White House.

Sen. CLINTON: We complied with everything that presidents and their families are expected to comply with, and, you know, there really isn't anything to add to that.

DOUGLASS: (VO) Clinton seemed determined to be charming, welcoming questions about her hair, which looks less coiffed since she left the White House.

Unidentified Woman: Basically, you had a different look. I mean, it was more up and glamorous and now it seems that you look more...

Sen. CLINTON: So now it's more down and not glamorous? Oh, dear.

DOUGLASS: But even her Democratic allies, Peter, are saying that her last days in the White House are getting her first days as a senator off to a bad start.

JENNINGS: Thanks very much, Linda Douglass on Capitol Hill this evening.

U.S. SENATOR PETE DOMENICI (R-NM) HOLDS HEARING REGARDING ECONOMIC SECTORS, 1/30/2000

MURRAY: Senator Clinton?

CLINTON: Thank you, and I wanted to thank the chairman for having a panel like this and the future panels that are planned, including a panel on coal, Senator Byrd, because I do think it is extremely helpful in forming our decisions when it comes to the budget issues we face.

You know, I must say listening -- and I'm sorry we haven't heard from the fourth panelist in the time that I've been here about agricultural issues yet -- but listening to the three whom we have heard from, raises for me the giant caution light about projections on the economy and the impact of the policies that this body's going to consider.

As I understand, Mr. Glassman -- and I'm sorry I missed his testimony, but I've quickly looked at the written version of it -- his view about the extraordinary power of monetary policy to keep the ship of state afloat is an optimistic -- and I would question, but an optimistic view of monetary policy on its own. And then, as Senator Nelson pointed out, the disparity between our two witnesses, Mr. Simmons and Dr. Penner, are such that I think that it's appropriate for us to wonder how we best make these projections. And, of course, we're going to hear from the CBO tomorrow, which are coming forward with projections, as I understand it, about $5.7 trillion surplus, which, of course, depends upon continued economic activity, perhaps somewhat slowed down but certainly still growing at about a 3 percent rate, which I think is, again, optimistic given the circumstances we find ourselves in.

The colloquy between Mr. Simmons and Dr. Penner was particularly of interest to me, because I do believe that if we have a capacity in infrastructure challenge, leaving it to the private market totally is a very long-term solution, and long term we don't know what the impact will be. And yet I'm very concerned about any significant governmental intervention and investment. But is there some role for policy and for government incentives, subsidies, credits, whatever might help speed the market response?

Senator Byrd's reference to clean coal, you know, it's always struck me as rather unfortunate that we didn't make even greater investments in helping the market respond to clean coal demands. We have still a lot of power plants that were grandfathered in and need help if they're ever going to economically be able to produce clean energy by using coal, which we had in abundance.

So could both of you just talk -- short of the direct investment in building rigs and some of the other ideas that Mr. Simmons had, could you perhaps find some medium ground for us to look at in terms of creating incentives or subsidies that would help to accelerate the market? That's the first thing.

The second thing is that I don't see energy as just any other commodity. To me, energy is an underlying necessary condition of the economy. And I have a problem, frankly, seeing it as office space. I don't think it is office space. I think it is a precondition. And this move toward deregulation, which is going to have, as we've already experienced, a lot of bumps on the road, is going to leave certain regions of our country out of the adequate supply of energy. I don't see any way around it, because some people are going to be more attractive than other people are. The grid is not going to be able to respond immediately to all of the peak needs.

One of the hallmarks of the American economy in the 20th century was that we moved toward full energy availability and reliability. That's what we did. So you went to a foreign country and you could roll your eyes because the lights went off for three hours and the water didn't run, and you said, "Well, thank goodness we don't face those problems."

I don't think Americans are really looking down the road to the time when if you live in certain parts of this country, you're not going to be able to take a shower or to run your lights on a continuing basis. That, to me, is not a very good prospect for the long-term economic growth that we're being told about in terms of the 10-year projections over this decade.

So if I could have Mr. Simmons and Dr. Penner just quickly respond to those points.

SIMMONS: Senator Clinton, I agree 1000 percent with where you're coming from. I have described from -- when you spend 30 years passionately studying an area, I guess you always get attached to it. But I don't think there's anything that comes close to energy. I don't know what number two would be. I've described it so often as industrial oxygen.

(UNKNOWN): Food, kind of, counts, doesn't it?

(LAUGHTER)

SIMMONS: Well, let me actually highlight the difference, because we know that a human body can go without food for a long period of time and just be uncomfortable, and I think that's the relation -- industrial oxygen, without energy, you actually don't need anything else because things stop.

It defies me to find a sector of the economy that can grow significantly without increasing energy. I think we, as a society, pretended for the last two or three years that this new economy somehow wasn't using energy, and in fact it was gobbling up kilowatts at a rate next to the invention of the light bulb and the car. If you can't expand energy capacity for a decade, I don't think we can basically expand the economy.

Now I also think that if we get on with this "Energy Marshall Plan" and we spend the trillions of dollars we have to spend to recreate the prosperity future for America and the world, we also can't sink into a deep recession, because that amount of spending is a self-correcting thing. It's just basically going to correct in some areas we didn't have on our drawing board as we started the first decade of the 21st century.

FOX-PENNER: Well, Senator -- excuse me?

DOMENICI: No, go ahead. I was just saying the light's not red yet; it's just yellow.

FOX-PENNER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator, I too agree with your sentiment. I have heard many people during the course of electric deregulation debates say, well -- in fact it was said in California, and it's one of the drivers for it, that people would stand up and say, "Gee, I can buy competitively any product in the whole state, but I can only buy electricity from one firm, and isn't that awful?" And that was one of the drivers for it.

I could not agree with you more that electricity is probably the single most important commodity, not just for our economy but for safety and security in our neighborhoods, in our homes. It's life itself to people who are on respirators. And it's for that reason that I think the people who say that electric deregulation or energy deregulation in general must be complete, and the problems in California is that they didn't do complete enough deregulation, are wrong. This is foreshadowing my testimony tomorrow at the Energy Committee, which I will get you a copy of.

We do believe in reliance on markets in, I would say, both sides of the aisle in this body, very strongly. But you have to temper that reliance with wise policies and wise investments. I think that what's going on in California is unacceptable, and it's for that reason that we can't just go whole hog more towards greater deregulation. We have to recognize that reliance on the market will create some shortages periodically if we don't put in rules and policies and careful investments.

Now, you asked us to try and illustrate the kinds of things the federal government can do, and I think there are a number of them. Many of them are on the policy side. The Federal Energy Regulatory Commission sets policies that absolutely determine how deregulated markets work, and they have to be done very carefully. And we are experimenting with it, and we have to be very careful with those experiments, because when it goes off the rails you see what happens with California.

We need particular investments in special areas, rather than these broad-scale investments, and let me just illustrate one. Mr. Simmons mentioned that there's a shortage of trained people in the oil and gas production sector. We have seen that in sectors all around the country during periods of shortage and periods of shifts. One of the things we've learned is that training programs can work, and one of the things that government should look very strongly at is taking difficult to employ people who need jobs and getting them trained to go help on these rigs. Good heavens, if we need more skilled rig people, there's nothing better than to create jobs where there's a need for jobs doing these sorts of things.

So if you look carefully, you see that government has fiscal levers and policy levers that can really accelerate us getting through this bottleneck but not in a way that's a full-scale federal investment program.

CLINTON: Thank you.

DOMENICI: I wanted to ask the senators that are still here what their intentions are. Senator Byrd, do you need another round of questions?

BYRD: I'd like a brief round...

DOMENICI: All right.

BYRD: ... dealing with agriculture.

DOMENICI: Senator Nelson, are you finished with your questioning?

NELSON: I've got just a couple of quick statements.

DOMENICI: OK.

NELSON: Then I've got to get out of here to a luncheon.

DOMENICI: OK.

Senator Clinton?

CLINTON: Same with me, Mr. Chairman.

DOMENICI: You have to get out of here for what?

CLINTON: A luncheon, so just a few quick statements.

DOMENICI: Sure. You don't have to tell me where you're going.

(LAUGHTER)

I shouldn't even ask.

Senator Byrd, would you mind if, since Senator Nelson just wants to make a statement, if he proceed and then you and I can stay and take another five, 10 minutes?

BYRD: No.

DOMENICI: Senator Nelson, would you proceed, please?

NELSON: Well, I would be the worse for that not to have the privilege of listening to Senator Byrd.

DOMENICI: OK.

NELSON: But I would say that I wanted to commend the gentleman for bringing up synth fuels, clean coal technology, all of these things, as we face an energy shortage we're going to have to face. And if we're looking at this long term, over the next 50 to 75 years, ultimately we're going to have to look to radically new technologies. And one that would blow your mind is the mining of helium3 on the surface of the moon and bringing it back through fusion, which has no byproduct of radioactivity; way out kind of things.

NELSON: And I would just say, in closing, Mr. Chairman, that I appreciate what each of you has said. I agree with you that I think we're going into an energy crisis. You've stated certain reasons. I have seen other reasons in that part of the world where there is that little extraordinary thing called a military choke point, called the 19-mile wide Strait of Hormuz. And with all of what's facing us with regard to terrorism in the future, that is certainly a point of attack which would disrupt all of those oil supplies coming out of the Persian Gulf, which would only exacerbate the energy potential crisis through shortage.

So thank you, Mr. Chairman.

DOMENICI: Thank you, Senator.

Senator Clinton, did you want to make a further comment?

CLINTON: Well, actually, I'd wait for Senator Byrd, Mr. Chairman.

DOMENICI: OK. But in waiting for Senator Byrd, you're all going to have to wait for me, and then you can hear him.

BYRD: I would suggest that the distinguished senator from New York proceed. I'd like to hear her, and I know she has a luncheon.

DOMENICI: Senator from New York?

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I want to switch gears for just a minute to agriculture, because I do think that it is a close call between food and energy. And I don't want to do without either.

So let me just ask Dr. Young, Dr. Young I didn't have the benefit of hearing your testimony, and so I apologize for that. But I am, frankly, concerned about the issue of food security for our country. I am concerned that, just as we have exported the production of many other goods, which are not essential to life, we are beginning to lose agricultural base. And I have three related questions that I would appreciate your responses to.

The first is that, under a lot of the trade agreements that have been negotiated, we have not really dealt with agriculture, for the obvious reasons that other countries subsidize their agricultural sector and are not willing to give up either that food production or the accompanying, sort of, real life quality issues that go along with it.

But it is clear to me that within at least NAFTA there was supposed to be some agreement that we would move agriculture toward a level playing field, particularly between the United States and Canada. I'm concerned about our northern border more than I am our southern border, because of New York's geographic location. Yet the farmers in New York tell me on a constant basis that they are fighting hidden subsidies, that Canada subsidizes transportation costs, energy costs, health care costs, so that, in effect, our agricultural sector is at a distinct disadvantage, and I would appreciate your response to that.

Secondly, one of the big issues in New York are our dairy farmers. You know, New York is the third largest dairy producing state in the country, and we are under tremendous pressures, because we don't have the advantages of a dairy compact like the New England states do, and we're losing a lot of our dairy farms, and I don't know whether there are any solutions to that. Obviously, I will try to fight again this year to get New York into the New England compact, because I think it's to the benefit of the East Coast to have one of the three major dairy producing states on this coast. But are there any other steps that could be taken with respect to dairy?

And then, thirdly, I want to link the energy and agricultural questions, because I know that dairy farmers and other large farming operations are heavy-intensive energy users. And trying again to think of ways that we can both help our farmers afford more energy conservation, alternative energy sources and certainly be able to pay the bills for what is happening now that they can't afford, are there any other steps that we could take or look at trying to support that would give agriculture more leeway when it comes to these increasing energy prices?

YOUNG: Let me take these in order. First, I would say that agriculture was very much a part of the last Uruguay -- or the Uruguay Round. We imposed a number of constraints on what other countries could do with respect to their export subsidies, also imposed some rules, if you will, with respect to how people could provide domestic support for their policies. And I would say that clearly the sore thumb that sticks out in all these different member countries would certainly be the European Union and the support that they provide there. And that was the main focus of our efforts with respect to limiting export subsidies.

I would say that Europe, I think, has learned this lesson very well and with the policy reform that they implemented, called Agenda 2000, not surprisingly in early 2000, they are significantly reducing the price support levels that they provide to their producers within the European Union. At the same time they're doing that, they are increasing their direct payments to their producers so that they end up with a policy -- a set of policies, if you will, that not necessarily look all that different than our own, but they're just willing to put a lot more money on the table to provide that support.

I would also say that, by following the rules, Europe is actually probably going to be in a position where they can export their wheat, which is their main commodity that -- well, a number of their commodities tend to get export subsidies, but that's one that tends to get some of the most attention. But they'll be able to export their wheat without the use of export subsidies probably sometime over the course of the next two to three years; tell me exactly what happens to exchange rates and things of that nature, and we could tell you some exact years.

And that will then free them from those constraints, and we would expect to see a significant increase in wheat exports coming out of Europe, following all the rules associated with this last trade round. That's going to be a real issue that I think we're going to have to deal as a country as we rewrite our current farm law over the course of the next year or two.

With respect to New York dairy, this is a real problem that basically all the states in the country are facing. We're certainly losing a number of farmers in Missouri -- dairy farmers in Missouri as well, for a variety of different reasons. We've also got significant structural differences in dairy production in New York just as one moves across the state. We tend to have smaller dairy operations in the upstate New York. As you move over to the west, we tend to have larger dairy operations as well.

Don't forget that what a lot of these individual dairy farmers are having to face or having to compete with are folks that are deciding they want to move out of the urban landscape, move out into the rural countryside, acquire some land, build their 40-acre estate and, kind of, go from there. And it's very difficult for those dairy producers to ever think that they're going to generate enough money to pay on a per acre basis what folks coming out of town are going to be able to pay. And that's a real problem that we're going to face regardless of where we happen to be.

I don't know that I can come up with a magic bullet. Andrea Novakovic (ph), other folks, Dr. Stephenson, as well, at Cornell, are folks that look at this issue on a daily basis, and I'd certainly listen to their advice and counsel on that very quickly. I'd also say that I don't know that they have a magic bullet either for this problem.

Finally, with respect to the energy and ag questions, we do have, and have tried in the past, a number of different ways to try to get renewable fuels included in a variety of our energy sources, our energy supplies, also as ways to clean up some of the fuel and to reduce some of our emissions. One particular demand or product that has received some attention, but not as much as some others, would be, say, soy diesel, and that would be an area where you can significantly reduce some of the emissions coming out of the diesel as well as providing you with some additional supplies.

I have no misperceptions that I don't think we're going to be able to look to United States agriculture to supply all of our energy needs at this stage of the game. There's just too big a demand for what the supply can provide there. But it is, again, an area that we can continue to investigate, continue to try to reduce some of the production costs on converting the corn and soybean products, et cetera into fuels. But they do also carry some very significant environmental benefits.

CLINTON: Thank you.

DOMENICI: Thank you very much. Let me, from my standpoint, finish my discussion and questions.

First, could we -- so we'll clear up the record, Dr. Young, I asked my staff to tell me, for the current fiscal year -- and I understand fiscal year and crop years are not identical -- but for the current fiscal year, I asked what the level of government assistance would be. The answer was $30 billion. Does that sound about right to you?

YOUNG: That sounds about right, if one includes all the different assistance packages that were passed over and above what were in the farm bill.

DOMENICI: OK. Now, the net farm income this year, if I got it right, is about, what, $46 billion?

YOUNG: For 2000, it should come in about $46 billion; yes, sir.

DOMENICI: Now, does this suggest that something is a little bit out of kilter when the federal government provides this level of subsidy, or whatever you call it, and we still have horror stories about the desperate farmers and ranchers?

YOUNG: Well, again, I think it would probably be a mistake to think that we can just directly subtract direct government payments from that net farm income number and say that what would be left over would be the market-generated revenues. We certainly have some production decisions that are based on government policies that are being provided, so I think you'd end up with a different kind of farm income number than would be suggested by just a sheer subtraction.

Having said that, however, those direct government payments do very definitely make a very strong contribution to the bottom line of a number of producers.

DOMENICI: All right.

Senator Byrd, I want to comment on clean coal and its use, and I also want to comment for a minute on nuclear energy. I would hope before we were finished, Senator Byrd, as we look to the future, that while I would support with all of my abilities the use of clean coal and find the bottlenecks and find out which regulations and which activists have caused us not to use it and then not say we're going to use it but ask the question, did we make a mistake? Have we made a mistake with reference to the rules and regulations that apply to the use of clean coal just because we are overly concerned about one aspect of our health condition versus others?

I believe we will find that policy decisions have been made not on the basis of America having shortages, because nobody believed it, but rather on the singular basis of how clean must clean coal be to be clean enough to be burned. And, frankly, I know a little bit about it. I know the Clean Air Act permitted some real discretion. I think most of the time activists who wanted to have us produce less prevailed.

Not only in clean coal. I'm aware of a policy decision made with natural gas on the way to California where two gigantic pipelines moved in, and of course there were some who didn't like them from the beginning. But as they got closer to California, one preceded the other. And so what happened, an argument ensued as to whether the second should proceed or whether it should fold itself into the first one. And, of course, those who wanted less growth, less energy won. And so there's a giant bottleneck where more natural gas comes in than the pipe that finally delivers it can carry.

Now, I frankly believe if somebody looks at it, and that's not this committee's job, maybe the administration and this task force will find more policy decisions of that type that are overly restrictive because the only policy considered was environmental and not energy needs. And I hope that when we do that we will look at nuclear power. And I hope -- I know you have not been an advocate, but I believe the United States of America must be able to tell the world we want more nations to get rich. I don't see any other way. If we're going to spread what we want to spread, we've got to tell the poor countries, "There's really something in it for you, and that means you can grow and prosper, and you can have more money in your pockets to spend."

And as a matter of fact, if we don't decide to use some natural -- or excuse me, some clean coal in large quantities and send it to the world by way of technology, and if we don't proceed in this great technical nation to reevaluate nuclear power, I don't know whether any of you experts know this but South Africa is preparing with the help of a whole bunch of countries, including ours, to build a totally new concept of a nuclear power plant. It is passive so it could not melt down. So that argument is gone. It produces far less waste, and it's small and modular so it can be put in with 100 megawatts and if everything's OK, you can add 100. Now, thank God, at the last minute the United States got involved, and we're really grateful that the Nuclear Regulatory Commission said, "If it'll help them, we'll get involved."

But you know, while Japan still builds nuclear power plants, the United States, three years ago, had no nuclear research in its Energy Department. And the sign said, "Energy Department USA," and could you imagine -- I'll say four years ago, because that's when we started funding nuclear in that department -- if you walked in, there was a sign, "Nuclear power prohibited." Now, for any great nation that wants to tell the world, "You're going to be rich like us if you follow democracy and some semblance of capitalism," we cannot ourselves send a wrong signal.

And, frankly, I believe it is policy decisions over the last 10 to 12 years that put us in this mess. Policy decisions by whom? By every level of politics. The state of California -- if we had somebody here today and said, "Read the statute that created deregulation in California," we would not have to be from California to ask questions about why it won't work. I mean putting deregulation in one aspect and no regulation on the other and the unregulated was needed by the regulated. And so they come into contact in terms of price.

DOMENICI: They didn't build a new power plant; now they have 20 -- 19 sites, they say, but not a power plant has been built for how long in California? I don't know. Pretty long. Fifteen years. How does that strike you? I mean somebody's making the wrong policy.

Now, if they would like the surrounding states to supply them with energy, then maybe that's what they should have told them, and maybe we should have been busy as a nation, saying, "Since California doesn't want any power plants," which I would never sit for as a policy-maker, "then we've got to provide it from someplace, because it's one-sixth" -- we understand that California is the like the sixth country in the world in terms of GDP all by itself. I mean it takes about 20 of our states to equal California if you go through the Rocky Mountains and the other, I think, in GDP. Maybe it's 15.

So I am convinced that you all are talking about the right problem. And those of you who are talking about it being a big problem, you are right. And those of you who are saying, "The government ought to get involved," you are right. Except the government ought to get involved in analyzing all its policies to see whether or not this enormous supply that we have of technology and development on the nuclear side, if we just find a waste repository, which incidentally I'm saying for the record is not even an issue in highly developed countries what you do temporarily with waste.

You want to go walk on the waste of Europe, go to France and go walk in a gymnasium where their high-level waste is right under you. You walk on it, and you look at it, and you say, "Well, that can't be. I mean where's the high-level waste?" And they say, "It doesn't even heat the surface. You're walking on it." And they think that's pretty good. They'll keep it there for 50 years while they find out how to do it permanently.

Now, can you imagine the United States of America, 2001, we're still fooling around with it stored at every plant up and down this country, and we're wondering what to do about it. There's no problem what we've got to do about it. It's a political issue.

So I would say to all those interested, I am for the government being involved, but I'm not for the government doing the business of producing energy. I'm saying the government ought to decide where are the bottlenecks, are they justified? Do they take into consideration America's need for prosperity and growth or are they based on other criteria that are absent that? In which event we better start changing.

Senator Byrd, I am totally convinced we will not use clean coal in the United States until policies are changed. And I voted with you on the advanced funding that you put in for clean coal. I thought for a while, "Why should he do that for coal when we can't do it for other things?" but I do understand. It's very expensive. Thing is all the investment's been made, all the breakthroughs have been made, but policies don't let them even use those kind of power plants that are better.

So, to me, the issue is the White House, with its task force, and if they would just analyze and send to us a series of things that they are changing and that we could change, we'll see America use clean coal, and we'll see the world start using it. And all this business that it can't be used because of the future well-being of the world, I believe those can be solved if we just decide that energy is important, important in every one of those decisions people are making with reference to the environment, with reference to conservation on public domain.

I have had a natural gas expert come into my office, Senator Byrd. One of the most successful and powerful and knows what he's talking about sat in front of me and said, "If you will change some rules about how we can get on the public domain and make sure we're going to leave it good when we finish, we can increase the natural gas supply in a short period of time" -- short period might mean six, seven years, eight years -- "we can increase it 100 trillion cubic feet." We use 22 trillion a year. That's a pretty good addition.

Now, there's been some discussion about money and rigs. How many do we have that can punch the Earth and bring out natural gas and crude oil? I think all of you that are experts should analyze why is not enough money going into oil patch in new rigs, even with the high prices. And you have to tell the truth. The reason is because those who put the money to do it know that what went up in that field will come down. So they can't invest at $15 if two years from now it comes down to $8. So the investment atmosphere is very different in that field than it is in most areas for the United States.

Yet if you talk about trying to make it better by creating some kind of a long-term investment approach -- I have a bill that I did that's much like Fannie Mae, interestingly enough. It would finance itself, but it would put money into the field to drill -- people say, "Why do you want to put the government in this for? Those companies have all the money in the world." But then go count the number of rigs, go count the investments that's going in to produce more rigs, and you'll find, until there is some assurance that it won't drop down so low that their investment is not sustained -- and I think that's what tax policy ought to be written on. It ought to be written on a trigger basis where when the price goes to a certain level then it's triggered in. When it stays at a high level, the tax consequences are different.

I know that's way too long a sermon, but I think maybe some people will know that some of us understand a little bit about this issue, and that we can't sit by when America's in this kind of crisis and just decide we're going to leave things alone. We can't do that. Thank you very much.

Senator Byrd?

BYRD: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I'll be very brief, so I'll just read. I'll just read the question. Each of the last calendar years -- is this working? Can you hear me all right?

DOMENICI: Yes.

BYRD: All right. In each of the three last calendar years, the Appropriations Committee, on which I serve and on which Senator Domenici serves -- the Appropriations Committee has found itself scrambling to provide emergency assistance to farmers when natural disasters such as droughts, hurricanes or floods strike. We do so in supplemental appropriation bills, generally, under the guise that these emergencies are unforeseen and unpredictable, which is in many ways they are. The fact of the matter is that we could contemplate that such emergencies might happen based on weather conditions, reporting, et cetera. The long-term drought forecast give us plenty of warning, but in the past we've chosen instead to cover our eyes and pretend that we could not see ahead.

In West Virginia, for example, the drought of 1999 was devastating to our agricultural economy. In my state, as you know, is not the home to large mega-farms. We have small- and medium-size farms that have been owned by families for generations. But because drought recovery assistance was delayed, many of these farms went under. Entire cattle herds had to be sold off just to pay the bills. Families that had been in the farming business for generations had to board up their farms, their barns and walk away from their farming traditions. Delays in federal emergency assistance leave rural communities and farmers wondering if the security net established to assist them will come in time.

This doesn't have to be the case. Following the 1999 drought, I'll work with Agriculture Secretary Glickman and also the distinguished senator from Mississippi, Thad Cochran, and others to create a contingency fund of $450 million, so as to expedite federal assistance should another disaster materialize. If drought struck, this contingency fund that we created would be in place so that assistance could be immediately infused to address sudden agricultural emergencies.

My initiative was really an ounce of prevention. It set aside funding to be made available only if a drought occurred but as soon as the disaster is declared. Secretary of Agriculture Glickman agreed that such a plan would be helpful in addressing drought more rapidly and ultimately in reducing losses.

Now I think of those lines by Oliver Goldsmith, because I'm thinking of how the small farms are vanishing from the landscape. Same thing happened in the latter days of the Roman Republic. The peasants left the land. Senators and others bought up the farms, and the peasants gravitated into the cities to join the mobs that asked for bread, wine and theater. They wanted entertainment.

You see that very same thing is happening in America today. People want to be entertained. Journalism no more is, it seems to me, is not -- its prime focus is not to bring to the people the news but to entertain the American people.

And I could go on quite a long time in this vein, but in a way it's pertinent here. We're losing our small farms.

Dr. Young, given the possibility that our farmers will experience some natural disaster in the coming years, do you think it makes sense to take a renewed look at the way we budget for disasters? While no one can control the powers of nature, Congress certainly can prepare to deal with the consequences of natural disasters. Shouldn't we be budgeting in advance for unexpected costs that may happen in the future and that will be undoubtedly happen at some point in the future without any question?

YOUNG: Senator, I think, as Congress, in the last two or three years, we've made a number of attempts to try to reform the Crop Insurance program. I strongly suspect that we have not, as of yet, written the last crop insurance reform bill. I think we'll probably write a number of crop insurance reform bills as time goes on.

This last round provided a pretty large level of support for producers who were willing to buy up some fairly high levels of coverage, i.e., they only have to lose 15, 20 percent of their crop before payments would begin to kick in, things of that nature. That's a fund that's already there; the producers can go receive the monies for it and proceed fairly quickly.

Also don't forget that the Commodity Credit Corporation Act charter also provides the secretary with a fairly broad amount of discretion as to how he or she may decide they want to try to operate some of these programs.

But don't forget, too, that I mean there's just a lot of details that one has to work through once a disaster occurs in order to understand what the current set of laws are that have been provided or assistance packages that have been provided that the department then has to work through before they can actually ask for claims from producers and then actually get the payments redistributed back out to them. And there's just a lot of time involved there.

That's not to say that having a contingency fund in place that we know is there, that has some reasonable rules set around it, that we can have the regulations then already written won't speed the process. That would speed the process. And certainly as producers face these challenges, as they lose these crops or whatever, an ability to go some place to get some cash in a hurry can quite often make the difference between whether they're there next year or not.

BYRD: Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

DOMENICI: Thank you very much.

Thank you, all four of you. I hope you enjoyed your appearance here today. We certainly thank you very much for it. It's very helpful.

We stand in recess.

U.S. SENATOR PETE DOMENICI (D-NM) HOLDS HEARING REGARDING THE ECONOMIC OUTLOOK, 1/31/2001

Senator Clinton, you are next.

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Anderson, I appreciate greatly the chapter in the outlook on uncertainty. I commend you for adding that since it's stating the obvious, I think, but it's important to have it. I don't know though that CBO and economists should be the only ones admitting uncertainty. I think if one goes back and looks at the fiscal decisions made in this body and the reactions to them going back over 20 years, there's certainly enough room for all of us to see that uncertainty plays a very large role.

I think back to the 1981 tax cuts, when the administration at that time said that the budget would be balanced in one year. And then in 1982, the administration said it would take three years. Then after Gramm-Rudman-Hollings was passed, the projections were five years. And yet, during the '81 to '93 period, we quadrupled the debt of this nation, and ended up with very large deficits.

And then in '93, I remember very well there were those who said the '93 economic plan would lead to recession, high levels of unemployment, deficits and economic stagnation.

So I think that it's only fair for those of us on this side of the table to point out that uncertainty comes in many forms. And I think that should make us all a little humbler than we perhaps tend to be in looking at what our future projections might be, and how those projections can be used.

You know, I may just be terribly old-fashioned, but it seems to me that these surpluses give us opportunities to deal with a lot of our long-term problems that face us as a nation. Not only the obvious ones about the entitlements that are going to have to be dealt with at our economic and social peril. But also, we do have needs in health care, education, aging infrastructures. I think that, as I heard yesterday from that table, from some energy experts, we have some energy issues that have to be dealt with, as well as defense and other important matters.

And I appreciate greatly your response to Senator Byrd's question about a prudent mechanism, because what I would be interested in -- and we don't have time, I certainly don't have time remaining in my questions. I'd be interested in some ideas from those of you who are budget experts about what such a mechanism would look like, how we could develop a glide path -- which has entered the jargon now -- that would lead to a soft landing 10 years out, and take care of our pressing social and national needs, and perhaps even looking at some of the states.

CLINTON: We heard a number of other senators refer to their experience in state governments. I think we ought to be creative about what it is we're faced with in the next 10 years, and have enough of a cushion so that we don't engage in a miscalculation that will be entered into in full good faith but, nevertheless, would have unintended consequences of rather significant economic dimensions, leading us back into deficits.

So I guess to that point, let me ask if you could, just give me some ideas about what such a reserve process or mechanism could look like, and any other thoughts you would have on how we could guard against the uncertainty, both from the CBO and from those of us who have to make the policies.

ANDERSON: Rainy day funds, which are frequently found in state governments, you don't see in the federal government. It's really a different nature. But there are ways, and they're relatively simple to describe, to basically create a reserve. The way you do it is to have a greater surplus, or in the cases of deficits, a lesser deficit. A prudent fiscal policy or a set of prudent fiscal policies that look at debt reduction and created a greater surplus than another set of policies would help provide a reserve, if at some time in the future the projections or other estimates turn out not to be correct.

There is a question that I tried to raise in my testimony concerning, once the redeemable debt has been paid down, then there will be the situation that at least since 1836 we've really never faced before, and that is whether the federal government ought to be investing in private assets. That's a different question.

CLINTON: It is a different question.

ANDERSON: That gets into a much -- as Chairman Greenspan I think...

CLINTON: And I think we've conflated those two. I mean, I think that people have drawn from what Chairman Greenspan said when he talked about asset accumulation and the dangers that could flow from the government owning private assets when you reach this irreducible debt minimum, that there wasn't therefore any room for a reserve. And I don't think that -- those are two different issues to me. Is that correct?

ANDERSON: I agree. I do think that one of the things that doesn't work, if I can talk about that, is promises by the Congress and the president in putting into legislation saying, "Oh, we've set this aside. We promise we'll never, ever, ever spend this again." Those promises are sometimes valuable, but sometimes not. Future congresses and future presidents can say, "Oh, I know that was made, and we respected at the time," but because legislation can be enacted to change that type of thing, I'm generally less enthusiastic about promises not to spend the money again.

So generally, if one wants to set aside reserves, I think the better way to do it than to stack a pile of money over in the corner is basically to run higher surpluses and pay down the debt more.

DOMENICI: Senator, did you have another question?

CLINTON: No, thank you.

DOMENICI: Next is the chairman of the Finance Committee. We're glad to have you on board, Mr. Chairman.

GRASSLEY: I'm glad to be on board for the full 21 years I've been in the Senate, on this committee. It's a very important committee.

(CROSSTALK)

GRASSLEY: I've got three questions.

GRASSLEY: They are more technical than they are policy. But I've had a chance to listen to several speeches, most of them from the other side of the aisle, that urge caution, and there's nothing wrong in government with urging caution, so I don't find fault with the caution being urged.

But there is -- whether you're in public policy or whether you're an individual making such a decision to expend money or invest money -- an individual has just as much difficulty looking down the road 20 years to pay off a house mortgage or 30 years to pay off a house mortgage as we do guessing what the future is going to be. But you try to make the best judgments you can about those decisions, and you go ahead and try to be prudent and make those. And so we're in the same position here.

But the caution I hear is that the glass is kind of half full -- or half empty instead of half full. And the caution that I hear today is that we ought to be careful about letting people expend their own money, as opposed to we politicians deciding how to spend it. And a philosophy that may be running more of the people's resources through the federal government, a higher share of the GNP through the federal government, is really better than the marketplace making that decision.

And all of this caution seems to me to be coming up now at a time when we're talking about fairly dramatic tax reductions. Even at the lower end of tax reductions now, which is the Democrat figure, it's still two or three times higher than it was just six months ago or at the higher end. But we're talking about very significant tax reductions at either end. And in the final analysis, we're being urged to take caution into consideration, when I don't hear that same caution, you know, last fall, when we increased expenditures 11.9 percent, this year over last year.

And if we had these last three years level of expenditures, if they continued on in the future, I've seen some charts that indicate that we'd be spending a $0.50 trillion dollars more than even the tax cuts we're talking about. So I hope that we will hear a consistency on these points of view about caution, not only on the tax side, but even more so on the expenditure side. Because there is one thing, Congress can increase taxes, but once you get a level of expenditure up, you never get it down, very seldom do you get it down.

Now, let me go to some very technical questions. Although the budget surplus will exceed $0.5 and $0.6 trillion over the next 10 years, the government will only be able to repay $0.2 and $0.3 trillion in federal debt held by the public. Now, according to your testimony, this difference is due to the fact that more than $800 billion of debt is not available for redemption. Now, according to OMB, this figure is much higher at $0.1 and $0.2 trillion. How do you account for the difference between these two estimates, since people owning X-number of dollars of 30-year bonds is so many people and so many dollars? It seems to me it's a pretty definite number.

ANDERSON: Well, first of all, the number changes every year. The number changes every year, particularly by the factor you just mentioned, Senator, that the amount of long-term bonds held by the public changes every year. Every year Treasury is still issuing some new long-term bonds, but there is also some being paid back. So our estimate of the amount of debt that there is available to be repaid actually changes every year.

It was just discussed earlier that the number goes from $1.2 trillion down to -- $1.2 trillion in 2006 down to $800 billion in 2011. In fact, this...

GRASSLEY: My figures are from the year 2011. OMB, $1.2 trillion, and CBO, $0.8 trillion.

ANDERSON: There is also an assumption that we have for, with respect to the Treasury Department's proposed buyback program -- so far, they have utilized this program only to a very small extent, less than $30 billion. I understand that OMB did not assume that the Treasury would continue this. We had been told by the Treasury that they would continue it.

ANDERSON: We had been told by the Treasury that they would continue it, therefore we had some modest amount of buybacks, I think to the tune of $100 or $200 billion or so.

There is also a lot of uncertainty with this set of numbers, as there is others. By that, I mean the amount of special nonmarketable issues for such things as savings bonds, state and local government issues, or other technical aspects Treasury does not make a specific projection of. Therefore, we had to do our independently at CBO. I don't know exactly how OMB did theirs.

GRASSLEY: OK. I'll dig into it and find out more, then, from OMB.

Now, CBO assumes that the portion of the surplus that is not used for debt reduction will be invested in unspecified assets. What legal authority does the government currently have to do this and how much leeway do they have investing in this asset or that asset?

ANDERSON: Generally, the Treasury does not have the legal authority to invest in any assets other than those guaranteed by the federal government. There was quite a debate within CBO, as I believe there has been within OMB, as to whether our baseline ought to illustrate that we have this excess cash or uncommitted funds invested in assets other than those federally guaranteed.

The one alternative to that would be to have presented a baseline to you that, once this unredeemed cash limit had been reached, to take all future amounts and split them 50-50 between spending increases and tax cuts. However, that had a connotation of CBO also making some kind of judgment, if only the judgment of 50-50.

So as the less of two evils, we decided to present the data that we have presented, even though we realize that under current law Treasury does not have the authority to do so.

GRASSLEY: If these assets are more certificates of deposit than in federally insured institutions, as opposed to buying John Deere stock or something of that nature, what's the impact of that political decision to do that on these financial institutions?

ANDERSON: One of the problems that I believe that Chairman Greenspan raised, that we believe also is a problem, is that if the federal government goes into the realm of asset acquisition, there is a selectivity problem. By a selectivity problem, I mean by choosing a specific set of assets the federal government, with the massive amounts of money that it is talking about, would be pouring in money into one set of assets at the expense or at the favoring another.

That could have an impact on federally insured certificates of deposit, giving them a ready source of cash that they would not otherwise had unless the federal government took that action. Chairman Greenspan said that the result of this action could be a lower rate of return than could be expected if the free market were allowed to work. I think that is one of the concerns that the Congress should need to address before taking such action, and there are many others.

DOMENICI: Senator Gramm?

GRAMM: Mr. Anderson, I note with some shock, in picking up the budget projection you picked out, that for some reason in the last six months that government spending has jumped by $561 billion. Is that right?

ANDERSON: I believe that's correct.

GRAMM: Now, that's $561 billion in the last six months that we have added to the spending baseline of this country. Isn't that right?

ANDERSON: That is correct.

GRAMM: So if we did the same thing for the next 18 months, we would have spent more than the Bush tax cut. Is that not right?

ANDERSON: That math works.

GRAMM: In fact, if we did the same thing for the next six years, we would have spent the entire surplus. Is that not right?

ANDERSON: Correct.

GRAMM: I wonder where was all this caution. Where was all the caution then? When we added in six months $561 billion worth of new spending to the baseline of this country, where was this caution everybody's talking about? We're cautious when it comes to letting working people keep their money; we're not cautious when it comes to spending it.

Now, are you any more uncertain about the projections in this budget than you've ever been in any budget that you ever participated in making?

ANDERSON: No.

(CROSSTALK)

GRAMM: So in reality, that chart is no different than the charts that the Congressional Budget Office has put before this committee since the beginning of CBO, except where you have that dark shaded area they would normally put a dotted line, right?

ANDERSON: I believe that is a correct determination.

GRAMM: Now, given where that dark area is for 2002, we're talking about maybe 0.4. If I offered you a bet where you would say it'd be 0.4 and I'd say it'd be zero, and the person that was closest won, would you take that bet? Now, if you were a betting man. You're probably not a betting man.

ANDERSON: Not a betting man.

GRAMM: Your wife may be watching or your momma. But if you were a betting man...

ANDERSON: My children.

GRAMM: ... you'd take that bet, wouldn't you?

ANDERSON: No odds, right, Senator?

GRAMM: No odds.

ANDERSON: You got it.

GRAMM: Now, so what you're really saying is that, in the words of statisticians, the shading is actually a distribution curve, and what you're saying is that, based on your estimates, you estimate that there's a fairly high probability that the actual number will fall somewhere in that dark shaded area, but there is some very small probability that it will fall in the very light area or actually outside the shaded area. Is that not right?

ANDERSON: Exactly.

GRAMM: So when everybody's saying, "Well, you know, look at this chart, we're uncertain," we're uncertain about everything in life.

ANDERSON: I'd like to point out one other aspect to, I think, address what you're saying. That is that, as the description of this chart, we put this chart together on the five-year projections that CBO has made over the past 20 years. In our uncertainty chapter, we look at a set of economic and technical projections in a pessimistic scenario. It did not produce results like this; it produced significantly better than the worst results in this.

In other words, there is no -- that we know right now -- plausible economic and technical projections that could reach this line. That's not to say, however, given your introductory statements in particular, that Congress and the president couldn't come up with policy decisions that not only have surpluses declining into deficits of this level, but far beyond it. We are not really trying to make and we don't make forecasts or projections of what the policy actions...

GRAMM: Yes, getting down to that lightest shade would be like betting that Baylor University's going to win the national championship in football next year, or Rice. They may, but you wouldn't make a living betting on it every year.

Well, Mr. Chairman, the point I wanted to make was is, all this talk about uncertainty basically is misplaced because all that CBO has done is give a very clever visual representation of something that's always been there, it's just their chart-maker was not as clever in the past as they are in the present, and so they always put a dotted line, but no greater uncertainty than before and no higher probability that bad things would happen above the norm than there are that good things would happen below the norm.

You agree with that, don't you, Mr. Anderson?

ANDERSON: I agree.

GRAMM: Now, let me go back to your economic forecast. Am I not right that on your economic forecast you're consistently over the next 10 years at or below the blue-chip forecast for real GDP growth?

ANDERSON: That is correct.

GRAMM: So that the people who are out there who are making money by selling their projections are more optimistic or are taking a more optimistic position than you are, right?

ANDERSON: That is correct. And it is very important to us. When we do our economic assumptions, we talk to our panel of economic advisers and we compare our economic assumptions and follow very closely what other forecasters are doing. We are not out to lead the pack here.

GRAMM: Now, let me finally turn -- Senator Byrd mentioned, and I think Senator Clinton amplified it, the idea of a rainy day fund.

GRAMM: Now, had we set out in our budget the goal of not spending more than $250 billion over the last six months, more than we were spending before in a 10-year projection, and we had set that out as a goal, or even if we had earmarked funds in this trust fund, so to speak, would that have had any impact on the spending of the $561 billion we actually spent, unless there was some kind of mechanism to cut the excess spending?

ANDERSON: If we had spent only $250 as opposed to $561, that obviously would have increased our numbers from $5.6.

GRAMM: But the point is, if we had set up a, quote, "lockbox" or a set aside fund or rainy day fund, if we spent the $561 billion, you could claim money was in there, but the $561 billion would have been spent." Right?

ANDERSON: I agree.

GRAMM: Well, Mr. Chairman, let me just sum up the points that I've tried to make here. First of all, in the last six months, we have added enough spending to fund over a third of the president's tax cut by CBO's estimates. That's in six months. And that's not assuming now that that spending is going to keep growing like it grew. You're assuming it's going to stop growing and simply expand at something like CPI, right?

ANDERSON: Most of that is discretionary and most of that is projected, assuming growth in CPI.

GRAMM: In fact, if it grew at the rate it has in the last three years, we'd probably be over $1.8 trillion or something like that.

ANDERSON: Yes.

GRAMM: So the first point is that with our talk about being cautious, and I think we should always be cautious, the truth is we have not been cautious and we have added $561 billion to permanent spending in six months, which is an extraordinary figure, seems to me.

Secondly, despite the new graph-maker, you're no more uncertain about these estimates than any estimates you've every done.

ANDERSON: I am as certain about these estimates as any estimates I've ever done.

GRAMM: And the closer you get to the midpoint of that little funnel, the more certain you are.

ANDERSON: Correct.

GRAMM: So that you wouldn't take an even bet that it was going to be way down at the edge as compared to in the middle?

ANDERSON: Definitely.

GRAMM: And finally, as we look at the overall picture of where we are, it seems to me that you've got -- well, I've run out of time, I'll stop.

DOMENICI: Do you want to finish?

GRAMM: Well, I'll just say there are two trends that are just obvious from your budget report. One, spending is growing very, very rapidly, when in six months you can add $561 billion to spending. That's pretty substantial.

But secondly, in this period where the economy has been slowing down, remarkably enough, we've added another $800 billion of revenues, which continues to say what a remarkable thing this economic expansion is.

DOMENICI: Thank you very much, Senator.

It's getting close to 1:00. We only have a few of us left. I wonder if we could agree on how much longer we're going to keep the witness. I want to have five minutes or less.

(CROSSTALK)

DOMENICI: Let me just state a situation that is personal to me. I've been on this committee since its inception. The rules make it such that I can stay on, but I won't be chairman pretty soon, which is a wonderful thing to happen with these kind of surpluses, a great, great achievement.

BYRD: Why is that? Why can't you stay on?

DOMENICI: We have Republican Senate rules.

(CROSSTALK)

BYRD: That's not a very good rule.

(LAUGHTER)

DOMENICI: Let me ask a few questions. There are some who are concerned about long-term estimating, but might I ask, when we talk about Social Security's problems in the future, aren't we estimating 10, 15, 20 and even 30 years out in order to arrive at conclusions with reference to it's insolvency or solvency?

ANDERSON: Yes, and even further than that.

DOMENICI: And even further than that.

And when everybody up here says, "Let's save Social Security and do these kind of things," we're relying upon those kind of estimates. Right?

ANDERSON: Correct.

DOMENICI: Now, we do the same for Medicare. It's not two years, three years, but it's a number of years. In fact, we know about insolvency right now for at least 10 years and we're using estimates. Right?

ANDERSON: Correct.

DOMENICI: OK. All the time I've been on here, when we had deficits, they were estimates, weren't they? Weren't they the same kind of estimates by CBO and everyone else with reference to the deficit over a number of years, as you are doing today and it shows up as a surplus?

ANDERSON: The same type of methodology produced a deficit answer as opposed to a surplus one.

DOMENICI: And I assume, I wasn't the only one around, but we were acting upon those deficits and trying to do something about them, because we believed that they were the best we could and we ought to rely upon them.

ANDERSON: They certainly were.

DOMENICI: Now, might I ask in spite of all the discussion about uncertainty, Mr. Anderson, in making these estimates, which we all acknowledge as estimates, we don't produce budget resolutions based upon ranges or estimates, we produce them on specific dollar amounts. Is that correct?

ANDERSON: Correct.

DOMENICI: And, Mr. Anderson, what is your estimate today of the surplus for this year, 2001?

ANDERSON: What is...

DOMENICI: $281.

ANDERSON: Thank you, $281 billion.

DOMENICI: OK.

ANDERSON: It is not only today, but that stream that we have prevented. It is that point estimate, despite all the discussion of uncertainty around the point.

DOMENICI: And what is your estimate today of the surplus for the budget year 2002? I'll give you that also; it's $313 billion.

ANDERSON: Thank you.

(LAUGHTER)

ANDERSON: $313.

DOMENICI: Now, Mr. Deputy CBO Director, you come before us with confidence in those numbers, as confident as your staff and the best estimating techniques around applied to you and here in your testimony, these are the best you can do and you give them to us so we can rely upon them, don't you?

ANDERSON: Correct.

DOMENICI: Now, what is your estimate today of the surplus for the next 10 years?

ANDERSON: $5,610 trillion.

DOMENICI: And you come to us today using the best techniques in terms of growth and the like, and you give us these because they are your best and you expect us to rely upon them as we have in the past?

ANDERSON: If we thought another number was better, we would have given it to you.

DOMENICI: Thank you very much.

Now, let me ask, in addition, to arrive at this $5.6 trillion surplus, you have taken into account certain expenditures which you did not bring here and show us. But I wonder if you could, for the record, start the chart, that at the bottom leaves you $5.6 trillion. And tell us how it got there, using expenditures and what kind of estimates you made with reference to them, and what kind of projects and programs were included, not included. Can you do that for us in general numbers?

ANDERSON: Sure.

DOMENICI: I think that would be helpful to everybody.

Now, my closing remarks are not aimed at anyone, but just to get something off my back here in public, so to speak.

You know, it is amazing -- it is amazing -- when we for the first time have a gigantic surplus all kinds and manner of excuses as to why we shouldn't give some of it back to the American people all of a sudden show up, including the vagaries of estimating. You don't rely upon those vagaries you reduce them to estimates, but now we can't have a tax cut because of that kind of vagary that is here called an uncertainty. We do that, we use these kind of estimates, to expend money on. We use these kind of estimates to indicate that we have a surplus that's growing. But then to use it to show that a tax cut is right for the American people, every manner and idea that one can dream up as to why we shouldn't do it comes here to this committee and to the Congress.

I want to conclude by saying I am absolutely positive that the surpluses that you are estimating for us are as good as any estimates we've received when we were in deficit, and we ought to use them. And that means that the American people can get tax relief and we can take care of our problems based upon the best estimating we can get.

The latter statement is my own, but I believe in the end that will be the debate. Do we want to do more speculating or do we want to use your numbers? And if that's the case, can we not give some of this money back to the people?

Now, I yield.

CONRAD: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Anderson, what was your estimate of the 10 year surplus last year?

ANDERSON: $4.6 trillion.

CONRAD: Earlier in the year what was it, in January?

ANDERSON: In January of '99?

CONRAD: Yes.

ANDERSON: I've forgotten now.

CONRAD: Does $3.2 trillion sound correct?

ANDERSON: Right.

CONRAD: Were you as certain then as you are now?

ANDERSON: Exactly.

CONRAD: So there you have it. Last year, the surplus forecast for 10 years was $3.2 trillion. This year, it's $5.6 trillion. And they were as certain of that forecast last year, as they are of this forecast this year. I simply make the point, not to be critical, but to point out the hard fact is, there is substantial uncertainty. You've put in your report, and I quote, "If CBO's track record is any guide, both the optimistic and the pessimistic scenarios lie well within the range of uncertainty of the budget projections." Is that correct?

ANDERSON: That's correct.

CONRAD: So the hard reality here, folks, is this is a 10-year forecast that has substantial uncertainty attached to it.

Let's go to the question of spending that Mr. Gramm has made. Let me ask you this question. Has spending of the federal government as a share of our national income gone up or gone down?

ANDERSON: Down.

CONRAD: Gone down -- correct answer.

(LAUGHTER)

As we can see from 1992 until 2001, the fiscal year we're in now, the share of national income going to federal spending has gone down consistently. We've gone from 22.2 percent of our national income going to federal programs and federal expenditures, to 18 percent in 2001. And in fact, from 2000 to 2001, federal spending as a share of our national income has not gone up, it's gone down. Would that be correct?

ANDERSON: Correct.

CONRAD: Second question, what percentage of the surplus that we had last year went to debt reduction?

ANDERSON: The vast majority of it, I thought.

CONRAD: The vast majority of it. Very good point. Here are the facts. Last year, of the projected surplus and the actual surplus, 90 percent of it went to debt reduction, not to spending, went to debt reduction. Would that be correct?

ANDERSON: That's correct.

CONRAD: Finally, the chairman of the committee talks about the deficits being projections. Deficits that we've experienced over the last decade were not projections; they were real. They were actual deficits.

Now let me ask you this final question. You're projecting over 10 years a $5.6 trillion surplus. As I understand it, $2.5 trillion is Social Security, is that correct?

ANDERSON: Correct.

CONRAD: $400 billion is Medicare, is that correct?

ANDERSON: Correct.

CONRAD: $500 billion is other trust fund surpluses, is that correct?

ANDERSON: I believe so, yes.

CONRAD: So the amount of projected surplus over the next 10 years that is not in trust funds is $2.2 trillion, would that be correct?

ANDERSON: Correct.

CONRAD: Well, I thank you, Mr. Anderson. I thank you for your testimony, and I thank you for the assistance that you've been to this committee. I think the bottom line for me is, this is a 10-year forecast. Undeniably, there is substantial uncertainty attached to it. You've testified to that fact. Of the $5.6 trillion forecasted surplus over the next 10 years, $3.4 trillion of it is from trust funds. My own view is, we shouldn't raid trust funds for spending, for tax cuts, for any other purpose. Those trust funds ought to be held inviolate. And that leaves us with $2.2 trillion, and we can't be absolutely confident of that.

I would say that President Bush's plan for a $1.6 trillion tax cut, combined with the interest costs associated with it of about $400 billion, and the $200 billion we'll need for AMT reform, especially given his tax plan, is just imprudent. It's imprudent to use all of the non-trust fund surpluses for a tax cut. It would be much more prudent to use part of it for a tax cut, part of it for these high priority domestic needs, which he has identified and others have as well, and part of it to deal with our long-term debt condition as well as a hedge against these projections being wrong.

When I talked about roughly equal thirds, $900 billion for each third, that includes the deficit or the interest costs, the associated interest costs. That would leave one with a net tax reduction of about $750 billion. I think it's critically important that people remember any time we cut taxes, or increase spending, that adds to the interest costs. Is that correct, Mr. Anderson?

ANDERSON: Correct.

CONRAD: That's an important thing for us to keep in mind as we go forward. The interest costs associated either with spending or with tax cut.

Let me conclude on this note, and we'll recognize Senator Byrd.

My greatest concern -- my greatest concern -- and it has been dramatically heightened ever since the Greenspan testimony, is that we will abandon fiscal discipline around here, and that we will spend money and we'll have massive tax cuts and we'll wind up back in the deficit ditch we just climbed out of. That would be the worst outcome for the American people. And we ought to be cautious, and we ought to be conservative. And we ought to make sure, yes, to have a tax cut, but also to recognize the hard reality: These are 10-year forecasts. They could be off by dramatic amounts.

CONRAD: And so we shouldn't put all of our eggs in the tax cut basket. We should reserve some of the money for these high priority domestic needs in health and education and defense, but we should also make sure that we are looking ahead to these large fiscal imbalances that are just down the road, which you've warned us here today.

Senator Byrd?

BYRD: Mr. Chairman, what I was going to have to say had to do with expenditures. Since there have been several references to expenditures, being the ranking member on appropriations where we spend money, I was going -- I had a few things to say, but most of the audience around the table has departed. I think you made my statement. I won't repeat it; you made it much better.

But I wanted to point out that, as a percentage of GDP spending in FY 2001, I think you pointed out was about 18 percent. That's the lowest since the mid-'60s, and I was here in the mid-'60s and before.

ANDERSON: That's the chart that makes your point, Senator, that the fact is federal spending is measured against our national income has gone down dramatically ever since 1992.

BYRD: Yes.

ANDERSON: And we're now at the lowest level since back in the 1960s.

BYRD: Exactly. Thank you.

Mr. Chairman, I thank you.

And I thank you, Mr. Anderson.

CONRAD: Thank you, Mr. Anderson.

END

U.S. SENATOR PETE DOMENICI (R-NM) HOLDS HEARING ON THE LONG-TERM BUDGET OUTLOOK, 2/6/2001

CLINTON: I thank you very much, Mr. Walker, and I appreciate what Senator Nelson just said, and I got the notes from what Senator Byrd and Senator Conrad had said. And I'm very grateful that you've raised a lot of the hard issues that should be taken into account as we make these decisions. You know, it seems to me that we've got some real differences, as Bill said, Senator Nelson said, between that line that goes between our chairman and our ranking member.

And I start with the differences we seem to have on arithmetic. You know, it is very difficult to get the numbers to add up from what is being proposed in terms of the additional obligations. And you point out in your testimony that the baseline projections assume the expiration of about 20 existing tax credits, most of which, based on what I've heard, including the research experimentation tax credit, are going to be routinely extended once again.

The baseline projections also assume no change in the alternative minimum tax, which if we do nothing is going to affect an increasing number of middle class taxpayers, which therefore means we will do something, because we'll have to do something. We don't have population growth factored into any of the projections about increasing spending, which means, therefore, that although inflation may have been taken into effect, we're still going to have decreasing numbers of people eligible for certain discretionary programs.

I guess I would just have to ask your opinion, Mr. Walker, how you would advise us to begin constructing a tax cut before there's some common ground as to what the real costs are with respect to expiring provisions, investments, demographic changes, and the like?

WALKER: Well, first, Senator Clinton, I was a trustee of Social Security and Medicare for five years, from 1990 to 1995. And in that I had to project for 75 years, along with my co-trustees, which was more of an art than a science, as you can imagine, a lot more inherently uncertain than going 10 years. I believe you need a baseline to go from. And basically what you're doing is you're basically assuming current law, which is what the Social Security and Medicare trustees assume. They assume current law. But we need to recognize that there are inherent limitations, that by assuming current law, in some cases, that has varied from practice.

Past practice has been that many expiring tax provisions are extended, and you point out demographics and things of that nature. That, I think -- that information has to be used to help inform you to determine what's the right balance, what's the right balance between tax cuts, spending increases, debt reduction? What, if any, impact does that have on your judgment as to how much of any of these actions should be contingent upon actual future events? Each of you get elected; I don't. So my job is basically to try help give you the facts, give you the results of what we've done in other countries and what we've done with regard to other states, and to try to help you make those tough political choices.

CLINTON: But you would agree that some of the factors that we just discussed should be certainly taken into account as we look at making those tough political choices.

WALKER: You should take those into account as to the relative degree of risk, or the relative degree of certainty. Now, in fairness, the projections have been going up. They've been getting better. And in reality, we've got kind of the opposite of what we have in Social Security and Medicare. By that I mean, as you know, in Social Security and Medicare, every year that goes by, you get rid of a good year and you add a bad year. This is the opposite, at least for right now. For every year that goes by, we're adding a bigger surplus until we hit the wave, and when we hit the wave, it can swamp us if we're not careful.

CLINTON: Well, that's, I guess, what concerns me. We've seen surpluses going up but for a relatively short period of time compared to the 10 years we're looking out at. The numbers have increased dramatically just in six months, but there's no guarantee that the probabilities are that they will always keep increasing. And it strikes me as short sided for us not to take into account some of our long-term challenges, some of which you mentioned with respect to entitlement programs, but I think there are other investments that our country should be looking at.

And if you look at the baseline controversy that we seem to have and try to consider whether we're ever going to agree on what the real numbers in the tax cut might be, you overlay with probability issues as to the uncertainty of these projections continuing to increase, and you put it into the context of long-term national needs that I think have to be addressed. We're dealing with just a lot of uncertainty at this point.

And part of my question is, what's the hurry? I think the responsible thing to do is for us to be sure that we're making the decisions that are best for the country, and I don't think that we have adequate information or experience yet on which to base those decisions.

DOMENICI: Are you finished, Senator?

CLINTON: Yes.

U.S. SENATOR PETE DOMENICI (R-NM) HOLDS HEARING ON THE BUDGET AND TAXES, 2/13/2001

CLINTON: Thank you. And thank you, Mr. Chairman, for your courtesy in letting us continue with our questions. I appreciate that very much. I just want to identify myself with Senator Byrd's remarks, but add just one additional concern that I have and I believe others do, as well.

In addition to my concern about the uncertainties of the projected surpluses, my concern about continuing debt reduction and my concern about Social Security and Medicare, I'm also concerned about other essential government programs that I believe we should continue to invest in for the good of our citizens.

And I would like to ask that an article that appeared in the New York Times yesterday be entered into the record. The title is "Some fault Bush tax cuts were lean days in Texas." And the point of this article is that one very essential program, Medicaid, which we rely on certainly in New York to try to provide health care for our poor people and people who are working, but not making enough money to be able to afford care and still eligible for Medicaid, is under serious attack from potential budgetary shortfalls in the state of Texas.

And let me just quote just a few points from this article because I think there's a salutary lesson here. "The growing cost of health care for the poor, largely Medicaid, is the biggest budget problem. Projections show that an additional $650 million is needed just so that Medicaid and other health care services will be financed for the current fiscal year, which ends on October 31."

The article goes on to say that the question now is whether the Medicaid costs will prevent lawmakers from expanding the program. Texas already has 1.5 million uninsured children. I think Texas has among the highest number and percentage of uninsured children in the entire country, including an estimate 600,000, who are eligible for Medicaid, but are not enrolled.

And then, this last paragraph seems to be a point that all of us should take to heart. After a legislative hearing last week on the rising Medicaid costs, state senator, Chris Harris, a Republican from Arlington, criticized the tax cut. Quote, "We made tax cuts because we thought we had this huge surplus," he said, according the Associated Press. "I might have voted a little differently on all those tax cuts, had I realized that we were only funding 23 months of these programs," unquote.

Now, I appreciate greatly the difference in opinions among experts such as our four distinguished panelists. But I believe that those of us who are on the Budget Committee have to be guided by experience, as well as projection.

And it is certainly our experience, going back 20 years to the tax cuts enacted under President Reagan and it is certainly our experience in looking at the state, not just Texas, but other states that are now facing budget shortfalls because they miscalculated their projected surpluses or they spent their projected surpluses in combinations of returning those surpluses as tax cuts or spending that we have to be more cautious and more prudent based on experience.

And I appreciate greatly suggestion or ideas from experts. But I think, at the end of the day, we have to be guided by what we think the real world is and how it works. And I guess I would just be really upset with myself if we found ourselves in a position in a year from now similar to what the gentleman from Texas I just quoted found himself in, having passed large tax cuts that made it impossible, not only for us to pay down the debt and protect Social Security and Medicare, but take care of some of the fundamental needs of the American people.

So, from my perspective, I think that the back and forth and the discussions about uncertainty just are not only yellow caution lights, but big red flags about what we need to be concerned about.

Let me just ask the panelists, and maybe you can just give me a yes or no answer. If you believed that the charts that our ranking member held up were accurate, that the real cost of President Bush's tax cut is the total spending of the non-Social Security, non-Medicare trust fund surplus, would you still favor this tax cut?

(UNKNOWN): I can start. I don't favor now and I certainly wouldn't favor it then.

CLINTON: Mr. Hassett?

HASSETT: Yes, I would.

CLINTON: You would still favor the tax cut, even if it used all of the surplus?

HASSETT: I would because those estimates of the surplus don't allow for any economic impacts at the lower marginal rates. They don't allow for any stimulus from putting in people's pockets in the near term. And I think that those assumptions, I understand why they're there for scoring purposes, they're unreasonable. So, I want to help the folks that you're talking about. And I believe that the best chance to make sure that the economy is there for them is to not have a really, really tight fiscal policy as we're entering a recession grasp.

(UNKNOWN): Two points, Senator Clinton. Number one, I can't think of any other context in any other aspect of life where somebody would say what is my full 10-year disposal income, et cetera, and commit it all 10 years earlier, not knowing the uncertainties of life.

(UNKNOWN): I can't think of anybody encouraging their child to budget that way, their family to budget that way, their school, their company. Nobody would encourage them to do this. There's almost like a sprint, a rush to get rid of this money in a way that is contrary, not only to the hypothetical company Senator Conrad mentioned, but it's almost any other endeavor.

Secondly, there are huge costs to be borne to solve Medicare and Social Security. If we give away this money now in a consumption- oriented tax cut, those costs will have to be borne later. And I suggest they will be borne in ways that will be much more painful to the average American and that we will deeply regret later on when people are doing Social Security and Medicare, that we gave up this surplus in such a hurry for a consumption-oriented tax cut going significantly to very well off people.

(UNKNOWN): I think making a decision like that is a difficult problem. And since I don't think the assumption is correct, it's too hard a question. I think that if we take Senator Conrad's number, $2.2 trillion funds available, I think the cost of the proposed tax cut, not the one that people can imagine, but the proposed tax cut is substantially less than the $1.6 trillion the cost of the response the taxpayers will have to it. Even including the interest costs associated with it, we're probably talking about $1.5 trillion over 10 years.

So, relative to the $2.2 trillion that's Senator Conrad's number, that leaves about $700 billion. And I think that the forecasts that the CBO has put forward are, as they say, quite conservative. They use a 3.1 percent growth rate. (inaudible) to outside the Beltway and not part of this political forecasting process estimates that the potential GDP growth for the U.S. economy will be 4 percent. So, substantially larger budget surpluses strike me as more likely than smaller ones. So, I don't think that we are forced to make that tough, would you spend your last nickel question because I think there are going to be a lot of nickels left.

CLINTON: Well, I guess that is the half full or half empty glass that we're trying to decide on.

And, in closing, Mr. Chairman, I just wanted publicly to thank Gene Sperling for his eight tireless, and I underline tireless, years of work on behalf of not only the prior administration, but our country, and his commitment to fiscal responsibility that was really a hallmark of his tenure in the White House. And, you know, I, as an admirer of his incredible commitment, just want to publicly thank him for that.

GRASSLEY: Thank you, Senator Clinton.

Senator Sarbanes?

SARBANES: Well, thank you, Mr. Chairman. I'd like to echo Senator Clinton's comments about Gene Sperling and his extraordinary contributions. We all know how hard he worked. I think this is the first time I've seen him in years when he didn't look close to exhaustion.

CLINTON: Yes, me too.

"The Point with Greta Van Susteren," CNN, 2/15/2001

DAVID MATTINGLY, CNN CORRESPONDENT (voice-over): As the first, first lady to become a member of Congress, the swearing in of U.S. Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton was the beginning of life in a national spotlight unusual for a freshman senator. And so far, the spotlight has burned brightly: national media recording her every move -- promoting health care, shaking hands with Alan Greenspan, even reading a post-Super Bowl poem.

H. CLINTON: And it was in the bleak December...

MATTINGLY: But where other newly elected officials might enjoy a period of post-election celebration, a political honeymoon some call it, Senator Clinton could not.

DUFFY: When the Clintons left the White House, I think some very bad judgment calls were made, and frankly, I think it's hurting President Clinton, former President Clinton, much more than it's hurting Senator Clinton, but it is still in the news every day.

MATTINGLY: First there were questions about possible Senate ethics violations and her $8 million book deal. Most of the money went to charity, and Senator Clinton was formally cleared by a Senate committee this week. But then came the White House gifts, $190,000 worth of presents from supporters. And then the biggest problem: When President Clinton issued a controversial 11th-hour pardon to billionaire fugitive Marc Rich.

Rich's ex-wife Denise Rich was a key fund-raiser for both of the Clintons. The former Mrs. Rich had also given them $7,300 worth of furniture for their New York home. Critics want to know if the gifts to the Clintons played a role in Marc Rich's pardon.

DUFFY: One of the things that's so striking about all of this is that not very many people are defending the Clintons right now, particularly Democrats. The Democrats who defended them every day for eight years are just not doing it anymore.

MATTINGLY: With a congressional investigation looming, what followed for the senator was a wave of damage control. Some of the items the Clintons said they thought were personal gifts, in fact, were gifts to the White House and were supposed to stay there.

H. CLINTON: I can only say that all the gifts were appropriately dealt with, and if you have specific questions about any of them, my staff can give you all the details. MATTINGLY (on camera): Last week, the Clintons returned 19 pieces of furniture and decorations. The will also reimburse gift-givers to the tune of $86,000. This is all for presents they received during the last year of the Clinton White House.

HANK SHEINKOPF, POLITICAL CONSULTANT: The only mistake was waiting a while before coming up with an appropriate response. Her response calling, saying that this was a bookkeeping error, frankly, washes well. And her husband's move of his office to Harlem, frankly, tramples on the story. It makes it much smaller than it was.

MATTINGLY (voice-over): Critics complained that the ex-president's proposed Manhattan office space was too expensive. He then found a new location in Harlem, instantly winning the senator's approval.

BILL CLINTON: I called Hillary, and I asked my senator first how she would feel about me coming to Harlem, and she loved it.

MATTINGLY: But even this new office space had a downside. It's currently used by a city agency. Negotiations are needed to find the agency a new home.

MAYOR RUDY GIULIANI (R), NEW YORK: I think idea of moving up to Harlem is a good one. I think it would be -- obviously, the way it's been received in the neighborhood appears to be very -- very supportive. We don't want to stand in the way of that. At the same time, we don't want the needs and the concerns of the Administration for Children Services brushed aside either.

DUFFY: While certainly President Clinton, you know, made some decisions on his own about pardons and office space, you know, Senator Clinton made -- was party to a few of them herself. I mean, her book deal was all her decision. The gift issue and the furniture issue, she played a part in that. So they both share, and I'm not sure that either of them were thinking about her political future at that point.

H. CLINTON: Senate is conducting morning business.

MATTINGLY: And what does her political future hold? Will the spotlight on Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton continue to be dimmed by lingering shadows of the Bill Clinton presidency? Will she be able to deliver on campaign promises to her home-state constituents and keep the Clinton political legacy alive?

David Mattingly, CNN.

U.S. SENATOR JAMES JEFFORDS (R-VT) HOLDS HEARING ON PRESIDENT BUSH'S EDUCATION PLAN, 2/15/2001

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And I wanted to thank you, Secretary Paige for your testimony today and the previous times that you've been willing to meet with members of this committee to discuss our mutual concerns about improving education.

I think that you've heard a number of issues that are of deep, deep concern to many of the members on this committee. And I will certainly look forward to working with you as we try to hammer out answers to a lot of these questions and put some real meat on the bones of the framework that the president is presenting.

But I think the overall concern that many of us have is the timing and the process that we're facing. You know, it's very difficult to discharge our responsibilities to our constituents, and particularly to our children, if we're being asked to consider very important decisions without adequate information.

CLINTON: And I know that you understand that and that you will work with us to provide that information, not only the substantive answers to questions about how the legislation would be drafted and implemented, but also the budgetary questions that we are all concerned with.

I had just a series of concerns that I would like to get answers back and certainly share them with the committee as well.

You know, under Title I, nearly 9,000 schools were identified in need of improvement through the Title I accountability system. Others were, obviously, identified as needing improvement through other accountability systems. But only about 40 percent of those identified did receive any help to improve, and less than half of the schools get any additional help to provide their teachers with the professional development or access to the kind of research-based reforms that I think you favor.

So I would like additional information about we're not only going to be identifying such schools, but also providing them with the resources that are needed.

Secondly, we've heard quite a bit of discussion about the accountability system and I appreciate Senator Warner specific questions about his state. I have comparable concerns. New York has spent a considerable amount of money and effort devising very good tests that are research-based, that are being implemented over time. We will need to know specifically how what we've already done will fit into President Bush's plan. What kind of additional resources we would be able to call upon in order to continue what we've already started or certainly if we're then going to be asked to add something layered on to what we've done, where the dollars would come for doing that.

And so that's a very specific issue that I join my colleague from Virginia in asking you to help us understand how the plan would work.

Thirdly, as you stated in response to some questions, we do have research that smaller class size in general is better -- that if we get the class sizes down. Many of us fought very hard over the last eight years to try to get a stream of funding that would help us add additional teachers and lower class size based on the research that was available, starting with the Star (ph) research in Kentucky. And we are concerned that if those dollars are not continued or other dollars substituted, this initiative to try to drive down class size will be derailed and the positive results we're seeing will not be realized.

And that leads me to another concern. It's very hard in many of our states to find spaces to lower class size. We all know that is we can lower those class sizes and provide qualified teachers to teach, that's the magic of the combination that we're looking for. Without some support for school construction, repair and modernization, it will be very difficult to realize these ends.

And I know this is outside the ESEA, but it is integral to our consideration of what it is we're hoping to achieve by accountability measures.

Now the GAO says we have $127 billion in school construction needs. The American Society of Civil Engineers puts the figure at $172 billion. And, of course, in its 1998 report card for America's infrastructure, the American Society of Civil Engineers graded all of our infrastructure needs, gave our schools a failing grade of F, pointing out that one-third of all schools need extensive repair or replacement; that we need to try to make our schools more able to use the technology that Senator Mikulski and others are so much an advocate of.

Without some help from the federal government on the issue of school construction, repair and modernization, many of these plans that you are promoting, that many of us support on this panel, will not come to fruition. Is it your understanding that there will be or will not be any funding in President Bush's budget for school modernization, repair and construction?

PAIGE: At this moment, it's going to be difficult for me to be emphatic about the exact details of the budget. I really don't have that information and am unable to give it to you. But as soon as that information is available, I would be able to provide it.

CLINTON: I would certainly appreciate that, Mr. Secretary, because I too applaud and respect your deep commitment to children. You are sitting in this chair because you are someone who has loved and cared for children, oftentimes children that others had given up on and left behind.

I have absolute confidence in your intention and your good faith. My questions go, however, to the system in which you now find yourself operating. You know, just as schools have bureaucracy they have to deal with, I know that the federal government, from my own experience, has a lot of bureaucracy to deal with, and the budget process is the real key to how we will function.

And so I would hope that, in your discussions with your colleagues in the administration, you will convey the depth of our concerns, our willingness to be partners and our desire to have information that will enable us to make good decisions.

Thank you .

PAIGE: Thank you .

JEFFORDS: Well, thank you, Mr. Secretary. I must say that you have been most thoughtful and sincere and honest; I think among the best of witnesses I've ever had before this committee.

PAIGE: Well, thank you.

JEFFORDS: And I believe you are going to represent the president in a very wonderful and thoughtful way and be most successful.

PAIGE: Thank you.

JEFFORDS: Thank you for coming.

PAIGE: Thank you so much.

JEFFORDS: It's over.

"CNN Live Event/Special," CNN, 2/22/2001

LOU WATERS, CNN ANCHOR: All right, we are watching the Rotunda in Washington, where Hillary Rodham Clinton is expected any moment now to make some statement regarding the latest revelations concerning the pardons in the last days of the Clinton administration.

Some of which she said she had no knowledge of, took no part in. But her brother, Hugh Rodham, apparently is involved in the latest revelations of two men pardoned by the president. Hugh Rodham getting almost $400,000 for his services, his legal fees. Hugh Rodham is an attorney. Bruce Lindsey was the liaison between the pardon and Hugh Rodham at the White House.

And who knew what, about what, is the subject of many inquiries going on today. Not only from reporters, but from members of the House Government Reform Committee, Senator Burton's committee, and also the Senate Judiciary Committee, which is looking into matters of money and Had there any been any quid pro quo regarding any of these pardons that we are hearing more and more about.

Here's Hillary Rodham Clinton.

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: I understand you have a few questions for me that you might want to ask. Who wants to start?

(CROSSTALK)

QUESTION: ... your brother and the pardon and clemency petition, first? And secondly, do you think your husband handled these pardons appropriately?

CLINTON: Well, I was very disappointed and saddened by this whole matter. You know, it came as a surprise to me, and it was very disturbing. And I'm just very disappointed about it.

With respect to any questions about the pardons or the president's handling of the pardons, you'll have to ask him or his staff about that.

QUESTION: Did you speak in favor of any pardon request, clemency request, with your husband? And if so, which ones?

CLINTON: You know, I did not have any involvement in the pardons that were granted or not granted, you know, and I'm just very disappointed about my brother's involvement.

QUESTION: Senator, did you speak to anyone at all about any of the pardons?

CLINTON: Oh, you know, as I have said in the past, when it became apparent around Christmas that people knew that the president was considering pardons, there were many, many people who spoke to me or, you know, asked me to pass on information to the White House Counsel's Office. I've already said that I did that, and I did. There were many, many people who had an interest, a friend, a relative, but it was all passed on to the White House Counsel's Office, and they, along with the president, made the decisions.

QUESTION: What about Roger Clinton in specific: Did he ask for a pardon?

CLINTON: I don't know the answer to that.

QUESTION: Did he ask the president for a pardon?

CLINTON: I don't know the answer to that.

QUESTION: Why would anyone, Mrs. Clinton, contact your brother if they were not trying to get access to you or the president?

CLINTON: Well, you'll have to ask him. If I had known about this, we wouldn't be standing here today. I didn't know about it, and I'm very regretful that it occurred, that I didn't know about it. I might have been able to prevent this from happening. And I'm just very disappointed about the whole matter.

QUESTION: Are you disappointed that Bruce Lindsey didn't tell your husband that he apparently had been contacted by your brother?

CLINTON: You'll have to ask the people involved. I don't know anything other than what has now come out, and I did not learn about that until very recently.

QUESTION: What exactly did you not about? Did you not know that he was representing them? Did you not know about the money? And finally, what about your campaign treasurer, William Cunningham?

CLINTON: Right.

QUESTION: Should he also return the fee that he got regarding the two other pardons?

CLINTON: Well, let's separate these out. I did not know my brother was involved in any way in any of this. I learned that there were some press inquiries, of a vague nature, last week sometime. I did not know any specific information until late Monday night. I was actually in a movie theater, and I was called and told that my brother had been involved and had taken money for his involvement.

And as soon as I found out, I was very upset about it and very disappointed about it. My husband found out early the next morning, because he was traveling and not available until then to be told. And we immediately said that this money had to be returned, and it has been.

Now, with respect to Mr. Cunningham, I knew nothing about that. But I know that he is, you know, a fine lawyer and a fine man. And I had no knowledge that he was involved. But, you know, lawyers from all over the country were involved in these matters. That has happened in the past; that shouldn't be a surprise to anyone.

CLINTON: But you'll have to ask Mr. Cunningham about the details, but I didn't know anything about his involvement at all.

QUESTION: Do you think it's appropriate for...

QUESTION: What about Mr. Ickes?

(CROSSTALK)

QUESTION: It sounded like...

CLINTON: I did not know anything about that either.

QUESTION: Senator, do you think it will be appropriate and necessary for your husband to come before Congress and answer these questions, much like you're doing today?

CLINTON: Well, you'll have to ask him and his staff about that.

QUESTION: Senator, was your brother a guest at the White House for the final two weeks of your husband's administration?

CLINTON: He was a frequent guest at the White House. You know, he's my brother. I love my brother. I'm just extremely disappointed in this terrible misjudgment that he made.

QUESTION: But during the course of...

QUESTION: But are you upset that he took money or that he represented these people at all?

CLINTON: Both.

QUESTION: Have you spoken to him since?

CLINTON: No, I have not.

QUESTION: Senator, when you first heard the rumors, why didn't you just pick up the phone and ask him about it and express your opinion? And, secondly, what does it say about the moral climate fostered among the people closest to you that this kind of thing could happen and all the other controversies regarding the pardon?

CLINTON: Well, you know, I hear so many rumors all the time that, you know, I really -- you know, vague rumors don't mean anything to me anymore, after all of the years that I've been here. And as soon as I had anyone with solid information, I immediately acted. But at that point, I did not think it appropriate to call my brother, because I didn't want anyone asking what we talked about or putting either him or me in a very difficult position. So I have not talked with him.

CLINTON: As soon as we found out Monday night, I was heartbroken and shocked by it, and, you know, immediately said this was a terrible misjudgment and the money had to be returned. And that's what we worked on.

You know, this is a very sad matter to me, personally, and it was a surprise. But more than being surprising, it was extremely disappointing.

QUESTION: What did he say when you asked him to give the money back?

CLINTON: I did not ask him. I did not ask him directly. I have not talked...

(CROSSTALK)

CLINTON: No, I'm sorry you didn't hear me. My head was turned the other way. No, I did not talk to him. I have not spoken with him. I did not want to speak with him because, frankly, I didn't want anybody to draw any wrong conclusions about what I might or might not have said to him. So I have not spoken with him.

QUESTION: Well, the fact that you're so close, it seems sort of odd that you wouldn't...

CLINTON: Well, but I understand how these things are. And once I had solid information late Monday night, I did not think it was in his interest and certainly did not believe it was appropriate for me to speak with him. So I have not.

QUESTION: You reacted as a lawyer would react.

CLINTON: Well, I was reacting as someone who was extremely disappointed in this whole matter. This was a very sad occurrence to have happen. And I wanted to be sure that the money was returned, and it has been.

QUESTION: Do you feel he betrayed a trust? You said you were heartbroken. Were you disappointed with him personally, feeling he betrayed a trust?

CLINTON: Well, let me use my own words, and my own words are that I'm very disappointed, I'm very saddened, and I was very disturbed when I heard about it.

(CROSSTALK)

QUESTION: ... using their connections to you to have the president grant clemencies, commutations...

CLINTON: Well, it's very regrettable, and it shouldn't have happened. And if I'd had any knowledge or notice of it, I believe I might have been able to prevent it. I don't think we'd be standing here talking about it. But I did not.

QUESTION: But on the whole broad scheme of things...

CLINTON: Yes?

QUESTION: ... the number of people...

CLINTON: Well, you know, this will have to be put into a broader context. It's not for me to do that. You'll have to look at the broad context, compare it with, you know, past actions that have occurred around this constitutional power, and I'm just not going to comment on that.

QUESTION: Senator, you've had a kind of a rocky start as a senator. How do you put all this scandal behind you and move on as a senator in this light?

CLINTON: Well, you know, I'm very disappointed about what's gone on for the last weeks. It is certainly not how I would have preferred or planned to start my Senate career, and I regret deeply that there has been these kinds of matters occurring.

And all I can tell you is that I have gotten up every day and worked as hard as I can to be the best senator I can be, and that's what I intend to do. You know, I'm here today to meet with my staffs, both from New York and from Washington, about our legislative agenda.

CLINTON: We'll be rolling out our upstate economic plans next week. I've spent a lot of time in the last two weeks traveling around the state talking with people about what we intend to do.

I'm very much looking forward to President Bush's address to the Congress and his presentation of a budget and trying to figure out what the impact of that will be on New Yorkers.

So I have my hands full being a senator, learning the ropes, you know, working with my colleagues, dealing with my constituents, and I love doing it. I'm having a really good time doing it, but, of course, I'm disappointed and saddened that, you know, these matters are up.

QUESTION: What have you found out about your brother's involvement in these cases? How he became involved and what he did?

CLINTON: I have nothing to add to -- other than his public statement, which was made yesterday.

QUESTION: If the committees investigating the pardons on the House and Senate side wanted to talk to your brother, wanted him to become the committee, would you encourage him to do so?

CLINTON: He should fully cooperate with any and all inquiries by anyone about this matter.

QUESTION: Let me ask you, just in a broader context, people say, "With the Clintons, it's always something."

CLINTON: Have you noticed that?

(LAUGHTER)

QUESTION: Why is that?

CLINTON: I don't know. I wish I knew. Look, I think that we are apparently, you know, people who attract a lot of attention, and that's both good and bad. There's no doubt about that.

I think that, you know, the two terms that my husband had as president were good for this country. I think, even standing here today, he did a good job for America. And we had a lot of good, positive things happening.

CLINTON: Obviously, I wish that the last weeks had unfolded differently, and I'm very sorry that they have not.

But all I can say is now I've got a position and a responsibility that I'm going to do my very best to fulfill to the very best of my ability. And people will have to judge me at the end of my term based on what I do, and that's what I'm going to ask people to do.

(CROSSTALK)

QUESTION: The Democrats are all trying to put distance between themselves and both of you, really, and certainly, "the Clintons." Doesn't that make it difficult to defend anything he did over the last eight years?

CLINTON: No.

QUESTION: And hasn't it been difficult for the Democrats to rely on his accomplishments because of...

CLINTON: I don't think so. I mean, I really think that everything has to be put in context. And I know that that's often difficult to do, but I feel that our country is stronger and better because of the Clinton administration.

And yes, there have been difficulties, and there have been problems. And those have to be viewed, and people have to take responsibility for them and have to answer for them, which I certainly think we have done over the last eight years.

But I don't believe that, in the view of history, this administration will be judged lacking. I think, instead, there will be very many positive attributes and accomplishments that people will look to.

And I, for one, believe that much of the work that is still to be done in our country has to build on the progress and prosperity of the last eight years. I don't want to change direction. That's one reason why I'm, as the senator from New York, very anxious to see what the administration is going to be proposing on the budget. CLINTON: These are very big issues that will affect the quality of the lives of the people I represent. And, you know, I think we have a good framework for knowing how to keep the economy going and dealing with people's needs, and doing a lot of the other important work of keeping the crime rate down and improving education and health care. And I believe that this administration has shown us how to do that effectively. So I think, historically, you have to put everything in context, and I'm someone who believes that, overall, the accomplishments are ones that will stand the test of time and history.

QUESTION: Senator, did you have conversations with either Mr. Lindsey and/or...

QUESTION: Senator, what made you finally speak out today?

CLINTON: I'm sorry?

QUESTION: What made you finally speak out today? And what do you hope to accomplish by speaking out?

CLINTON: Well, you know, I found out about this, as I said, late Monday night, and, you know, it's 48 hours later, I guess. And I know that people have questions. I believe I have an obligation, as a public official, to answer those questions, and so this was my earliest opportunity to do that.

QUESTION: Senator, an interior decorating question for you? Today some tables, some furniture, was delivered to your house.

CLINTON: Right. Right.

QUESTION: Anything to do with Denise Rich?

CLINTON: No, my dear, nothing to do -- not at all.

QUESTION: Senator, did you ever have a discussion with your brother, notwithstanding his professional involvement, about pardons or commutations? And the same question as regarding Bruce Lindsey?

CLINTON: No, I did not. You know, I don't have any memory at all of ever talking to my brother about this. You know, that's my best memory.

But I have to say, and I will repeat once again, information was coming to me, information was passed on. So, you know, if I said information came, people wanted to look at, I might have said that. I just don't remember anything further than that.

(CROSSTALK)

QUESTION: That's not in conceivable your brother...

CLINTON: To the counsel's office.

QUESTION: So your brother may have spoken to someone who had spoken to you?

CLINTON: No, I mean, it was just passed on.

I'm sorry?

QUESTION: So your brother may have spoken to someone who then spoke to you.

CLINTON: No, not about any involvement of my brother. No, I want to make that 100 percent clear. I don't want you to try to put words in my mouth. I knew nothing about my brother's involvement in these pardons.

CLINTON: I knew nothing about his taking money for his involvement. I had no knowledge of that whatsoever.

(CROSSTALK)

QUESTION: Why specifically are you disappointed in your brother? What is wrong with him taking this role? And secondly, why are you not disappointed, or are you, in the treasurer of your campaign also representing...

CLINTON: Well, I think that, you know, you really have to draw a distinction, which I hope the press can do, between lawyers who are doing their job and going through, as I understand it, the ordinary course of business on these matters, and a family member. I think it's a very big difference.

And, you know, if he were, you know, Joe Smith from somewhere who had no connection with me, we wouldn't be standing here, would we? So I just think you have to see it in context. That's what I keep asking people to do, is put these things in context. And there's a very big, very big difference.

(CROSSTALK)

QUESTION: ... sometimes blame your political enemies for your troubles. Do you in any way blame them for this?

CLINTON: Not at all. Not at all.

QUESTION: Who do you blame?

CLINTON: You know, I mean, I've said that I think my brother made a terrible misjudgment.

QUESTION: Senator, the past few years, the Democrats, by and large, have really stood by you and your husband over everything that's happened. And for the first time we kind of see Democrats not standing by you and really coming out against the actions, both on the pardons and the gifts that you all received. Why do you think that is, and what do you think about that?

CLINTON: Well, you know, I can't speak for anybody else, and I'm not going to speculate on anybody's, you know, feelings or motivations. But, you know, I think it's understandable. And, you know, what I want to try to do is, you know, answer any questions anybody has for me and give you my, you know, best information and then let people make their own judgments.

QUESTION: Since Bruce Lindsey was key in negotiating all of these, many of the pardons, why don't you blame him for some of the fallout...

CLINTON: I don't blame anyone for this right now. You know, we don't need to be making judgments about this. I don't personally have any information. I think that it's regrettable that my brother was involved at all, and I'm very sorry that he was.

(CROSSTALK)

QUESTION: Did he ever speak to you about the pardons?

CLINTON: No, he did not.

QUESTION: Have you asked your husband what kind of contact they had?

CLINTON: You know, I never talk about conversations with my husband.

QUESTION: But this is a question that is being investigated. Have you sat down, at least -- even if you don't want to say what you talked about -- have you sat down with your husband and said, "What went on?"

CLINTON: You will have to ask the president and his staff any specific questions about any pardons that were or were not granted.

QUESTION: Senator, is Marc Rich among the people that he passed information on?

CLINTON: No. You know, I never knew about Marc Rich at all. You know, people would hand me envelopes, I would just pass them. You know, I would not have any reason to look into them. I knew nothing about the Marc Rich pardon until after it happened.

QUESTION: Had your brother warned at all to avoid this kind of thing after the episode with the hazelnuts?

CLINTON: I don't know the answer to that. I believe so, but I don't know the answer to that.

QUESTION: Senator, do you think your husband made a mistake in pardoning Marc Rich?

CLINTON: I know that other senators have commented on this, and I think you might understand why I'm not going to have any comment on any of the pardons, on the merits or demerits that might surround any of these pardons.

QUESTION: Some of your Democratic colleagues, Senator, suggested that your husband has become a distraction to the agenda for the Democrats. Do you think that your husband has begun to take a spotlight away from the Democratic agenda here on the Hill?

CLINTON: Well, I think that the Democratic agenda is the agenda that Democrats on the Hill set. It's clear to me that both the House Democrats and particularly the Senate Democrats, because of the 50-50 split, are the leaders of the Democratic agenda. And I think that's what people expect, and that's what we're going to try to deliver.

QUESTION: Just to clarify something: You don't think that there's anything inappropriate about what Mr. Cunningham did?

CLINTON: I don't know any facts. But I just must say that there's a very big difference between whatever he did and my brother being involved. And I know Mr. Cunningham is, you know, a fine person and a good lawyer. And I know lawyers prepare and process pardon applications.

CLINTON: So I'm not going to make any statement of any kind about something I know nothing about, other than to please ask you to make a distinction between a gentleman with, you know, Mr. Cunningham's background and experience and my brother who, you know, as a family member, should not have been involved in this situation.

QUESTION: The person who is handling your campaign finances is also pushing pardon matters before the president you're married to. Doesn't that send a signal?

CLINTON: Well, you know, I don't know anything more about this than what has been reported. And what has been reported is that he filled out an application and sent it to the Justice Department and did not talk to anybody about it. That's all I know about it.

And he certainly did not talk to me about it. I did not know about it until it was, I guess, written about today.

QUESTION: Are you going over any of these pardons now, yourself, to see which one next could possibly create another political problem for you and/or your husband?

CLINTON: You know, I have no idea what is coming next. You know, I was talking to a friend of mine today, and you know, we were just amazed by what has unfolded over the past weeks. I don't have any information. I don't know anything about these.

And if issues are raised, I'm going to be in the same position as I've been in, which is to say that, you know, I was not involved in the decisions. I didn't even know about the vast majority of these things ever being considered. And you'll have to, really, ask the president and his staff who handled all of this.

(CROSSTALK)

QUESTION: ... the $400,000 your brother received had absolutely nothing to do with the president's decision to pardon these two men?

CLINTON: I believe that's the case. I absolutely believe that's the case. As far as I know, there was no connection whatsoever, and, you know, there was certainly no basis on which I even thought it was going on. And my husband has said that he didn't know that was going on. So as far as I know, there was no connection.

But again, with respect to any of these decisions. You'll have to talk with people who were involved in making them, and that leaves me out. I don't know enough to answer your questions. And I don't want to say anything that leads you to believe that I either know something or don't know something, because I don't. And so you'll have to ask people who were involved in them.

QUESTION: And again, the president's brother, Roger Clinton, did you talk to him?

CLINTON: Did I talk to Roger Clinton?

QUESTION: Was there any discussion of a pardon?

CLINTON: No, but I think that that's one that, you know, was, obviously, particularly personal to my husband. And you'll have to ask him what went into his making that decision.

You know, the pardon power, under the Constitution, is an absolute power vested in the president.

CLINTON: I've learned more about it in the last few weeks than I ever knew about it before. And if you compare my husband's use of it with his predecessors, it's about the same, on the par of the numbers, and in fact less than some. And you could go back, I'm sure, and pick apart any one of these, going back decades. That doesn't in any way excuse the involvement of some people who I think acted inappropriately, and that, you know, is my brother, in this particular case.

But I believe that, again, there is a context for all of this, and it's important to put these things into context. And there have been controversial pardons in our country's past going back, you know, hundreds of years, 100 years. And what goes into the mind of the person who makes the decision is something that is very hard to determine.

But I only can tell you that, based on what I know and what my husband has said, he believed in every one of these instances that it was appropriate to do. You may disagree with that judgment, but that is, you know, that is what he believes. And he's the person who, as he did in his op-ed column last week, will have to tell you what he took into account in making any of these. And really, I can't, you know...

(CROSSTALK)

QUESTION: Former President Carter has said that these pardons and commutations were disgraceful and brought discredit on the process and one of the biggest mistakes that your husband has ever made. So is Mr. Carter wrong?

CLINTON: No. Mr. Carter is someone whom I admire and respect deeply, and he has every right to express his opinion. And I believe that, you know, people will have to make their judgments based on the facts as they are available, and the vast majority of these pardons, so far as I'm aware, have not been subject to controversy, and the ones that are, people will have to make their own decisions.

But there is a very big difference between saying what someone did and why they did it and what their motivation for doing it was and whether you agree with it or not. And, you know, we all I'm sure make decisions in our life that we believe we make for the absolutely, you know, right reasons and right motivations which someone can disagree with. You know, that is, you know, part of life, I think.

So I would just say that anyone can draw whatever conclusions they choose, but ultimately the reasons rest with the president and his staff. And he can put those reasons out and people can say, "Well, I agree or disagree," and that's the way it has to be. And I believe that's, you know, the appropriate context for all of this to be discussed and judged.

(CROSSTALK)

CLINTON: Thank you all very much.

WATERS: Hillary Rodham Clinton appearing very at ease answering an enormous number of questions centering around the pardons in the last days of her husband's presidency.

She drew a clear distinction between the involvement of her Senate campaign treasurer in helping obtain last-minute pardons for two convicted felons and the involvement of her brother, who collected nearly $400,000 for helping secure a pardon and prison commutation for two clients, from President Clinton.

Of her brother, she said she was disappointed, saddened and disturbed by Hugh Rodham's involvement. Hugh Rodham is an attorney. He was involved with the two clients and Bruce Lindsey, a Clinton aide at the White House in securing those pardons. She said, if I'd known, I would have been able to prevent it. She said she did not know until late Monday night about her brother's involvement and had not spoken to him since, or before.

In their statement yesterday, the Clintons said: "Neither Hillary nor I had any knowledge of these payments to Hugh Rodham. We are deeply disturbed by these reports and insisted that Hugh return any moneys received."

Hillary Rodham Clinton says she has not spoken with her brother. We still don't know who insisted that Hugh Rodham return the moneys, which he has done, and there's still much more about the pardon story we don't know: The beat goes on, and we'll continue to tap our foot.

PRESS CONFERENCE WITH SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON, 2/22/2001

TOPIC: THE PRESIDENTIAL PARDONS

LOCATION: THE RUSSELL SENATE OFFICE BUILDING, WASHINGTON, D.C.

SEN. CLINTON: Hello, everybody. How are you? (Cross talk.) Good afternoon, I guess, now, right?

I understand you have a few questions for me that you might want to ask.

Q Yes.

SEN. CLINTON: Who wants to start?

Q Senator, did you ever talk to anybody about the pardons?

Q Senator Clinton, what is your reaction to -- (off mike) -- by your brother in the pardon and clemency issues, first? And secondly, do you think your husband handled these pardons appropriately?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I was very disappointed and saddened by this whole matter. You know, it came as a surprise to me, and it was very disturbing, and I'm just very disappointed about it.

With respect to any questions about the pardons or the president's handling of the pardons, you'll have to ask him or his staff about that.

Q Did you speak in favor of any pardon requests, clemency requests with your husband? And if so, which ones?

SEN. CLINTON: You know, I did not have any involvement in the pardons that were granted or not granted, you know, and I'm just very disappointed about my brother's involvement.

Q Senator, did you speak to anyone at all about any of the pardons?

SEN. CLINTON: Oh, you know, as I have said in the past, when it became apparent around Christmas that people knew that the president was considering pardons, there were many, many people who spoke to me or, you know, asked me to pass on information to the White House Counsel's Office. I've already said that I did that, and I did. There were many, many people who had an interest, a friend, a relative, but it was all passed on to the White House Counsel's Office, and they, along with the president, made the decisions.

Q What about Roger Clinton in specific? Did he ask for a pardon?

SEN. CLINTON: I don't know the answer to that.

Q Did he ask the president for a pardon?

SEN. CLINTON: I don't know the answer to that.

Q Why would anyone contact your brother if they were not trying to get access to you and to the president?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, you'll have to -- you'll have to ask him. If I had known about this, we wouldn't be standing here today. I didn't know about it. And I'm very regretful that it occurred, that I didn't know about it. I might have been able to prevent this from happening. And I'm just very disappointed about the whole matter.

Q Are you disappointed that Bruce Lindsey didn't tell your husband that he, apparently, had been contacted by your brother?

SEN. CLINTON: You'll have to ask the people involved. I don't know anything other than what has now come out. And I did not learn about that until very recently.

Q Senator, what exactly did you not know about? Did you not know that he was representing them? Did you not know about the money? And finally, what about your campaign treasurer, William Cunningham?

SEN. CLINTON: Right.

Q Should he also return the fees that he got in regards to other pardons?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, let's separate these out. I did not know my brother was involved in any way in any of this. I learned that there were some press inquiries of a vague nature last week sometime. I did not know any specific information until late Monday night, when I was actually in a movie theater and I was called and told that my brother had been involved and had taken money for his involvement.

And as soon as I found out, I was very upset about it and very disappointed about it. My husband found out early the next morning because he was travelling and not available until then to be told. And we immediately said that this money had to be returned. And it has been.

Now, with respect to Mr. Cunningham, I knew nothing about that. But I know that he is, you know, a fine lawyer and a fine man. And I had no knowledge that he was involved, but, you know, lawyers from all over the country were involved in these matters. That has happened in the past. That shouldn't be a surprise to anyone. But you'll have to ask Mr. Cunningham about the details, but I didn't know anything about his involvement at all.

Q What about Mr. Ikes, Mr. Ikes' involvement?

Q Is it inappropriate for somebody -- (off mike)?

SEN. CLINTON: I did not know anything about that either.

Q Senator, do you think it's appropriate and necessary for your husband to come before Congress and answer these questions, much like you're doing today?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, you'll have to ask him and his staff about that.

(Cross talk.)

Q Senator, was your brother a guest at the White House for the final two weeks of your husband's administration?

SEN. CLINTON: He was a frequent guest at the White House, you know, he's my brother; I love my brother. I'm just extremely disappointed in this terrible misjudgment that he made.

Q But during the course of --

Q But are you upset that he took money, or are that he represented these people at all?

SEN. CLINTON: Both.

Q Have you spoken to him since yesterday?

SEN. CLINTON: No, I have not.

Q Senator why did -- when you first heard the rumors, why didn't you just pick up the phone and ask him about it and express your opinion? And secondly, what does it say about the moral climate fostered among the people closest to you, that this kind of thing could happen, and all the other controversies regarding the pardons?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, you know, Tim, I hear so many rumors all the time that, you know, I really -- you know, vague rumors don't mean anything to me anymore after all of the years that I've been here. And as soon as I had anyone with solid information, I immediately acted. But at that point, I did not think it appropriate to call my brother because I didn't want anyone asking what we talked about or putting either him or me in a very difficult position.

So I have not talked with him. And as soon as we found out Monday night, I was heartbroken and shocked by it and, you know, immediately said this -- you know, this is a terrible misjudgment and the money had to be returned. And that's what we worked on. You know, these are very -- you know, this is a very sad matter to me, personally. It was a surprise, but more than being surprising, it was extremely disappointing.

Q What about the second part of the question?

Q What did he say when you asked him to give the money back?

SEN. CLINTON: I did not ask him. I did not ask him directly, you know.

Q Who did?

SEN. CLINTON: I have not talked --

Q I heard you two had talked.

SEN. CLINTON: No, I have not talked -- no, I'm sorry you didn't hear me.

My head was turned the other way. No, I did not talk to him. I have not spoken with him. I do not want to speak with him because, frankly, I didn't want anybody to draw any wrong conclusions about what I might or might not have said to him, so I have not spoken with him.

Q Well, the fact that you're so close, then it seems sort of odd that you wouldn't just --

SEN. CLINTON: Well, but I understand how these things are, and once I had solid information late Monday night, I did not think it was in his interests and certainly did not believe it was appropriate for me to speak with him, so I have not.

Q But you were reacting as a lawyer would react --

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I was reacting as someone who was extremely disappointed in this whole matter. This was just a very sad occurrence to have happen, and I wanted to be sure that the money was returned, and it has been.

(Cross talk.)

SEN. CLINTON: I'm sorry?

Q Do you feel he betrayed a trust? You said you're heartbroken. Were you disappointed with him personally, feel he betrayed a trust?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, let me use my own words, and my own words are that I'm disappointed, I'm very saddened, and I was very disturbed when I heard about it.

(Cross talk.)

Q (Inaudible) -- and using their connections with you to have the president, the former president, grant clemency petitions --

SEN. CLINTON: Well, it's very regrettable, and it shouldn't have happened, and if I'd had any knowledge or notice of it, I believe I might have been able to prevent it. I don't think we'd be standing here talking about it. But I did not.

Q On the whole broad scheme of things, the number of people --

SEN. CLINTON: Well, you know, this -- I mean, this will have to be put into a broader context. It's not for me to do that. You'll have to look at the broad context, compare it with, you know, past actions that have occurred around this constitutional power, and I'm just not going to comment on that.

Q Senator, you've had kind of a rocky start as a senator. How do you put all this scandal behind you and move on as a Senator, in this light?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, you know, I'm very disappointed about what's gone on for the last weeks. It is certainly not how I would have preferred or planned to start my Senate career, and I regret deeply that there has been these kinds of matters occurring. And all I can tell you is that I have gotten up every day and worked as hard as I can to be the best senator I can be, and that's what I intend to do.

You know, I'm here today to meet with my staffs both from New York and from Washington about our legislative agenda. We'll be rolling out our upstate economic plans next week.

I've spent a lot of time in the last two weeks traveling around the state, talking with people about what we intend to do.

I'm very much looking forward to President Bush's address to the Congress and his presentation of a budget, and trying to figure out what the impact of that will be on New Yorkers.

So I have my hands full being a senator, learning the ropes, you know, working with my colleagues, dealing with my constituents, and I love doing it. I'm having a really good time doing it. But of course, I'm -- you know, I'm disappointed and saddened that, you know, these matters are up --

(Cross talk.)

Q (Off mike) -- when you found out about your brother's involvement in these cases, how he became involved, and what he did?

SEN. CLINTON: I have nothing to add to -- other than his public statement, which was made yesterday.

(Cross talk.)

Q Senator, if the committees investigating the pardons on the House and Senate side wanted to talk to your brother, wanted him to come before the committee, would you encourage him to do so?

SEN. CLINTON: He should fully cooperate with any and all inquiries by anyone about this matter.

(Cross talk.)

Q Let me ask you -- just in a broader context, people say, "With the Clintons, it's always something."

SEN. CLINTON: Have you noticed that? (Laughs.)

Q Why is that --

SEN. CLINTON: I don't know. I wish I knew. I -- look, I think that we are apparently, you know, people who attract a lot of attention, and that's both good and bad. There's no doubt about that.

I think that, you know, the two terms that my husband had as president were good for this country. I think, even standing here today, he did a good job for America, and we had a lot of good, positive things happening.

Obviously, I wish that the last weeks had unfolded differently, and I'm very sorry that they have not.

But all I can say is, now I've got a position and a responsibility that I'm going to do my very best to fulfill to the very best of my ability, and people will have to judge me at the end of my term based on what I do. And that's what I'm going to ask people to do.

Q Senator, the Democrats are all trying to put a distance between themselves and both of you, really, but certainly "the Clintons." Doesn't that make it difficult to defend anything he did over the last eight years?

SEN. CLINTON: No.

Q And hasn't it been difficult for the Democrats to rely on his accomplishments because of this?

SEN. CLINTON: I don't think so. I mean, I really think that everything has to be put in context, and I know that that's often difficult to do. But I feel that our country is stronger and better because of the Clinton administration.

And yes, there have been difficulties, and there have been problems, and those have to be viewed. And people have to take responsibility for them and have to answer for them, which I certainly think we have done over the last eight years.

But I don't believe that in the view of history this administration will be judged lacking. I think instead there will be very many positive attributes and accomplishments that people will look to.

And I, for one, believe that much of the work that is still to be done in our country has to build on the progress and prosperity of the last eight years. I don't want to change direction. That's one reason why I'm, as a senator from New York, very anxious to see what the administration is going to be proposing on the budget.

These are very big issues that will affect the quality of the lives of the people I represent. And, you know, I think we have a good framework for knowing how to keep the economy going and dealing with people's needs and doing a lot of the other important work of keeping the crime rate down and improving education and health care. I believe that this administration has shown us how to do that effectively.

So I think historically, you have to put everything in context, and I'm someone who believes that overall, the accomplishments are ones that will stand the test of time and history.

Q What made you finally speak out today? And what do you hope to accomplish by speaking out?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, you know, I found out about this, as I said, late Monday night. And, you know, it's 48 hours later, I guess. And I know that people have questions. I believe I have an obligation as a public official to answer those questions. And so this was my earliest opportunity to do that.

Q Senator, an interior decorating question for you?

SEN. CLINTON: (Laughs.)

Q Today some tables, some furniture was delivered to your house -- (off mike).

SEN. CLINTON: Right. Right.

Q Anything to do with Denise Rich?

SEN. CLINTON: No, my dear, nothing to do, not at all.

Q Senator, did you ever have a discussion with your brother, notwithstanding his professional involvement, about pardons or commutations? And the same question as regarding Bruce Lindsey.

SEN. CLINTON: No, I did not. You know, I don't have any memory at all of ever talking to my brother about this. You know, that's my best memory. And, you know, this was -- I have to say, and I will repeat once again, information was coming to me, information was passed on. So if -- you know, if I said -- information came people wanted you to look at, I might have said that. I just don't remember any further than that.

Q Is it fair to say that it's not inconceivable your brother --

Q (Inaudible.)

SEN. CLINTON: To the counsel's office.

Q So your brother may have spoken to someone who then spoke --

Q (Inaudible.)

SEN. CLINTON: No, I mean, it was just passed on.

I'm sorry?

Q So your brother may have spoken to someone who then spoke to you?

SEN. CLINTON: No, not about any involvement of my brother. No, I want to make that 100 percent clear. I don't want you to try to put words in my mouth. I knew nothing about my brother's involvement in these pardons. I knew nothing about his taking money for his involvement. I had no knowledge of what whatsoever.

Q Why specifically are you disappointed in your brother? What is wrong with him taking -- (off mike). And secondly, why are you not disappointed at all, or are you, in your treasurer of your campaign also representing?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I think that, you know, you really have to draw a distinction, which I hope the press can do, between lawyers who are doing their job and going through, as I understand it, the ordinary course of business on these matters, and a family member. I think it's a very big difference.

And, you know, if he were, you know, Joe Smith from somewhere, who had no connection with me, we wouldn't be standing here, would we? So I just think you have to -- you have to see it in context. That's what I keep asking people to do, is put these things in context, and there's a very big -- very big difference.

Q (Inaudible.)

SEN. CLINTON: Yes. Yes.

Q In the past, you have sometimes blamed your political enemies for your troubles. Do you in any way blame them for this?

SEN. CLINTON: Not at all. Not at all.

Q Who do you blame?

SEN. CLINTON: You know, I mean, I've said that I think my brother made a terrible misjudgment.

Q But Senator, in the past few years, the Democrats by and large have really stood by you and your husband over everything that's happened, and for the first time we kind of see Democrats not standing by you and really coming out against the actions, both on the pardons and the gifts that you all received. Why do you think that is, and what do you think about that?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, you know, I can't speak for anybody else and I'm not going to speculate on anybody's, you know, feelings or motivations. But, you know, I think it's understandable. And what I want to try to do is answer any questions anybody has for me and give you my best information and then let people make their own judgments.

(Cross talk.)

Q What do you mean, it's understandable?

Q Since Bruce Lindsey was key in negotiating all of these and many other partners, why can't you blame him for some of the fallout on this?

SEN. CLINTON: I don't blame anyone for this right now. I think we don't -- you know, we don't need to be making judgments about this. We don't -- I don't personally have any information. I think that it's regrettable that my brother was involved at all and I'm very sorry that he was.

Q Senator, has your brother --

Q Did he ever speak to you about the pardons?

SEN. CLINTON: No. No, he did not.

Q Have you asked your husband whether -- what kind of contact they had?

SEN. CLINTON: You know I never talk about conversations with my husband, Vince.

Q But even if this was a question that's being investigated, have you sat down, at least, even if you don't want to say what you talked about, have you sat down with your husband and said, What went on?

SEN. CLINTON: You will have to ask the president and his staff any specific questions about any pardons that were or were not granted.

Q Senator, was Marc Rich among the people that you passed information on?

SEN. CLINTON: No. You know, I never knew about Marc Rich at all. In fact, I don't even -- you know, frankly, people would hand me envelopes. I would just pass them. You know, I would not have any reason to look into them. I didn't -- I knew nothing about the Marc Rich pardon until after it happened.

Q Senator, had your brother been warned at all to avoid this kind of thing after the episode with the hazelnuts?

SEN. CLINTON: I don't know the answer to that. I'm certainly -- I believe so, but I don't know the answer to that.

Q Senator, do you think your husband made a mistake in pardoning Marc Rich?

SEN. CLINTON: You know, I know that other senators have commented on this, and I think you might understand why I'm not going to have any comments on any of the pardons, on the merits or demerits that might surround any of these pardons.

Q Some of your Democratic colleagues, Senator, suggest that your husband has become a distraction to the agenda for the Democrats. Do you think that our husband has begun to take the spotlight away from the Democratic agenda here on the Hill?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I think that the Democratic agenda is the agenda that Democrats on the Hill set. I believe that -- it's clear to me that both the House Democrats and particularly the Senate Democrats, because of the 50-50 split, are the leaders of the Democratic agenda, and I think that's what people expect, and that's what we're going to try to deliver.

Q Senator, just to clarify something, you don't think there's anything inappropriate about what Mr. Cunningham did?

SEN. CLINTON: I don't know any facts. But I just must say that there's a very big difference between whatever he did and my brother being involved. And I know Mr. Cunningham is a, you know, fine person and a good lawyer. And I know lawyers prepare and process pardon applications. So I'm not going to make any statement of any kind about something I know nothing about, other than to please ask you to make a distinction between a gentleman with, you know, Mr. Cunningham's background and experience and my brother, who, you know, as a family member, should not have been involved in these -- this situation.

STAFF: One more. One more.

Q (Off mike) -- a person who's handling their campaign finances is also pushing pardon matters before the president you're married to? Doesn't that send a signal?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, you know, I don't know anything more about this than what has been reported. And what has been reported is that he filled out an application and sent it to the Justice Department and did not talk to anybody about it. That's all I know about it. And he certainly did not talk to me about it. I did not know about it until it was, I guess, written about today.

Q Senator Clinton, are you -- (inaudible) -- any of these pardons -- (inaudible) -- which one next could possibly create another political problem for you and/or your husband?

SEN. CLINTON: You know, Linda, I have no idea what's coming next. (Laughter.) You know, I was talking to a friend of mine today, and, you know, we were just amazed by, you know, what has unfolded over the past weeks. I have not -- I don't have any information, Linda. I don't know anything about these. And, you know, if -- and if issues are raised, I'm going to be in the same position as I've been in, which is to say that, you know, I was not involved in the decisions; I didn't even know about the vast majority of these things ever being considered; and you'll have to really ask the president and his staff who handled all of this.

STAFF: One more. One more.

Q You didn't speak to Roger Clinton at all?

(Cross talk.)

Q Senator, can you say with confidence -- Senator, can you say with confidence that the $400,000 your brother received had absolutely nothing to do with the president's decision to pardon these two men?

SEN. CLINTON: I believe that's the case, absolutely believe that's the case. As far as I know there was no connection whatsoever. And, you know, there was certainly no basis on which I even thought it was going on. And my husband has said that he didn't know that was going on. And so, as far as I know, there was no connection.

But you know, again, with respect to any of these decisions, you'll have to talk with people who were involved in making them. And that leaves me out. I don't know enough to answer your questions, and I don't want to say anything that leads you to believe that I either know something or don't know something, because I don't. And so you'll have to ask people who were involved in them.

Q And again, the president's brother, Roger --

Q Did you talk to him? Did you mention anything about a pardon? Was there any --

SEN. CLINTON: Did I talk to Roger Clinton?

Q Was there any discussion of a pardon?

SEN. CLINTON: No, but I think that that's one that, you know, was obviously particularly personal to my husband, and you'll have to ask him what went into his making that decision.

You know, the pardon power, under the Constitution, is an absolute power vested in the president. I've learned more about it in the last few weeks than I ever knew about it before. And if you compare my husband's use of it with his predecessors', it's about the same on the par of the numbers and in fact less than some. And you could go back, I'm sure, and pick apart any one of these, going back decades.

That doesn't in any way excuse the involvement of some people who I think acted inappropriately, and that, you know, is my brother in this particular case.

But I believe that, again, there is a context for all of this, and it's important to put these things into context. And there have been controversial pardons in our country's past, going back, you know, hundreds of years -- a hundred years. And what goes into the mind of the person who makes the decision is something that is very hard to determine. But I only can tell you that based on what I know and what my husband has said, he believed in every one of these instances that it was appropriate to do. You may disagree with that judgment, but that is -- you know, that is what he believes. And he's the person who, as he did in his op-ed column last week, will have to tell you what he took into account in making any of these. And really I can't, you know --

Q Do you agree with these pardons --

Q Thank you, Senator. Thank you, Senator.

(Cross talk.)

Q Former President Carter has said that these pardons and commutations were disgraceful and brought discredit on the process, and one of the biggest mistakes that your husband has ever made. So is Mr. Carter wrong?

SEN. CLINTON: No, Mr. Carter is someone whom I admire and respect deeply, and he has every right to express his opinion. And I believe that, you know, people will have to make their judgments based on the facts, as they are available. And the vast majority of these pardons, so far as I'm aware, have not been subject to controversy, and the ones that are, people will have to make their own decisions.

But there is a very big difference between saying what someone did and why they did it and what their motivation for doing it was, and whether you agree with it or not. And, you know, we all, I'm sure, make decisions in our life that we believe we make for the absolutely, you know, right reasons and right motivations, which someone can disagree with. That -- you know, that is, you know, part of life, I think.

So I would just say that anyone can draw whatever conclusions they choose, but ultimately the reasons rest with the president and his staff. And he could put those reasons out and people can say, well, I agree or disagree, and that's the way it has to be. And I believe that's, you know, the appropriate context for all of this to be discussed and judged.

STAFF: Senator -- (inaudible).

SEN. CLINTON: What?

STAFF: We have to get on to the meeting.

SEN. CLINTON: Thank you all very much.

Q What are you going to say to your brother the next time you speak to him?

U.S. SENATOR PETE DOMENICI (R-NM) HOLDS HEARING ON PRESIDENT BUSH'S FISCAL YEAR 2002 BUDGET PROPOSAL,

CLINTON: Secretary O'Neill, I'm going to leave the debate about the important issues concerning how this matter proceeds to the chairman and ranking member and Senator Byrd and others who have a great deal of experience in this arena.

As a new senator, I am still struggling to get to what Senator Byrd aptly referred to, and that is a factual basis on which to make a decision. I think it's fully appropriate for us to have a vigorous and full debate about the president's proposals, but that debate should be informed by at least a consensus about what the factual parameters are. Do you agree with that, Mr. Secretary?

O'NEILL: I do.

CLINTON: And what I'm concerned about is that, with the blueprint and not yet a budget, there is much room for disagreement about those factual parameters. We heard one reference already to a program that Senator Sarbanes said was being cut. That's a value issue as to whether or not the program is appropriate.

I know from some other work that I've been doing that there is also some revenue assumed in the budget. I believe, just as an example, there's a revenue assumption of $1.4 billion or $1.6 billion for revenues that would flow from drilling in the Arctic wildlife refuge, which is...

O'NEILL: That's true.

CLINTON: Is that true?

O'NEILL: Yes.

CLINTON: So if one takes the value judgments on the side of programs, with their impact, and one takes potential revenue projections, there is room, I believe, for some misunderstanding -- legitimate misunderstanding about what the true figures might be that we're dealing with.

And I was just handed a score comparison that's been done. The OMB score on creating the new 10 percent tax bracket is $311 billion. A new joint tax projection score is $383 billion. The OMB score on reducing the upper rates is $501 billion. The joint tax score is $559 billion. And those are just two elements of the tax plan, which, based on the joint tax projection, would make it $130 billion more than what it's been scored by OMB. I have no opinion about the legitimacy of that scoring. I'm just pointing out that part of the reason why we think it's imperative, not just convenient, but imperative to understand what we're doing, rests on our desire to make good decisions.

And I share Senator Byrd's opinion that I certainly am not approaching this in a partisan manner. I'm approaching it with the hope that we can continue and even build on economic progress of the last eight years, that you referred to.

So I would hope, Mr. Secretary, that you would understand the legitimate questions that we are raising, because we're attempting to come to a position where we know what the facts might be.

And along those lines, I just want to be sure that I'm clear. The $1.6 trillion that the president has proposed, does it or does it not include any AMT reform?

O'NEILL: The AMT that's provided for in the way the $1.6 trillion is structured, really avoids an AMT effective significance for people with incomes under $100,000, because of the inclusion of the child credit. So that, for the most part, we're not going to be throwing people into AMT.

But what I have been saying, as I've testified to various committees, if there's an interest in dealing in a more complete way with AMT, which has now been on the books for a very long time, and there's a preference to dealing with the AMT in lieu of a rate of phase-in for the proposed tax increases, it's a decision we can certainly talk to the members about.

CLINTON: But that is one of those decisions that I would hope we would talk about in the context of this debate, because, clearly, the real cost then would be higher. I would assume you'd agree with that.

O'NEILL: I would.

CLINTON: I'm also...

O'NEILL: Or result in a slower phase-in.

CLINTON: Well, it could be done either way. But again, we'd have to have an agreed upon factual basis on which to make sure a decision.

As I listen to your response to some previous questions, with respect to the projected $600 billion in additional revenues, I would think that, sort of, shorthand what you'd describe is a very clear explication of, really, supply-side theory about how one does increase that kind of revenue through tax cuts. You're shaking your head no, so what is the difference?

O'NEILL: No, I wouldn't agree with you at all for this reason. The idea of supply-side is a fairly recent phenomenon, really began to gain currency as way of identifying a set of ideas about economic thought, you know.

Now dating myself, but when I went to get my undergraduate degree in economics, I learned about multiplier effects in 1957, and it's Alfred Marshall's idea from 1898. It's not something that happened in 1980.

CLINTON: I would agree with that. But certainly within the context of the last 20 years, when we're applying it to public sector decisions, with respect to tax cuts, there's been a shorthand that's been used, as to what the revenue impact of large tax cuts would be. And that shorthand was certainly used to describe the impact of the 1981 tax cuts. And with respect to deficits, would you agree that the projections are wrong?

And I understand what you have said, which is that, you know, revenues doubled and spending tripled.

CLINTON: But with respect to deficits, as I recall, in 1981, there was a projection that we would be in a surplus in three years based on the projections as to what would be produced for the public revenues.

O'NEILL: No, I don't think so. I think if you go back and examine the history, what you find is something I objected to very strongly at the time, what some people call the magic asterisk -- I call the flying asterisk. There was, I think it was on page 27 of the documents that were submitted in March of 1981, and it said, with a little asterisk, "to be identified later," $42 billion worth of program cuts that were never identified.

It didn't have anything to do with dynamic scoring or supply-side economics, it had to do with never producing the spending cuts that were recommended that we ended up with this burgeoning deficit problem.

CLINTON: But, Mr. Secretary, I guess that partly makes our concern is that there seem to be a lot of asterisks in this budget.

O'NEILL: I don't think so.

CLINTON: Well, we don't have a budget, but in a blueprint. We may not have an actual asterisk, but in looking through it, there certainly are a lot of issues that have not yet been fully explored or explained that may or may not deserve an asterisk.

And from our perspective, it's very difficult to reconcile -- to use that word -- the experience of 1981 with the experience that we're being confronted with 20 years later and not to have caution lights. Because whether it's fair or not, there are differences in beliefs about what we should spend our public dollars on. And we will have some vigorous debates about that.

But to use those debates in an effective manner, to set priorities for our nation, we have to fulfill our responsibility of having a budget in front of us which puts forth the president's values so we can respond to those.

And there are two large unanswered questions. One has already been raised: national defense spending. You'll find a lot of support for appropriate increases in making sure we're fully ready. The president said there's going to be a Social Security commission which may or may not come forward with recommendations.

But we're being asked to consider those and put those off under an asterisk to be considered later, more money for defense, possible more money for Social Security in the context of a $1.6 trillion -- and I would argue greater -- tax cut.

And that's why we're very concerned about all of us reaching an understanding as to what the policy debate is really about. And the only way we know to get there is to have the facts in front of us, and it seems, you know with all respect to the administration, a little backwards to go for the big tax cut before we have the budget, before we have the defense spending review, before we have the Social Security commission, which may entail additional revenues.

And I know from your private and public sector experiences, you understand and appreciate the good-faith inquiries that were making to try to reach some understanding.

Thank you.

PRESS CONFERENCE WITH SENATOR HARRY REID (D-NV), SENATOR THOMAS CARPER (D-DE), SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D-NY), AND SENATOR JOSEPH LIEBERMAN (D-CT), 3/14/2001

TOPIC: PRESIDENT BUSH'S REVERSAL ON THE CARBON DIOXIDE RULES

LOCATION: THE CAPITOL, THE SENATE RADIO/TV GALLERY, WASHINGTON, D.C.

SEN. REID: Thank you, everyone, for waiting for us.

We're here representing the Democrats in the Environment and Public Works Committee. Joe Lieberman is the chairman -- ranking member who was chairman for 17 days of the subcommittee that has jurisdiction over clean air.

You know, it seems to me very important that we teach our children to tell the truth, to always be a person of their word. If -- in the business that we're in, if someone doesn't live up to their word, they're castigated and looked upon very -- in much disfavor.

Yesterday's example on the Senate floor: There was a situation that came up where there was a question as to whether or not there was going to be a vote on an amendment. We went back and read the Congressional Record, and a senator had represented that there would be a vote. Even though that senator may not have had authority to do and say what he did, the majority, the Republicans, acknowledged that he had said that, and we had a vote on that amendment.

The reason I give you this little background is, I think that we have to set examples for the people we represent. We have to be people of our word.

During the last presidential campaign, every place that George W. Bush went where there was an environmentalist in the crowd, he acknowledged that he was going to do something to make sure that he took care of carbon dioxide. He said that he was going to change the standards; we had to be aware of this thing called global warming. And as soon as he selected his Cabinet nominees -- for example, Governor Christie Todd Whitman gave this long statement where she supported what the president was going to do. She said it was important -- the head of our Environmental Protection Agency.

Well, lo and behold, we all learned yesterday, late in the day, that the president had written a letter to certain senators saying that he no longer was going to live up to his word. Well, I'm terribly disappointed. I'm terribly disappointed because I think it sets an example that we shouldn't have, where someone on a major, major issue -- there isn't -- there may be something more important to the environmental community than global warming; I don't know what it is.

Anyone that says global warming is not taking place hasn't read a newspaper, looked at a magazine, or talked to a scientist.

Well, our president has backed down on his word. I think it's very bad for our country. I think it's bad for the world generally. I think that it's going to make us -- make it harder for our committee. I know that the chairman of the committee, Senator Smith, believes that we need to do something about these pollutants, this one in particular. I haven't personally discussed this with him, but I'm confident that we're going to continue to work on this committee to do something about these pollutants, this one in particular.

So I would hope this carbon dioxide "read my lips" statement that President George W. Bush made is one that perhaps -- perhaps -- the Congress can do something about. We need to work very hard. This is an important environmental issue, and we're going to do everything that we can, working on a bipartisan basis with people of goodwill -- Senator Jeffords, Senator Voinovich, to name two Republicans, including Chairman Smith -- I know that my friend is talking about introducing legislation tomorrow with Senator Jeffords. It's something I haven't personally studied, but I'm certain, knowing the work you do on all issues, that it's a step in the right direction.

I'm happy to introduce the ranking member of the Subcommittee on Clean Air in the Environment and Public Works Committee, Joe Lieberman.

SEN. LIEBERMAN: Thank you, Harry. Thanks for your leadership in this matter, on this committee. And it's a pleasure to be here with Senator Clinton and Senator Carper.

This, after all, is about leadership. We're all here today to express our deep disappointment with the change of position announced by President Bush on the regulation of carbon dioxide emissions from power plants.

During last fall's campaign, in which I had more than a passing interest -- (soft laughter) -- and a particularly good seat to watch and listen to what was happening, I must tell you that I was impressed by the pledge that then-Governor Bush made that he would take strong steps to reduce pollution from power plants, including carbon dioxide. That was an act of leadership, a sign that President Bush was prepared to stand up to private polluters to protect the public interest.

And since he became president, he and others in his administration have continually said he would stay that course. Just last week, in fact, EPA Administrator Christie Todd Whitman represented to the international community in Trieste, Italy, that this initiative would be the United States' chief domestic tool for addressing global climate change, about which there is so much concern around the globe.

Now, just a few days later the Bush administration sadly has flip-flopped, apparently under intense pressure from special interest groups aligned against what candidate Bush said he would do. The president and his team have really made a 180-degree turn on their position here, suggesting now that CO₂ is somehow A-OK. And I cannot resist saying that I'm sure this turnaround will lead many people to wonder whether the White House was just feeding us hot air about global warming.

But this is honestly about much more than broken campaign promises or political double-talk. In this case, turnabout is foul play and will mean foul air.

The science on the threat of global warming, as Harry said, has never been clearer or more convincing. It's just in recent weeks that the United Nations Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, known as the IPCC, released its third report on global warming which concluded that the earth is slowly overheating and is in serious distress and danger as a result. According to this report, done by 700 expert scientists from around the globe, unless we find ways to stop global warming, the earth's average temperature can be expected to rise between 2.5 and 10.4 degrees Fahrenheit in this century.

Now, those are astounding numbers. And they would radically alter the earth's landscape in ways that will jeopardize the health and safety of millions and millions of people on earth. Sea levels could swell up to 35 feet, according to this report, potentially submerging millions of homes and coastal properties. Precipitation would become more erratic, leading to droughts that would make hunger an even more serious global problem than it is today. Diseases such as malaria and dengue fever would spread at an accelerated pace. Severe weather disturbances and storms triggered by climatic phenomena such as El Nino would be aggravated by global warming and become more routine.

This is a real and serious problem, one of the most consequential that we face in our time and in the years ahead.

Well, to help respond to this threat, a bipartisan group of us here in Congress have been engaged in very sincere and hard work to draft legislation that would have effectively kept President Bush's campaign pledge. In fact, tomorrow we intend to introduce that legislation that would set practical limits on the power-plant emissions of carbon dioxide and three other major air pollutants: sulfur dioxide, nitrogen oxides and mercury. And remember, this will provide industry with the flexibility and certainty they need to make business decisions while strengthening the protection of public health and the environment.

We thought that President Bush had pledged to be our partner in this initiative. We now know differently. But even in light of yesterday's presidential flip-flop, we will push forward on this bipartisan path with a renewed sense of purpose. Global warming is a real threat to us, our children and our grandchildren. It must be confronted now. President Bush had his chance. He has not led. Now it's up to we here in Congress to lead, and I am confident I will.

Senator Carper? Senator Clinton?

SEN. CLINTON: Thank you so much. And I look forward to cosponsoring that legislation that you've worked so hard on to introduce tomorrow.

You know, last September during the presidential campaign, in Saginaw, Michigan, candidate George Bush said -- and I just happen to have the Bush-Cheney Web page about announcing a comprehensive national energy policy -- and I quote: "We will require all power plants to meet clean-air standards in order to reduce emissions of sulfur dioxide, nitrogen oxide, mercury and carbon dioxide." Now, yesterday President George Bush said, and I quote: "I do not believe that the government should impose on power plants mandatory emissions reductions for carbon dioxide."

A promise made and a promise broken. In less than eight weeks in office, President Bush has gone from CO-2 to "see you later."

The overwhelming consensus of scientists around the world is, as Senator Lieberman so well stated, that the global warming crisis is real, it is caused by carbon dioxide emissions, and if we don't do something about it, we will all experience severe environmental consequences. Now, that is of great concern to all of us, but particularly to coastal states like Connecticut and Delaware and New York.

In changing his tune about environmental protection, President Bush has left his EPA commissioner, Governor Christie Todd Whitman, out on a limb. On several occasions she has repeated the president's campaign pledge, including to the Environment and Public Works Committee, as well as recently at the international conference, that this administration would lead the way in reducing carbon dioxide emissions. Apparently, she did not have any idea that her boss had other plans in mind.

Treasury Secretary Paul O'Neill has said that if we fail to act on this problem, it amounts to a, quote, "real danger to civilization." And I don't think anyone who's met or seen the secretary in action thinks that he's a man much given to exaggeration. This is clearly a very deeply held conviction based on the work that he's done in the private sector for so many decades.

But what concerns me more is not the fact that President Bush has abandoned his own Cabinet secretaries; it's the fact that he has abandoned his commitment to leave no child behind, because the real victims of global warming will be our children and their children, who will live with the environmental consequences of this administration's neglect. I know the president is in favor of eliminating the inheritance tax, but this policy reversal on global warming amounts to the imposition of a new inheritance tax on those who will inherit the Earth.

It also concerns me because of the impact on America's leadership on environmental protection. How can we go to a global conference on global warming and fight to have other nations combat this environmental threat if we aren't willing to take steps in our own country to deal with this problem? I posed this question to Secretary Powell when he appeared before the budget Committee today, because to me, the president's flip-flop in effect gives to all other nations a license to pollute. The consequences of this decision are so grave and long-lasting that we hope that the president and his advisers -- particularly the vice president, who apparently leads the administration efforts on energy, the environment and the economy -- will take a second look at this pledge that was made during the campaign and reconsider the implications of reversing it.

SEN. REID: We will be happy to take questions now.

SEN. LIEBERMAN: Tom hasn't spoken yet.

SEN. REID: Hold it. Tom? (Laughter.) Well, that's how they don't follow my instructions because --

SEN. CARPER: I yield to the gentle woman from --

SEN. CLINTON: He pushed me onto the stage, basically. (Laughter.) I think he wanted a clean-up hitter. (Light laughter.)

SEN. CARPER: I'm not here to talk about the greenhouse, I'm not here to talk about carbon dioxide, I'm just here to announce that this weekend Hillary and I get to move out of our broom closet in the basement -- (laughter) --

SEN. CLINTON: (Laughs.)

SEN. CARPER: -- of the Dirksen building. And we'll have, like, a real office. We'll be adults. We'll be grown-ups, and --

SEN. CLINTON: (Laughs.) This is very exciting.

SEN. CARPER: -- it's pretty exciting. Less than three months after we took office we'll have --

SEN. CLINTON: (Laughing.) We're the only ones left. (Light laughter.)

SEN. CARPER: I know we are. Corzine, he's moved uptown. And we're still down there in the dregs.

SEN. CLINTON: (Laughs.)

SEN. CARPER: During the last campaign there were a number of things -- and I probably shouldn't say it with my Democratic colleagues here, but there were a number of things proposed by then- Governor Bush that then-Governor Carper agreed with. I liked his proposals on education reform. I suspect we all did. If we're going to invest -- we ought to invest more money in our schools, we ought to provide more flexibility to the schools and school districts who get that money. We should demand results if we're going to provide greater funds and more flexibility. We ought to empower parents to have more choices in where their kids go to school. I thought that was a good idea. He said we should do those things, and as president he's leading the charge to do it.

As a candidate for the presidency, he outlined an approach that would attempt to provide health care coverage to some of the 40-plus million Americans who don't have it, and what he said we should do is to offer families a refundable tax credit worth as much as $2,500 a year to bring health care coverage within range of a lot of folks, millions of those people who don't have health care coverage today. He said that was a good idea, and he actually reiterated it again in his State of the Union message a couple of weeks ago.

Governor Bush also talked about the need to seriously address bringing carbon dioxide emissions under control. This governor a couple of months ago applauded when I heard him say those things. He has kept his word, as best I can tell, on education reform; he's kept his word, as best I can tell, on a refundable tax credit for health care. But it would appear to me, at least, that he has succumbed to some intense pressure from across the country, maybe from other industries that have led him to change his position on this particular matter. And I think that's unfortunate.

And what's important is he feels those pressures to change his position, to reverse his position in this important area. I think it's critical for those of us who have an entirely different view, who regard carbon dioxide emissions and greenhouse gases and the overheating in our atmosphere and ever-larger ozone, if we -- those of us who regard it as serious -- serious matters for our planet, we have to speak up and be as loud and as persistent and hopefully as persuasive as those who have leaned on the president to get him to change his view.

The last thing I'd say: A fellow who used to be governor of the state that Senator Clinton now represents, Governor Cuomo, used to say that we campaign in poetry, but we govern in prose. He'd say we campaign in poetry, and we govern in prose.

There were elements of Governor Bush's campaign for the president where he campaigned in poetry, that made a whole lot of sense to this governor.

SEN. LIEBERMAN: Now you tell me! (Laughter.)

SEN. CARPER: I voted for you, pal!

SEN. LIEBERMAN: (Off mike.) (Chuckles.)

SEN. CARPER: I voted for you. (Laughter.) No dimpled chad. I mean, it was a straight vote. (Laughter.)

(Laughing.) It was a clean and clear vote for you. (Laughs.)

But you know something? When we get here in Washington, and it's time to work with the prose, something -- all of our syntax has slipped a bit here, and we get -- we need to get back to a little bit of that poetry. And part of our job, as Democrats and Republicans, in the legislative branch, is to make sure that we do. Thank you.

SEN. LIEBERMAN: Thanks, Tom.

SEN. REID: We'd be happy to take questions that any of you might have.

Q Senator Lieberman, what kind of chance do you think your bill's going to have, and what kind of support? What kind of prayer does it have to pass this sort of Republican Senate, Republican House?

SEN. LIEBERMAN: Yeah. Well, we ask for everybody's prayers. There's no question about that. (Laughter.)

Look, the details of the bill we'll announce tomorrow. What's significant is that this is a bipartisan group of co-sponsors from the Senate and the House. And I think it reflects a growing recognition that climate change is a real problem. And that's not just a recognition among members of Congress. In fact, I think the American people are way ahead of members of Congress in their understanding that something unusual is happening to the planet, to the weather, and that we have a responsibility to try to do something about it now.

To do something means changing, and naturally, groups that have to change resist that change. But that's where leadership comes in, and that's what's so profoundly disappointing about the reversal that President Bush has made. The position he took during the campaign on controlling carbon dioxide emissions from power plants was an act of leadership, and it's very disappointing to see him abandon that position of leadership.

But we can pick it up now. And I think with the kind of support we expect from environmental groups, with what we think is a creative approach -- and I'm going to save the details till tomorrow, but it's a creative approach that builds on some of the most innovative parts of the Clean Air Act, and it's not kind of command-and-control environmental protection; it's more market-based, incentive-based controls -- then I think we've got a decent chance.

So I'm not kidding myself; we're fighting against some strong interest groups here.

But I would note that there are some businesses who will be in favor of this because they know this is a problem, they see other jurisdictions around the country acting, and they prefer, I think, a national solution, a national answer to the problem that will be consistent and that they can learn to live with. So it's a battle, but this is a battle worth waging. I mean, this is one of the most critical problems that I think any of us in Congress will face in the time we're privileged to serve here, and I hope we're going to show some leadership on it.

SEN. REID: Joe, the question was directed toward you, but I think, in that it's your bill, I think I would like to comment now what I think will happen on our committee.

We really have an outstanding committee. It is a bipartisan committee, as indicated, the way we reported out the brownfields legislation last week, where we had basically three dissenting votes out of 18. We have a very progressive committee. I think we're going to look at Senator Lieberman's bill very closely. And I really believe, Joe, we can report it out of our committee. I don't know all the details, as I indicated, but we have a broad consensus in our committee that we need to do something about this global climate change that's taking place.

And I think this is -- what I indicated in my initial statement, we need to do things dealing with the environment on a bipartisan basis. Our committee is nine to nine, and we think that we're going to work together on legislation like Senator Lieberman has, put it on the Senate floor and let people there make a decision what they want to do.

Q So why are there no Republicans from the committee here?

SEN. REID: Well, because I didn't ask any of the Republicans to come.

Q How come? You need their support.

SEN. REID: Well, maybe that's true, but let's be real -- let's be very clear in understanding. I don't think you're going to get a single Republican to come here and criticize what their president has done. That doesn't mean they can't do good work in the committee. You're not going -- as strong on these environmental issues as Senator Smith has been, he's not about to come and say that his president was not telling -- that he's flip-flopped -- (laughter) -- that he's disappointed the American public, that he has set an example that's not very good. I don't think we're going to hear any Republican say that. And I've been around long enough to not ask any of them to come to --

SEN. LIEBERMAN: But they'll be here tomorrow for the presentation of the proposal for the future.

Q The same groups that influenced the president to make this flip-flop are behind drilling in ANWR and boosting the generation of fossil fuel energy.

SEN. REID: No kidding. (Laughter.)

Q What does this change have to say about the political climate as you debate the energy bill?

Q If they can muscle the White House, why can't they muscle senators?

SEN. REID: If they can muscle the White House, why can't they muscle senators? Well, they only have to deal with one person down there, here they've got --

No, seriously -- (light laughter) -- I think that this is an issue that we're going to have to take the leadership on. I don't think that we can talk about why it happened down there. We can all write whatever conclusion we want. All I know is that we're committed in this committee on a bipartisan basis to do things about the environment. It's the Environment Committee. And we're going to do things about the environment including global climate change, and we're going to do it on a bipartisan basis.

Q What does it say, though, about any energy bill that's likely to come out this year?

SEN. REID: Well, there may be some things that we send -- I hope we can send some things to the White House that he's going to have to make a tough decision on. I think that -- you know, we realize that we no longer have the White House. We understand that. But I think if we send him a bill dealing with brownfields -- now, he has said in the past that he would support a brownfields legislation. This is legislation that deals with Superfund. It's a very, very critical legislation to our country. I think the president will sign that. I would hope that he wouldn't flip-flop on that. There are a number of other issues that we feel that we can change what is going on in the country today. One of those is global climate change. I think it would be a terrible, terrible legacy for this Congress if we didn't do something about global climate change. It's happening before our eyes.

Q Senator Clinton, does this decision impact or change any policies from the previous administration, and what would Al Gore -- what did he commit to do differently on this subject?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I should call on the expert on that. (Light laughter.)

SEN. REID (?): His running mate.

SEN. CLINTON: Yes. His running mate.

Well, let me just say briefly before Joe responds, there was a great commitment in the previous administration, which certainly the vice president had a leading role in shaping, that we should sign the Kyoto protocol, that we should try to negotiate with other nations around the world to deal with carbon dioxide. And I think there was a very realistic assessment by the president and the vice president that the cap and trade market-oriented strategy would be an appropriate way to try to tackle this problem. What's unfortunate about this decision based as -- best we can tell is that that's even rejected. So that it's not only a mandatory emissions standard that's rejected, but it's also the market-based proposals that we think are really productive that should be followed. And I'll let Senator Lieberman respond specifically.

SEN. LIEBERMAN: Real briefly, I mean, I think you all know Al Gore in some ways wrote the book on global warming and global climate change.

And I was in Kyoto three-plus years ago, and there was tremendous gridlock there. And when the vice president arrived, he played a critical role in getting us to the point where actually we could adopt the Kyoto protocol. So I have no doubt -- and it pains me some to speak wistfully of the -- of this, but a President Gore definitely would have supported the four-pollutant bill -- control bill that we're going to introduce tomorrow.

SEN. REID: Joe, one thing, just to elaborate on the question that was asked, what -- has this done to change what the Clinton administration has done? Let's take it back one administration. What has it done to change the Bush administration? As you know, his father signed the U.N. framework on climate change, which was the beginning of our being obligated to do something about climate change. So I think the son should talk to the father about how he's not even living up to what his father did during the time he was president.

SEN. CARPER: Could I -- just to comment on a lighter note, maybe, as we close, have any of you ever gone to the beach --

SEN. REID: You always have to ruin everything! (Laughter.)

SEN. CARPER: Have any of you ever gone to the beach over in Delaware or in Maryland on the Eastern Shore?

SEN. : Sure.

SEN. CARPER: If we don't do something about global warming -- and a part of that is carbon dioxide -- you're going to have a lot shorter drive to get to the beach. (Laughter.)

SEN. REID: That's true.

SEN. CARPER: We spent a fair amount of money, good money, to replenish the beaches from Cape Henlopen on down to Ocean City, Maryland. And --

SEN. REID: Re-landscape --

SEN. LIEBERMAN: That was definitely poetry. (Laughter.)

SEN. REID: Thank you all very much.

SEN. CARPER: (Laughs.) I'm coming to the prose. (Laughter.) All right. Thank you very much.

U.S. SENATOR PETE DOMENICI (R-NM) HOLDS HEARING ON THE FISCAL YEAR 2002 STATE DEPARTMENT BUDGET PROPOSAL, 3/14/2001

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Secretary, it's a pleasure to see you...

POWELL: Hi, Senator. Nice to see you.

CLINTON: I greatly appreciate your prepared remarks as well as your questions, and I particularly am pleased to see the emphasis that you've given to the people who are on the front lines as the troops for the State Department.

You know, we both have had the privilege of travelling throughout the world on behalf of our country and seeing the extraordinary work that is being done. And I commend you for both recognizing that and speaking out publicly, so that perhaps a broader range of the American public can understand what that work is.

In the course of those travels, I've also seen some of the impacts of our policies, and I won't go over any of the ground that has already been plowed. I'm certainly concerned about all of the issues that have been raised, but I particularly would like to have some additional information, as to how, in this budget, you will be dealing with some of the initiatives that have been started, that I've seen positive effects from. And, also, I want to raise some of my concerns about -- and following up on the chairman's remarks -- what appears to be a backing off of other important projects as well.

The trafficking of women, which we've given a lot of emphasis to in the last several years, in which this Congress has played a major role in setting forth an American commitment, the HIV-AIDS issues, which has already been addressed, but there are additional diseases, such as malaria and tuberculosis, that pose tremendous health threats not only to the people who are directly affected, but because of mobility around the globe, also to those of us here in the United States.

The continuing what I consider to be misunderstanding about the global gag rule and the unfortunate re-imposition that the president instituted early on in his administration. I, personally, have seen how our assistance for family planning has reduced abortions, reduced maternal mortality, and I would hope, Mr. Secretary, that you would be able to perhaps provide some first-hand information about that.

It clearly is already illegal for us to be supporting any entity that actually provides abortions, but many of these groups are in the business of providing information and health services, generally. And I think we will be taking a step backwards in terms of our commitment both to ending or at least diminishing abortions and improving maternal and child health, if that global gag rule stays in place.

I'm also concerned about global warming and the environmental impact of human activity throughout the globe. I am certainly disappointed that the President has backed off of his campaign promise to include CO2 emissions in an administration approach to environmental and energy policy.

But I think we have to see it in a broader light, because if we don't take leadership in working on this issue, as other countries, in particular, China and India, gain in affluence, which is something we all want, as they become more economically involved, we're going to see a tremendous increase in CO2 emission as more and more Indians and Chinese are able to afford cars and other industrialization that will lead to even greater global climate warming.

I have one specific issue, and that concerns the Migain Davida Dome (ph), which is the Israeli entity, the humanitarian aid society, which has provided emergency relief at home and around the world.

CLINTON: I've even seen it in action in the Balkans when it worked side-by-side with Christian and Muslim groups to provide aid to Kosovar refugees.

But for more than 50 years, the international committee of the Red Cross has blocked the MDA from becoming a full voting member, because it wishes to do so, not under either the Red Cross or the Red Crescent, but under its own symbol. Will the Bush administration and the State Department, in particular, Mr. Secretary, make MDA's membership in the International Committee of the Red Cross a priority in our foreign policy agenda?

POWELL: We have always supported the admission of MDA into the International Red Cross community, and we'll continue to do so.

As you know, in the previous administration, we had some diplomatic movement going on in the last year, but it sort of got derailed by the violence that broke out last fall. Hopefully, and we are all hoping that that will start to resolve itself again with a lowered level of violence, so perhaps we can pick up that diplomatic track again or find another approach that will allow MDA to be recognized and received into the international community.

Yes, it is a priority. And yes, we will continue to push for that, as we have in the past.

CLINTON: I look forward to working with you, Mr. Secretary.

POWELL: Thank you, Senator. And on these other issues, time doesn't permit a full expansion of comment on them, but trafficking in women is certainly something that will remain a priority. And we appreciate what Congress has done in the past and will not ignore that direction.

And you're quite correct in pointing out that malaria and TB and other infectious diseases are once again back on the rise and present the same kind of difficulty that HIV-AIDS does.

Mexico City policy, of course, you know the president felt strongly about that and reinstituted it. But at the same time, family planning assistance money is still a more than $400 million account, and we are making sure that that stays in place.

Global warming: We are reviewing our overall policy as we prepare for the next conference that'll be taking place in Europe in July. And the president's decision yesterday on CO2, you're quite familiar with, but we are still undertaking a broader policy review to prepare ourselves for the next conference.

CLINTON: I would look forward to learning more about that. I just believe it will be difficult for us to exert leadership if we won't tend to our own problems here at home. And I hope that we're able to work that out.

Thank you.

U.S. SENATOR HARRY REID (D-NV) HOLDS NEWS CONFERENCE WITH OTHER DEMOCRATS REGARDING CARBON EMISSION STANDARDS, 3/14/2001

CLINTON: Thank you, so much, and I look forward to co-sponsoring that legislation that you've worked so hard on to introduce tomorrow.

You know, last September, during the presidential campaign in Saginaw, Michigan, candidate George Bush said -- and I just happen to have the Bush-Cheney web page about announcing a comprehensive national energy policy. And I quote: "We will require all power plants to meet clean air standards in order to reduce emissions of sulfur dioxide, nitrogen oxide, mercury and carbon dioxide."

Now yesterday President George Bush said, and I quote: "I do not believe that the government should impose on power plants mandatory emissions reductions for carbon dioxide."

A promise made and a promise broken. In less than eight weeks in office, President Bush has gone from CO2 to see you later.

The overwhelming consensus of scientists around the world is, as Senator Lieberman so well stated, that the global warming crisis is real, it is caused by carbon dioxide emissions and if we don't do something about it, we will all experience severe environmental consequences.

CLINTON: Now, that is of great concern to all of us, but particularly to coastal states like Connecticut and Delaware and New York.

In changing his tune about environmental protection, President Bush has left his EPA commissioner, Governor Christie Todd Whitman, out on a limb. On several occasions she has repeated the president's campaign pledge, including to the Environment and Public Works Committee as well as recently at the intentional conference, that this administration would lead the way in reducing carbon dioxide emissions.

Apparently she did not have any idea that her boss had other plans in mind.

Treasury Secretary Paul O'Neill has said that if we fail to act on this problem, it amounts to a, quote, "real danger to civilization." And I don't think anyone who's met or seen the secretary in action thinks he's a man much given to exaggeration. This is clearly a very deeply held conviction based on the work that he's done in the private sector for so many decades.

But what concerns me more is not the fact that President Bush has abandoned his own Cabinet secretaries. It's the fact that he's abandoned his commitment to leave no child behind, because the real victims of global warming will be our children and their children, who will live with the environmental consequences of this administration's neglect.

I know the president is in favor of eliminating the inheritance tax, but this policy reversal on global warming amounts to the imposition of a new inheritance tax on those who will inherit the Earth.

It also concerns me because of the impact on America's leadership on environmental protection. How can we go to a global conference on global warming and fight to have other nations combat this environmental threat if we aren't willing to take steps in our country to deal with this problem?

I posed this question to Secretary Powell when he appeared before the Budget Committee today, because to me the president's flip-flop in effect gives to all other nations a license to pollute. The consequences of this decision are so grave and long lasting, that we hope that the president and his advisers, particularly the vice president, who apparently leads the administration efforts on energy, the environment and the economy, will take a second look at this pledge that was made during the campaign and reconsider the implications of reversing it.

REID: We'll be happy to take questions now.

LIEBERMAN: Let Tom speak.

REID: Oh, Tom.

(LAUGHTER)

REID: Well, that's how they don't follow my instructions because...

CARPER: I yielded to the gentlewoman from...

CLINTON: He pushed me onto the stage, basically.

(LAUGHTER)

I think he wanted to be the clean-up hitter.

CARPER: I'm not here to talk about this, the greenhouse. I'm not here to talk about carbon dioxide. I'm just here to announce that this weekend, Hillary and I get to move out of our broom closets in the basement...

(LAUGHTER)

... of the Dirksen Building and we will have like a real office. We will adults. We will be grownups.

CLINTON: This is so exciting.

CARPER: And it's pretty exciting. In less than three months after we took office, we will have...

CLINTON: We're the only ones left.

CARPER: I know we are.

Corzine, he's moved uptown and we're still down there in the dregs.

During the last campaign, there were a number of things -- and I probably shouldn't say this my Democratic colleagues here, but there were a number of things proposed by then-Governor Bush that then-Governor Carper agreed with. I liked his proposals on education reform. I suspect we all did.

If we are going to invest we ought to invest more money in our schools. We ought to provide more money flexibility to the schools and school districts who get that money. We should demand results if we're going to provide greater funds and more flexibility. We ought to empower parents to have more choices on where their kids go to school. I thought that was a good idea. He said we should do those things and as he's president, he's leading the charge to do it.

As a candidate for the presidency he outlined an approach that would attempt to provide health care coverage to some of the 40-plus million Americans who don't have it. And what he said we should do is to offer families a refundable tax credit, worth as much as $2,500 a year, to bring health care coverage and within range of a lot of folks, millions of those folks that don't have health care coverage today.

He said that was a good idea and he actually reiterated it again in his State of the Union message a couple of weeks ago.

Governor Bush also talked about the need to seriously address bringing carbon dioxide emissions under control. And this governor, a couple of months ago, applauded when I heard him say those things.

He has kept his word as best I can tell on education reform. He's kept his word as best I can tell on refundable tax credit for health care. But it would appear, to me at least, that he has succumbed to some intense pressure from across the country, maybe from other industries, that have lead him to change his position on this particular matter. And I think that's unfortunate.

And what's important is he feels those pressures to change his position, to reverse his position in this important area. I think it's critical for those of us who have an entirely different view, who regard carbon dioxide emissions and greenhouse gas and the overheating in our atmosphere and ever-larger ozone, if those of us who regard those as serious, serious matters for our planet, we have to speak up and be as loud and as persistent and hopefully as persuasive as those who have leaned on the president to get him to change his view.

CARPER: The last thing I would say, the fellow who used to be governor of the state that Senator Clinton now represents, Governor Cuomo, used to say that we campaign in poetry, but we govern in prose.

There are elements of Governor Bush's campaign for the presidency, where he campaigned in poetry, that made a whole lot of sense to this governor.

LIEBERMAN: Now you tell me.

(LAUGHTER)

CARPER: I voted for you, pal. I voted for you.

(LAUGHTER)

No, dimpled chad. I was a straight voter. A clean and clear vote for you.

But you know something? When we get here in Washington and it times to work with the prose, something -- a little more syntax is slipped a bit here. And we need to get back to a little bit of that poetry.

And part of our job is, as Democrats and Republicans in the legislative branch, is to make sure that we do.

Thank you.

LIEBERMAN: Thanks, Tom.

REID: We would be happy to take questions that any of you might have.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

LIEBERMAN: Well, we asked for everybody's prayers. There's no question about that.

(LAUGHTER)

Look, the details of the bill we will announce tomorrow. What's significant is that is a bipartisan group of cosponsors from the Senate and the House. And I think it reflects a growing recognition that climate change is as real problem.

And that's not just the recognition among members of Congress. In fact, I think the American people are way ahead of members of Congress in their understanding that something is unusual is happening to the planet, to the weather and that we have a responsibility to try to do something about it now.

To do something means changing and naturally groups that have to change resist that change. But that's where leadership comes in.

And that's what so profoundly disappointing about the reversal that President Bush has made. The position he took during the campaign on controlling carbon dioxide emissions from power plants was an act of leadership. And it's very disappointment to see him abandon that position of leadership.

But we can pick it up now. And I think with the kind of support we expect from environmental groups with what we think is a creative approach -- and I'm going to save the details until tomorrow -- but it's a creative approach that builds on some of the most innovative parts of the Clean Air Act and it's not, kind of, command and control environmental protection. It's more market-based, incentive-based controls, then I think we've got a decent chance.

So I'm not kidding myself. We're fighting against some strong interest groups here, but I would note that there are some businesses who will be in favor of this because they know this is a problem, they see other jurisdictions around the country acting and they prefer, I think, a national solution, a national answer to the problem that will be consistent and that they can learn to live with.

So it's a battle, but this is a battle worth waging. I mean this is one of the most critical problems that I think any of us in Congress will face in the time we're privileged to serve here and I hope we're going to show some leadership on it.

REID: Joe, the question was directed toward you, but I think that in it's your bill, I think I would like to comment on what I think will happen in our committee.

We really have an outstanding committee. It is a bipartisan committee as indicated the way we reported out the brownfields legislation last week, where we had basically three dissenting votes out of 18. We have a very progressive committee. I think we're going to look at Senator Lieberman's bill very closely and I really believe, Joe, we can report it out of our committee.

I don't know all of the details, as I indicated, but we have a broad consensus in our committee that we need to do something about this global climate change that's taking place. And I think this is, what I indicated in my initial statement, we need to do things dealing with the environment on a bipartisan basis.

REID: Our committee is nine to nine and we think that we're going to work together on legislation like Senator Lieberman has, and put it on the Senate floor and let people there make a decision what they want to do.

QUESTION: So why are there no Republicans from the committee here?

REID: Well, because I didn't ask any of the Republicans to come.

QUESTION: How come, if you need their support?

REID: Well, maybe that's true but let's be real. Let's be very clear and understanding. I don't think you're going to get a single Republican to come here and criticize what their president has done. That doesn't mean they can't do good work in the committee.

I mean, as strong on these environmental issues as Senator Smith has been, he's not about to come and say that his president was not telling -- that he's flip-flopped, that he's disappointed the American public, that he's set an example that's not very good. I don't think we can get any Republicans to say that and I've been around long enough to not ask any of them to come to...

LIEBERMAN: But they will be here tomorrow for the presentation of the proposal for the future.

QUESTION: The same groups that influenced this president to make this flip-flop are behind drilling in ANWR and boosting the generation of fossil fuel energy.

REID: No kidding.

(LAUGHTER)

QUESTION: What does this change have to say about the political climate as you debate the energy one?

QUESTION: If they can muzzle the White House, why can't they muzzle senators?

REID: If they can muzzle the White House, why can't they muzzle senators? Well, they only have to deal with one person down there. Here they've got -- no, seriously, I think that this is an issue that we're going to have to take leadership on. I don't think that we can talk about why it happened down there. We can all arrive at whatever conclusion we want.

All I know is that we're committed in this committee on a bipartisan basis to do things about the environment. It's the Environment Committee and we're going to do thing about the environment, including global climate change and we're going to do it on a bipartisan basis.

QUESTION: What does it say about any energy bill that's likely to come out this year?

REID: Well, there may be some things that we send -- I hope we can send some things to the White House that he's going to have to make a tough decision on. We're -- I think that -- you know, we realize that we no longer have the White House. We understand that. But I think that if we send him a bill dealing with brownfields -- now he has said in the past that he would support a brownfields legislation. This is legislation that deals with SuperFund. It's very, very critical legislation to our country.

I think the president will sign that. I would hope that he wouldn't flip-flop on that.

There are a number of other issues that we feel that we can change what's going on in the country today. One of those is global climate change. I think it would be a terrible, terrible legacy for this Congress, if we didn't do something about global climate change. It's happening before our eyes.

QUESTION: Senator Clinton, does this decision impact or change any policies from the previous administration? And what would Al Gore, what did he commit to do differently on the subject?

CLINTON: Well, I should call on the expert on that. Yes, his running mate.

Let me just say briefly before Joe responds, there was a great commitment in the previous administration, which certainly the vice president has a leading role in shaping, that we should sign the Kyoto protocol, that we should try to negotiate with other nations around the world to deal with carbon dioxide. And I think there was a very realistic assessment by the president and the vice president that the cap and trade market-oriented strategy would be an appropriate way to try to tackle this problem.

What's unfortunate about this decision, based as best we can tell, is that that's even rejected. So that it's not only a mandatory emissions standard that's rejected, but it's also the market-based proposals that we think are really productive, that should be followed.

And I will let Senator Lieberman respond specifically.

LIEBERMAN: Real briefly, I mean I think you all know Al Gore, in some ways, wrote the book on global warming and global climate change. And I was in Kyoto three-plus years ago and there was tremendous gridlock there. And when the vice president arrived, he played a critical role in getting us to the point where actually we could adopt the Kyoto Protocol.

So I have no doubt, and it pains me some to speak wistfully of this, but a President Gore definitely would have supported the four pollutant control bill that we're going to introduce tomorrow.

REID: Joe, one thing, just to elaborate on the question that was asked, what has this done to change what the Clinton administration has done? Let's take it back one administration. What has it done to change the Bush administration?

As you know his father signed the UN Framework on Climate Change, which was the beginning of our being obligated to do something about climate change. So I think the son should talk to the father because he's not even living up to what his father did during the time he was president.

CARPER: Could I add just a comment on a lighter note, maybe as we close?

(LAUGHTER)

REID: You always have to ruin everything.

(LAUGHTER)

CARPER: I know.

Have any of you ever gone to the beach over in Delaware or in Maryland, on the Eastern Shore? Sure.

If we don't do something about global warming and part of that is carbon dioxide, you're going to have a lot shorter drive...

REID: That's true.

CARPER: ... to get to the beach.

We spent a fair amount of money, good money, to replenish the beaches from Cape Henlopen on down to Ocean City, Maryland.

LIEBERMAN: That was definitely poetry.

(LAUGHTER)

REID: Thank you all very much.

CARPER: I'm coming to the prose.

All right, thank you all very much.

END

U.S. SENATOR CHARLES SCHUMER (D-NY) HOLDS NEWS CONFERENCE WITH OTHERS REGARDING THE CARBON EMISSIONS STANDARDS, 3/15/2001

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Senator Jeffords.

I'm proud to be a cosponsor of the Clean Power Act of 2001, and I really commend the hard work that Senator Jeffords has done and in the House, particularly, my colleague Sherwood Boehlert and Henry Waxman, and everyone who's come together to send a very clear message that this is a problem whose time has come, and we are required to act.

We target, in this bill, four pollutants that contribute to some of our nation's most serious health and environmental concerns. We already know, there isn't any doubt, that these pollutants give us smog, acid rain, mercury contamination and global warming. They cause respiratory problems, deforestation, rising sea levels and developmental ailments in children. Now that all sounds like something out of the book of Exodus in the Bible, but it's not. It's in our air, and it's real threats that are confronting us all over New York and our country every day.

I remember going to Big Moose Lake in the Adirondacks and how sad it was to stand on the shore of that lake and to hear how there were no more fish. There were no more loons. There was an occasional moose that lost his way coming from Maine to go somewhere else. But, you know, Joe, it was just tragic to, you know, listen to the people who had grown up in that area, who can remember what it was not so very long ago and to see what we have wrought because this is a human-made problem. And it's time to act now because here in the 21st century we're still dealing with 19th century air pollution challenges, and this is a response to reality.

It's a serious pollution problem. With all due respect to the president with his change of view on carbon dioxide emissions, he is overlooking the reality that this bill is market-based, technologically feasible, bipartisan and effective. And it could be called just as easily the Breath of Fresh Air Act because that's what it will give our children and our grandchildren and children to come.

I know it's a priority in New York. I believe it's a priority in every part of America, and I would only echo what Chuck said, if it's not a problem in your community yet, you are not immune, it will be. And now is the time to prevent its further spread and to try to undo the damage that has already occurred.

JEFFORDS: Thank you, Senator.

Now we have one of the hardest working and most able senators from good old New England and from the rest of the country.

(UNKNOWN): Thank you very much.

I want to commend my colleagues, particularly the leaders on both sides, Senator Jeffords, Senator Lieberman, Congressman Boehlert, Congressman Waxman, Senator Clinton, Senator Schumer. We're here because we recognize the huge costs that's have been imposed upon our communities by air pollution.

In the northeast we suffer a double whammy. First, tons of pollutants are transported each year into the Northeast degrading our rivers imperiling the health of our neighbors. But then, in addition to that, we have to pay more for our own utilities, our own industries, so that we can comply with existing laws with respect to air pollution. It's not only unhealthy. It's unfair, and the strategy outlined in this legislation will improve the health, and it's imminently fair. I support it strongly.

I am very disappointed that the president, yesterday, reneged on his commitment. He did not make a mistake a few months ago when he pledged to curb pollution. He made the mistake yesterday. I hope, through this legislation, we can rectify that mistake.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

CLINTON: Well, I'll have to let others respond to that.

CLINTON: I know that when Administrator Whitman appeared before the Environment and Public Works Committee during her confirmation hearings and in a number of settings after that, as Senator Lieberman clearly pointed out, she certainly made her commitment known. And, you know, I'm hoping that she and others within the administration will bring the evidence to bear on this issue, and I know how administrations work, I think, and I believe that there's an opportunity here for the president to, you know, perhaps take a second look at this.

NEWS CONFERENCE WITH SENATE DEMOCRATS REGARDING THE BUSH ADMINISTRATION'S ENVIRONMENTAL ROLLBACKS, 3/23/2001

SEN. BOXER: You bet. And our wrap-up, Senator Clinton.

SEN. CLINTON: Thank you, Senator Boxer and --

SEN. BOXER: I want to say, a colleague on the Environment Committee.

SEN. CLINTON: That's right. And I want to thank Senator Boxer, my good friend, for getting us all together and my colleague, Senator Schumer. And Senator Nelson, maybe your governor could talk to the president. That might be informative.

If you want to know about National Poison Prevention Week, you can go right to the EPA's Web site. It's www.EPA.gov. And there you can find that this week is designed to help us, as President Kennedy said when he designated it so many years ago, "to raise awareness of dangers of unintentional poisoning." That's why we're here today, to raise awareness of the dangers of unintentional poisoning.

But the danger now is coming from the EPA under the leadership of President Bush, and it's unfortunately not so unintentional. Now, we've all heard about President Bush's charm offensive. But now his administration appears to be on a harm offensive. It's as though he were trying out for a remake of "Arsenic and About-Face," because that's really what we've seen here. He's on a harm offensive to do harm to our environment and our children's health as he rolls back regulations designed to protect us from poisons like arsenic and emissions that cause global warming.

I know that many of us find this hard to believe. I mean, if you've gotten the sense from my colleagues that we're amazed to be standing here talking about this, I think you've gotten the right impression. You know, arsenic is something we should be working to keep out of our drinking water, not lifting standards so that it can remain in it.

As Barbara so well pointed out, it is a carcinogen. And I would just add to her very eloquent presentation that it has a greater effect in smaller dosages on children. You know, Barbara and I have gone around for years saying that children are not just little adults. You know, their systems in every way cannot take as much as adults can. And this is a perfect example of that.

I want to add one other thing that I just learned today, shortly before coming here, which I found equally amazing. There's even news that the administration has delayed regulations designed to alert the public to emissions of lead into the environment. Now, I believe our colleagues will stand up and will fight on this one as well. The federal registry is starting to read like an obituary for America's environment.

Now, almost 40 years ago, Rachel Carson wrote "Silent Spring," which helped inspire the modern environmental movement, and I think raised awareness certainly in my home, and I imagine across our country. Well, we're here today to say this will not be a silent spring. If the administration thought they could sneak these things through in the federal register, that they could issue these rollbacks and everybody would yawn, they're in for a great awakening.

We want to be sure that everyone, and I mean everyone -- every mother who worries about what comes out of the tap, every father who worries about the air that his child breathes -- that every single person in this country hears about what the administration is trying to do to our air, our land and our water. We want to be sure that we do everything we can in this body to stop this assault on our environment and our health.

I'm just so grateful to be standing here with colleagues who understand what's at stake in this struggle. It would be very nice if the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue would reverse direction once again, admit that they are wrong, admit that they don't need to do these things, and join hands with us to keep making progress in a bipartisan way on behalf of protecting our health and our environment. You know, it's never too late. And so we would invite that rethinking on CO2, on logging, on arsenic and lead. But if there's not going to be a change in attitude, then we will do everything we can in this body to protect the health and safety of American children.

Thank you very much.

U.S. SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (D-NY) HOLDS NEWS CONFERENCE ON STIFFER PENALTIES FOR VIOLATIONS OF EQUAL PAY ACT, 6/12/2001

U.S. SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D-NY): Thank you so much, Veronica.

U.S. SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D-NY): And I am delighted to be introduced by Veronica who has a story to tell that is a story similar to stories that I've heard from women throughout our country. And I'm delighted that she's a member of Local 3 IBEW, which has been a great source of support for me and does exactly what Veronica said, namely provide equal pay for equal work and make it clear that what matters is how you work not who performs the work. And so, Veronica's determination to fight for a job where work is valued and rewarded, like that of her male counterparts, really is an inspiration to us all.

And I thank her for joining us today, representing thousands of working women who are determined to make the same case that their work, too, should be valued.

I want to thank my good friend and the honorary chairwoman of the National Committee on Pay Equity, Linda Chavez-Thompson.

(APPLAUSE)

Linda has been a stalwart supporter of working families and women's rights for many, many years and is one of the real leaders in our country for the simple proposition that you should receive equal pay for equal work, and she has lived it and she is now leading the campaign for it.

I also want to thank Senator Kennedy, who could not be here today for his lifelong commitment. And I want to thank my good friend and a real champion of working people throughout our country, Senator Tom Harkin from Iowa, who is just as effective a legislator and advocate as you can find in the Senate or our country.

(APPLAUSE)

He's a dear friend of mine and I admire his work on so many issues. But his constant support for the issues that matter to working families really sets him apart.

I'd also like to thank my colleagues from the House, Congresswomen Rosa DeLauro and Eleanor Holmes Norton for being here.

(APPLAUSE)

Both of them have a real history of caring about these issues. Neither of them are "Janie's Come Lately" to...

(LAUGHTER)

... concern about women's issues or equal pay.

Yesterday was a momentous day in our nation's history because -- I guess, it was Sunday, on June 10, 1963, we ended a protracted an 18- year battle to enact the Equal Pay Act into law.

On signing this landmark legislation, President Kennedy remarked, "This measure adds to our laws another structure basic to democracy. It will add protection at the working place to the women, the same rights at the working place, in a sense, that they have enjoyed at the polling place."

It meant that the days of newspaper job listings, which I can actually remember, although many of you are too young to recall, that differentiated between men's jobs and women's jobs with differing pay scales would slowly, but surely, come to an end.

But June 10, 1963, also marked the beginning of a new battle, and one that we're still struggling with today: Equal pay still doesn't exist for working women and families in 21st century America.

At the signing of the Equal Pay Act, women earned 59 cents for every dollar earned by men. Today, women earn 72 cents on the dollars. So according to my math, it's taken us 38 years to win another 13 cents. Well, at that rate of progress, it seems that women won't win equal pay until sometime near the end of this century.

And we're here today to say loudly and clearly that the women and families of America will not and cannot and should not wait that long for simple justice in the workplace.

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: Nearly 40 years after President Kennedy signed that ground breaking legislation, jobs held predominantly by women are consistently short changed and under-valued in pay compared to jobs primarily held by men. Jobs typically held by women are paid 17 to 20 percent less than comparable jobs held by men.

Now I don't know about you, but I've never known a woman able to get away with going to a grocery store and saying I want a 17 to 22 percent discount because I'm a woman. Well, that's not the way it works. We're expected though to get by on less. And this is not just an issue for women like Veronica who has worked her way up and had a convenience store job, a gas station job, an electrician job, and is now an independent contractor. This is an issue for all women.

The other day, I was reading an article about a group of women who are tenured professors at MIT and Yale and places like that, who have discovered that they also don't get equal pay. A molecular biologist at Yale University said, "A woman is expected to be twice as good for half as much."

Well, this pervasive problem affects women in every type of profession. During the mid-1990s, in addition to making breakthroughs in scientific research, Dr. Nancy Hopkins (ph), a professor of biology at MIT uncovered, with the help of other women professors, a pattern of wage discrimination against female professors at that university. Regardless of their education level, regardless of the workplace environment, the wage gap is a reality.

Now, there are some, and I know that they will be on their web sites and they'll be calling reporters as soon as we finish this press conference, who are saying, "This is just another imaginary kind of issue. It doesn't really exist. The reason that women aren't given equal pay is that women take time out to care for children. Women cut back on workloads in order to fulfill family responsibilities," and you know, we do, and I'm glad we do. And I wish our country were more understanding of the many roles that women play in caring for children and caring for aging relatives.

(APPLAUSE)

But the fact is, that it is a real issue. You know, when you're pumping gas or doing research on molecular biology, and you're in the workplace and you're putting your time in to do that work, you should not be discriminated against. And this is not just a women's issue, this is a family issue because the average American family loses $4,000 a year to unequal pay. That not only hurts women, it hurts single mothers, it hurts working couples, it hurts children and it hurts our economy.

If the wage gap were eliminated, for example, New York women would, on average, make an additional $4,080 per year. Now, that can make a significant difference in the life of any family. And in New York alone, eliminating the gender wage gap would reduce the number of single-mother households living in poverty from 21.2 percent to 10.5 percent.

Let me just repeat that because, you know, we made a bargain with women on welfare that if they were willing to work, they would be rewarded for work. We wanted to make work pay. But we could cut in half the level of poverty for working single moms if they received equal pay for their work in restaurants, and on factory lines, and in all kinds of other settings.

For all these reasons, my colleagues and I have joined in the Paycheck Fairness Act. Senator Harkin and I are co-sponsoring Senator Daschle's Paycheck Fairness Act, which would close loopholes, increase penalties and strengthen enforcement of prohibitions addressing paycheck discrimination on the basis of gender.

You know, I'm just absolutely convinced that this is an issue of economic freedom, it's an issue of economic justice. It's an issue just of plain old-fashioned fairness. And we're going to have to keep fighting until we bring that bill to the floor and get a positive vote out of the Senate and then, my colleagues in the House will get the same positive vote out of the House.

CLINTON: And we will, I hope, have another bill-signing ceremony in the White House to make good on our promise of equal pay.

(APPLAUSE)

Now, I have the honor of introducing Kelly Thomas (ph), a junior at Norfolk State, who is working her way through college, because she believes in the promise of higher education. And for Kelly (ph) and all the other young women in our country who graduate from college and expect to have their hard work pay off, it's time for us to make sure that their dreams are not diminished by wage discrimination. Please join me in welcoming Kelly Thomas (ph).

KELLY THOMAS (ph): Thank you, Senator Clinton.

I am thrilled to be here today to stand with you and other members of Congress and all these beautiful and energetic women. And I know you're all fighting for equal pay for women like me and I thank you.

My name is Kelly Thomas (ph) and I am a junior at Norfolk State University. I am working as a waitress six days a week to help me get through school. I am working very hard because I know that the higher education is absolutely necessary to get a good job these days. I want to go to graduate school as a licensed clinical social worker.

But after all the years of education and all the hard work, I ask myself sometimes, will my reward be? Will I be able to pay my bills, purchase a new home and be economically secure? I honestly don't think so, as an African-American woman. I am only going to make 66 cents for every dollar that I earn. So what's the incentive for me to work hard and get advanced degrees, when I know that men with the same education, skills and experience will be making a lot more money than me and able to buy their first home and take their vacation and able to save for their future. It's totally unfair.

I've gone on the AFL.

(APPLAUSE)

I have gone on the AFL-CIO's web site and they have a calculator that estimates projective loss of earnings for women. And given my education and job category, my loss of earnings to unequal pay over my lifetime could reach as high as $888,000 -- that's outrageous. That's why, as a young woman, I am here today to tell Congress and President Bush that I need help and so do millions of other women about to enter the work field. We want an deserve a full-day's pay for a full-day's work and we want you to hold employers accountable when they don't pay me what I'm worth.

Thank you all for helping us battle this.

(APPLAUSE)

I am now privileged to introduce our next speaker, Senator Tom Harkin, who has spent his life speaking out for working people like me. It is my honor to introduce a champion for working families, and on behalf of millions of other working women across this nation, I want to personally thank you for all you do for us. Senator Tom Harkin.

(APPLAUSE)

U.S. SENATOR THOMAS HARKIN (D-IA): Thank you, Kelly (ph).

Kelly, thank you very much and thanks for, once again, reaffirming our faith in the younger generation. I want to thank Senator Clinton for her great leadership, not only on this issue, but so many other issues that affect social justice and economic justice in our country.

HARKIN: I want to thank my colleagues who are here from House, Eleanor Holmes Norton, and also Rosa DeLauro.

As a longtime avowed feminist, I am proud to be standing here with you today.

(APPLAUSE)

Only have one request: Can I get one of those t-shirts?

(LAUGHTER)

I also want to thank Linda Chavez-Thompson from the National Committee on Pay Equity in the AFL-CIO for organizing this important event.

I'd like to reiterate that the signing of the Equal Pay Act was historic, as Senator Clinton said, and since then America's working women have come a long way. But we need to do a better job by strengthening the penalties of that law. That's why I am a proud co-sponsor of Senator Daschle's Paycheck Fairness Act.

Last year, I offered this bill as an amendment to the tax bill, but unfortunately, it failed to pass by just a few votes. But I believe this year will be different in the Senate; we have a real opportunity to get it through.

Some people, as has been said, say there is no wage gap and we don't need this legislation to close it. But I say that anyone who tries to deny that have their eyes closed and their heads buried in the sand. As Kelly (ph) just so eloquently stated, there is that pay gap out there for women, especially women in traditional women's job.

The Paycheck Fairness Act is a good first step. It will close that chapter on the Equal Pay Act that was signed into law in 1963. We do need to stiffen the penalties and to make sure that we do have equal pay for equal work.

But there is also another step that we need, and that is the passage of the Fair Pay Act, which I and Eleanor Holmes Norton first introduced in 1996. This bill targets the underpaying of traditional female jobs, Kelly (ph), like you were talking about, like nursing and teaching and child care and social work.

These traditional female jobs is where the real gap is out there, and we can't afford to let this continue any longer. We have a dire need in this country for good child care, for social workers. Why should a probation officer, who is mostly male, get paid a third more than a social worker, predominantly female? There's absolutely no justification for that.

We need to hire tens of thousands of new teachers in the next decade. Many of them will be women. They should have their pay closed, and to make it equal, not just equal pay for equal work, but for equal pay for comparable work. Work that is traditionally women's jobs need to be raised up.

(APPLAUSE)

So that's why I say, now is the time, this year is the time to do the two things that need to be done: to close the chapter on the 1963 bill and make sure we have the adequate penalties, but to also close the sad, long chapter of women in traditional women's jobs getting paid less than men in traditional men's jobs. Let's take those steps this year, let's close that door, let's truly have equal pay for all of the people in this country for the good work they do.

Thank you.

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: Now I'm delighted to introduce my colleague from the House, Congresswoman Rosa DeLauro.

U.S. REPRESENTATIVE ROSA DELAURO (D-CT): Thank you so very, very much, Hillary. It's a delight to be here with you, Senator Clinton. It's nice to say those words.

I also might add, I just see Dorothy Height, who is here. And we want to just say thank you to you for being a role model for all of us in your good work of being a champion of women and their families. Thank you so much.

(APPLAUSE)

To Senator Clinton, to Senator Kennedy, Senator Harkin, to my colleague in the House, Eleanor Holmes Norton, we are here really to commemorate the anniversary of the signing of the Equal Pay Act.

And we are here today with Veronica, and with Kelly (ph), to say that it is past time that women in this country, that the work that they do is valued and that we have got to make sure that they do have pay equity, because what pay equity is about is valuing the hard work that women do in our country.

NORTON: To the AFL-CIO, to Linda Chavez Thompson, for all of the wonderful work that you have done over the years, and putting together today's event. You know, I was in Chicago a couple of years ago where there were about 5,000 women strong where we talked about paycheck fairness and I will tell you, my friends, that it was palpable.

What an amazing turnout of folks, and this is what we're going to try to do, as one of my colleagues said, is everyone in this nation should be on the phone calling their elected representatives and telling them that it is their obligation as a public servant to sign on to the Pay Equity Act, to make sure that we do close this wage gap.

(APPLAUSE)

To Senator Kennedy, a thank you for making this one of the top priorities as the new chairman of the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee. What a difference a democratic majority can make.

(APPLAUSE)

We want the same type of commitment to equal pay in the House of Representatives. More than 151 members, both men and women, have stood up for working women by cosponsoring the Paycheck Fairness Act. That's a lot, my friends, but it's not enough, and today I am urging every member of the House to take a look at this bill and what it will do for working families to cosponsor the legislation and, in fact, to stand up for working women.

We need to follow Senator Kennedy's leadership and have hearings on the legislation in the House as well. Let's get a look at what the facts are. Study after study shows that the pay gap is real, it's unfair to working women, it robs them and their families on an average of $4,000 each and every year. It's not fair and it isn't right.

I will call on Speaker Hastert to hold hearings on this legislation. Let the facts speak for themselves because what the facts do, they compel us to pass the Paycheck Fairness Act, to pass it now because America's women have waited long enough.

(APPLAUSE)

You know, there are some, as Senator Clinton pointed out, that they claim that the challenges of working women stem from their own choices, that they are there trying to, quote, "have it all." But too often, entering the work force is not a choice, it is a necessity, and when we fight for equal pay, we are not just asking for economic justice for women.

DELAURO: We are fighting for the families who simply cannot get by without a second paycheck every single week. Nearly two-thirds of working women provide half or more of their household income, and 41 percent are the sole source of income. These families are struggling to pay the rent, to make the mortgage payment, to buy the groceries, to pay the medical bills and to save for their children's education. The persistent undervaluing of women is where it compels us to pass this legislation now.

I was proud to introduce this legislation in the House and the Paycheck Fairness Act would, for the first time, put wage discrimination on the basis of gender on the same footing as wage discrimination on the base of race or ethnicity. It would toughen the remedy provisions of the Equal Pay Act by allowing for compensatory and punitive damages as well as make it easier for cases to proceed as class actions.

It lifts the gag rule that prevents women from even discussing their wages so that they can compare their salaries and ensure that they are being paid a fair wage. It would empower America's working women to fight wage discrimination and win the paycheck they have earned for themselves and their families.

The wage gap is now at its lowest point ever; that's progress, but it's not enough. It's time for us, as a nation, to say that we acknowledge the contributions that women make to our society. Their values, America's values, demand equal pay and on this anniversary, we need to rededicate our lives. And I say to the folks who may be listening or watching, women and men and American families, let your elected representatives here from you and instruct them that what they ought to be doing is to be for pay equity, to be for it now or they, in fact, face the peril and the wrath of those folks who are being cheated for their hard earned worth in this country.

Thank you.

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: You know every time I hear Rosa speak and, you know, you just get a small taste of the energy and enthusiasm that she brings to the cause that she believes in, I think of her mother, a working mom who I have known and admired and it really is a great fitting tribute to her that Rosa is here once again fighting for justice for all people, especially women, and I want to just amplify Rosa's remarks, that we're joined today by a real pioneer, a pioneer on behalf of civil rights, human rights and human rights.

Dorothy Height worked with Eleanor Roosevelt. Dorothy Height has been there on every important occasion where the cause of human freedom and opportunity has been advanced in our country. And for all the younger people, both who are here for this event and some who are passing by and standing and waiting and watching, I hope you'll learn about Dorothy Height. I know that she's someone who deserves all the accolades she's received and is truly a historic figure, and we're delighted that she's here with us.

Thank you so much, Ms. Height.

(APPLAUSE)

Now it's my great pleasure to introduce someone who has fought for the District of Columbia, who has fought for working families and for women all of her life, fought for equal opportunity at the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and comes today once again fighting for equal pay.

Please welcome Eleanor Holmes Norton.

(APPLAUSE)

U.S. CONGRESSWOMAN ELEANOR HOLMES NORTON (D-DC): Thank you very much. Linda Chavez-Thompson...

(CROSSTALK)

NORTON: ... for bringing our coalition together, thank you Tom, thank you Hillary, thank you Rosa and thanks to our two real women who have been here to let you know in person what it means not to be paid equally because of your sex.

I am a proud co-sponsor of two equal pay bills. And the coalition you see around you supports two equal bills, because it's going to take two to tango to get women back to where they ought to be for fair pay.

I am proudly a co-sponsor of the Paycheck Fairness Act, which would update the Equal Pay Act. It was my great honor to administer, as chair of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. But my friends, the act is 40 years old. It is way out of date. It doesn't do the job anymore.

What the Paycheck Fairness Act would do is to minimally bring the Equal Pay Act up to operating in the 21st century workplace, by -- would you believe this? -- simply putting into the Equal Pay Act what is already in all the other civil rights acts. You could bring a suit as a class action, for example, as you cannot under the Equal Pay Act. You could get compensatory damages and punitive damages as you can under other civil rights act.

And an employer could not sanction you if you asked a co-worker what his wages were, and he willingly told you, then you could not be fired as you can be fired now, because there are employers that say, "If you discuss your wages in the workplace then you no longer have a job," because he knows that women will then find out often that they are being paid less than men doing the same job in the same workplace. We got to get that fixed.

But, Tom Harkin, my partner in crime...

(LAUGHTER)

... and I have gone one step further because we know that 70 percent of working women will not be helped by the wonderful Equal Pay Act, because they work in women-only jobs. You can't compare them to a man doing the same work, because they don't do the same work as men. And I'm glad that the teachers are willing to continue to teach our children, even if men aren't. And I'm glad that women are willing to nurse in our hospitals, if men aren't. And we will stop chasing them out of these professions if we simply pay them what they are worth.

(APPLAUSE)

A women who does a job with the same skill, effort and responsibility as a man should be paid the same as he is, even if they call him something different. Then they call him a probation officer and they may call here a social worker, but they're doing the same hard work out here in the neighborhoods of the District of Columbia, pay them the same.

(APPLAUSE)

And to put our money where our mouth is, Tom Harkin and I, and he and I have talked about this personally, Tom Harkin and I are today releasing a letter to the GAO to ask them to study the work of 20 states that have done exactly what the Fair Pay Act would have done. There are 20 states in the United States -- Hillary, New York is one -- where women workers, most of them unionized, Linda, stepped up and said, "Do an evaluation of the women's jobs, the teachers, the nurses, the librarians, the clerical workers and compare those workers with the male jobs."

NORTON: Twenty states have done so, most of them on the basis of those job evaluations have raised the wages of women, and they have done so over a period of years so as to not disrupt the economy or the payroll of the state. It has been done. Tom Harkin and I know it has been done. We think the way to get the federal government to do what is, is to have them look at the states from which they come where their own women have demanded equal pay for comparable work. Otherwise, we will not touch the 70 percent of women who work in female sex-segregated occupations.

Tom Harkin commissioned, or asked the Labor Department to study federal contractors. And they found the federal contractors were essentially like other workers. But they also found -- and here I am quoting the Labor Department, "Since 1979, the contribution of occupational segregation," -- that's another word for sex-segregation -- "to the pay gap has jumped from explaining 18 percent to explaining 46 percent of the gap."

If you want to get to the gap, you've got to get to the difference between traditional male jobs and traditional female jobs. And you have seen us out here year-after-year, get used to it here, because you're going to see us here, sticking with pay issues until we move this Congress to do something about pay issues.

I believe that this is the year for the first time to have hearings on the Paycheck Fairness Act and on the Fair Pay Act. Because if we do, then for the first time in 40 years, Congress will be paying serious attention to the disparities between what we pay the men who go out to work in America and the women who go out to work in America. Thank you very much.

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: Now, I'd like to introduce for a few words the woman I referred to earlier, someone who it always gives me great pleasure and just such a sense of honor to have any association with. And that is, my friend, Dorothy Height.

(APPLAUSE)

DOROTHY I. HEIGHT, NATIONAL COUNCIL OF NEGRO WOMEN: Thank you, I was here at the time that President Kennedy signed the Equal Pay Act. And there was great hope, we thought we had made it. We had been a Civil Rights Movement, which had pushed us hard to understand that it was not finished so long as we dealt with race without dealing with sex discrimination. We had come and everybody was rejoicing on the White House lawn, Senator Clinton.

And here we are today, still working. We've come from the washrooms into the board rooms. We have advanced in all fields. And women have shown that we are more than able, but yet, we have so far to go. And when I look at the African-American family and many families of color, and realize that so many of those families live in poverty, and yet they are working, I realize it's not because they are simply headed by women, but that the women are working for women's wages.

HEIGHT: And we have to put our cause with the cause of all women and join hands. So I just want to say that I'm glad to see this great new start with the leadership of Senator Clinton, who I'm glad to call my Senator and Senator Daschle and our women of Congress. And I think that means for all of us that we know now that we can't stop. We cannot think that we have it. We still have to work for equal pay and the paycheck fairness seems to be the way. So thank you for the opportunity.

(APPLAUSE)

But all I can say is, Harriet Tubman always said, keep going. That's what we have to do, too.

(APPLAUSE)

CHAVEZ (?): Thank you, all of you, for being here. You know, one of the things that we've got to remember is this started 38 years ago. It's still not a job that's finished. Very simply, these congress people that stand before you and spoke so eloquently, they've got the message. But there are some people in Congress, duh, that don't have the message. And the message has to be made clear and very simple.

In Espanol [speaking in Spanish].

Does anybody know what means? We've had enough. We have had enough. Yavasta (ph). Let's say it again. Yavasta (ph).

ALL: Yavasta (ph).

CHAVEZ (?): All right. You're speaking Spanish. We'll go to the next lesson. But let me say something to you. We can stand here and talk and have a press conference every week, but that's not what it's all about. It has to be up to each and every one of you, picking up the phone, calling somebody you know to help you call your Congress person, making sure that the e-mails and the letters and everything gets up there because they need our help. It cannot be done, unless they feel the support that they feel today. And as I said before, Yavasta (ph). We have to get the job done. This is the year. We've got a Senate majority. Hello. And isn't that a wonderful thing?

(APPLAUSE)

And you know what, this Senate majority is ready to get on the agenda of working families here. And working women, let me tell you one thing, we have champions that will stand up for us, champions that will get the job done. It's just up to us to help them get it done. Thank you so very, very much.

(APPLAUSE)

END

PRESS CONFERENCE WITH SENATOR CHARLES SCHUMER (D-NY) AND SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D-NY), 6/14/2001

RE: MIDDLE EAST SITUATION

LOCATION: SENATE RADIO/TV GALLERY, THE CAPITOL BUILDING, WASHINGTON, D.C.

SEN. SCHUMER: Okay, hello, everybody. We are the senators from New York, in case you haven't noticed.

SEN. CLINTON: That's our theme song. (Laughs.)

SEN. SCHUMER: Right, but I have been instructed not to either sing or dance in public since I became a senator. When I was a congressman, it was okay.

Okay, anyway, we're here to talk, of course, about the Middle East. And, you know, there have not been too many good days in the Middle East lately; Tuesday was one of them. Thanks to the hard work of George Tenet and the Bush administration, a cease-fire was reached between Israel and the Palestinians which will, hopefully, put an end to the eight months of terrible violence, at least temporarily. And the only good thing I see coming out of this cease-fire is that there is a temporary end to the violence.

But while the cease-fire is an occasion for hope and at least to take a breather, it's also time to look towards what it will take to reach a real and lasting peace, because we've had a lot of these cease-fires before and, obviously, there is no real peace in the region.

The foundations for peace are built on foundations of trust, and that means that both sides have to show leadership and prepare their people for peace, prepare their people for coexistence, prepare their people for the fact that the Jewish people and the Palestinian people are going to have to live side by side. And that's what makes me, at least, so skeptical that this cease-fire will last, because as long as Yasser Arafat talks one way to the West and another way to his own people, there cannot be peace. As long as Yasser Arafat instructs the young people of Palestine to hate the Jews in a way not unlike what the Germans did in the '30s in terms of stereotype, in terms of pictures and in terms of words, then there won't be peace.

So Hillary and I today are urging President Bush to press Yasser Arafat to end the use of hateful, anti-Israeli rhetoric in official Palestinian statements, school books and newspapers, and make that agreement a precursor to any future talks.

When the young people in the Palestinian areas are filled with hatred, how do you expect them to make peace? When the textbooks infuse them with a vitriolic fervor against Israel and the Jewish people, how do you then say that they won't become people who strap bombs onto themselves and blow up innocent teenagers?

It doesn't matter how many negotiations we have, it doesn't matter how many summits, how many times we send the CIA director or the secretary of State to the Middle East. When the foundations of peace are poisoned by the rhetoric of hate, they are destined to fail. We are tired of going up the mountain and then falling back down, up the mountain and falling back down. The quest for Middle East peace is like Sisyphus. And we know we're not going to get peace until Yasser Arafat and the Palestinian Authority come clean.

I believe that they have to arrest all of the terrorists they released in September to make the cease-fire be real. But we also believe that they can take a very important step, that there's no good reason to avoid, by cleansing the Palestinian textbooks -- given out by the Palestinian Authority to the children in the schools -- of this kind of language.

And so that would be a concrete step that Yasser Arafat could take, one that he can't claim would get in the way of his negotiations. Nothing in the Palestinian covenant says they have to poison their children with hatred towards Israel and the Jewish people without any real change.

Now let me point to a few examples. They say there is no alternative to destroying Israel. And the maps near that language do not just show Jerusalem, but they show Tel Aviv and Ashdod and Ashqelon right along the coast. And then they "all of Palestine is ours." Here they say, "The clearest examples of racist and racial discrimination in the world are Nazism and Zionism." Well, imagine, how are they going to make peace when the kids believe all this? "The flare will continue to burn and light up the difficult path before the Palestine generations one after another until the flag of Palestine is raised over Jerusalem. There is no alternative to destroying Israel."

That's not Hamas. That's not Hezbollah. That's the Palestinian Authority, headed by Yasser Arafat, teaching the Palestinian children.

I'd love to believe that there's going to be peace. But I've been disillusioned and disappointed so long, I think Jewish people in America and in Israel, I think lovers of Israel, Jew and Gentile, in America need some kind of tangible sign other than verbiage and a simple cease-fire when there's world pressure.

This would be one of those. We're hoping the president and others make this part of the negotiations.

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I want to thank Senator Schumer for his leadership on this and so many issues.

And I want to begin by expressing, you know, my most heartfelt hope that the latest breakthrough cease-fire agreement between the Israelis and Palestinians can be the first important step toward a strong and lasting peace that guarantees the safety and security of Israel. For the sake of all of the families who have lost loved ones and endured terrible suffering, I hope that this will mean an end to the violence.

And I join in congratulating and thanking this administration and CIA Director George Tenet for his help in moving both sides toward this agreement. And I fully support their work to bring and promote peace in the region.

But as Senator Schumer has said, as members of the administration have said, and as I say today, we have to be very watchful and very vigilant about what goes on from here.

You know, I have said on numerous occasions that you can't preach peace while you're teaching hate. And that is what we see so clearly illustrated on these charts today. In order for any agreement to work, the Palestinian Authority must cease the use of hateful rhetoric in their official statements and must erase language of hatred and intolerance from their textbooks. You know, such language is not instructive; it is inciteful. And it incites violence, and that's what we have to do everything we can to avoid.

That is why today Senator Schumer and I are sending a letter to the president urging him to make absolutely clear to Yasser Arafat that real and lasting peace is not possible without a full and immediate cessation of the Palestinian Authority's hateful rhetoric. Their deeds must match their words. There can be no doubt; there is a deliberate effort to promote vile ideas and images, to deny the legitimacy of Israel, to encourage violence and foster racist attitudes among a new generation of young Palestinians. From history books and maps to simple grammar exercises and language lessons, Palestinian children are being inculcated with hate for Israel and the Jewish people.

Last September I had the honor of joining Nobel Peace Prize winner Elie Wiesel in New York to denounce the lessons of hatred and violence that are part of the core curriculum in Palestinian schools. And I am highly disappointed that despite past promises from the Palestinian Authority to remove anti-Semitic rhetoric from their textbooks and government publications, we have yet to see any results or concrete action to move us in that direction. These charts show that anti-Semitic rhetoric remains one of the pillars of the Palestinian educational system.

You know, hate is not something children are born with; it's something they must be taught over and over and over again, from their parents, from their teachers, from their peers, from their media. And if we allow these teachings to continue, another generation will grow to adulthood having been brought up on a steady diet of hate and distrust.

So again I call on Chairman Arafat and the Palestinian Authority to immediately remove all anti-Semitic, anti-Israeli rhetoric from Palestinian school textbooks in each and every grade, and to do everything to remove those similar kinds of comments from any official statement or publication.

And I urge the Bush administration to do everything in its power to persuade the Palestinians to reverse their hateful rhetoric and embrace the opportunity to move toward a strong and lasting peace in the region.

You know, I was speaking with someone who's very knowledgeable about the region, and he said something that just really brought chills to my heart. He said that we are on the last stop on the elevator ride to hell.

This has to be the top priority of all people who care about children, who care about peace, who care about the kind of stability, safety, and security that Israel should be guaranteed, and who care about the future of the Palestinian people. And it cannot be done if we don't take a strong stand against hateful rhetoric and make it clear this must end.

So we're hoping that this will be part of any further negotiations and discussions that the administration holds about the future of the region.

SEN. SCHUMER: Thanks, Hillary. I just want to read two things here that I thought we should. One is from the Palestinian official newspaper, Al Hayat. This is what they wrote last month. Quote, "The day of judgment will not come until the Muslims will fight against the Jews and kill them, until the Jews will hide behind stones and trees, and the stones and trees will say, 'O servant of Allah, there is a Jew behind me. Come and kill him.'"

And the sixth-grade textbook called, "Our Country Palestine," put out by the Palestinian Authority, says, quote, "There is no alternative to destroying Israel." And then says, "All of Palestine is ours" -- and it's everything, not pre-'73 and not pre-'67, but pre- 1948. And in the past, we used to think -- a lot of people in America and even Israel would say this is just rhetoric; let's ignore it and go forward with peace.

What the turn-down of Barak's courageous offer shows is that the rhetoric prevents peace. Yes?

Q Did you study any of the Israeli textbooks?

SEN. SCHUMER: There's nothing even close to comparable here, nothing that says kill the Muslims, nothing that says we want to take over all of what is -- what was on the West side of the Jordan -- nothing even close.

Q And can you tell us how widespread the use of these textbooks are?

SEN. SCHUMER: All the schools.

SEN. CLINTON: They're required.

Q They're required textbooks?

SEN. CLINTON: Yes.

Q Why should the president listen to you on this issue?

SEN. SCHUMER: Because it makes sense.

Q Have you spoken to him about the Middle East previously?

SEN. SCHUMER: I have spoken -- I have spoken to many people in the administration, including the president, about Middle East peace.

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I think that the reason anyone should listen to what we're saying is that it's very clear that you can't on the one hand be talking about peace, and on the other hand be teaching the children to hate. You know, there's that old song in -- I think it was "South Pacific" that "Children must be taught to hate quickly before they're seven or eight."

This is a problem that certainly exists around the world, but nowhere more acutely than in this region. And we're hoping that, as I called for last September -- as many of us have said many times over, that no true and lasting peace that guarantees safety and security for Israel and the people in the region can be accomplished unless people change their attitudes. And if they are being taught this kind of hate in their schools, then it's going to be very difficult to bring about the kind of peace that Americans in administrations in the past and present are trying to achieve.

SEN. SCHUMER: I just want to say, just speaking for myself, I have no faith that this cease-fire is going to last, and the reason are things like this. They are temporary and then they go right back. And until Yasser Arafat shows some real dedication to peace, which Israel has shown, particularly in Barak's offer, one can have little faith.

Real dedication -- this is sort of an easier thing for him to do, but he also has to arrest the terrorists.

Q Could you both comment on the president's decision on Vieques, about bombing there --

SEN. SCHUMER: Sure. I believe the president's decision on Vieques is a good first step, but it doesn't go far enough. To wait three years, to wait till 2003, is not going to do the job, and the pot is going to boil.

You know, it's bad for the armed forces and it's bad for Puerto Rico to have the Puerto Rican people and the military at total loggerheads. More people from Puerto Rico enlist in the armed services than from any state; a higher percentage. And there is great dedication to the military, in general, in Puerto Rico that's being destroyed by Vieques. The trust between Puerto Rico and America is being destroyed.

So I'm glad that the president is getting involved, but I think that he should encourage an immediate referendum, like Governor Calderon is, and abide by that referendum. I am confident that the Navy can find alternative sites, and by admitting that they can leave in 2003, the president himself is saying he agrees there can be alternative sites.

SEN. CLINTON: You know, I have for quite some time supported an immediate and permanent end to the bombing in Vieques. As I read the reports in the press today, this White House "plan" -- so-called -- is a mirage. You know, it promises no more than has already been promised -- an end to the bombing by May 1st, 2003. Now, that's already the policy of the United States government, and if the people of Vieques vote for such an end this November, one has to question what is the motivation for this announcement -- and, in effect, it's really a leak -- of what they're intending to do.

You know, could it be a cynical effort to circumvent the referendum that Governor Calderon signed into law for the end of July, or the one that is supposed to be scheduled for November 6th? You know, the first one will allow the people of Vieques to vote on the question of whether the bombing should end immediately, and rather than wait to hear the voice of the people, it appears that the White House wants to bypass the citizens of Puerto Rico, and particularly Vieques, and to set in stone a policy of continuing to bomb until 2003. I think that's unacceptable. It's unacceptable, certainly, to the people of Vieques and Puerto Rico, their elected government, and to many of our constituents in New York.

What worries me is a supposed commitment to end the bombing years from now while asking the Navy to study alternative sites, knowing that the administration and the Navy could easily change their mind. I read in the press the comments of a fisherman in Puerto Rico by the name of Ivan Ventura, who is quoted in this morning's Washington Post as saying it should stop now; how many things can happen between now and 2003? And the bottom line for me is that if the bombing is wrong in 2003, it's wrong in 2001, and it should stop now. So I'm hoping that, as Senator Schumer said, there's some, you know, positive motivation behind this move. But I have to say that I question it. I question the timing and I question the motivation.

Q What do you think the motivation is?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I think the motivation may very well be just to buy time and to undercut the referendum that the government of Puerto Rico has passed, that the governor signed, to hold a referendum that adds a third option to the two that were agreed to for the November referendum; and that is, the immediate cessation and ending of the bombing in Vieques. So to me, I'm just questioning whether this is a cynical move to try to divert attention from what is a failed policy that should end now, or if there's anything more behind it, I have yet to see it.

Q Senator Schumer, do you agree with that?

SEN. SCHUMER: Agree with what?

Q That this is just a cynical move by the White House to undercut the referendum?

SEN. SCHUMER: I don't know the White House's motivations. I think it's better that they get involved than they just leave the status quo. But I don't think what they've done is at all adequate. And I agree with Hillary that the bombing should end now. I hope that as the president explores this issue, he will see that, he will see that the continued confrontation is bad for Puerto Rico, is bad for the Navy and the armed forces, and that it's much better for each side to be getting along well with one another.

Q Senator Schumer, do you think this could have something to do with Republican attempts to court the Hispanic vote?

SEN. SCHUMER: You know, again, I don't want to get into motivation, okay? You've got to look at the actions and make your judgments accordingly. And my view is, yes, Mr. President, get involved, but do a heck of a lot more than you've done so far in terms of cancelling the bombing now as opposed to down the road. Let the -- encourage the referendum of the people of Vieques on July 29th and say you'll abide by the decision. That would be a simple and easy and graceful way out for everybody.

Q Do you, Senator Clinton, have any thoughts about the Republican attempts to court the Hispanic vote -- (off mike)?

SEN. CLINTON: No, I don't have any knowledge of that. I'm not going to comment on it. I just think that clearly this is a situation that has provoked a needless confrontation between the people of Vieques and Puerto Rico with the United States Navy.

And I would just reiterate what Chuck said. You'll not find any more patriotic citizens in America.

You know, unfortunately, there are a lot of Americans who don't even know that Puerto Ricans are American citizens and -- who have served with distinction and valor in the armed forces, including the Navy, for decades and decades.

And to create this ill feeling and to disregard the strongly held views of American citizens is, to me, very unfortunate. And we should end the bombing, and we should go about the process of evaluating and cleaning up the environmental damage and continuing the health study that is supposed to be underway to determine whether there are any health problems among the people of Vieques for the constant bombardment they've been under for all these decades, and try to create a situation in which we can, you know, really have a better outcome than this predicts to have.

SEN. SCHUMER: Thank you.

U.S. SENATOR KENT CONRAD (D-ND) HOLDS HEARING ON DEFENSE SPENDING. 7/18/2001

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you, Secretary Wolfowitz for your service over many years and for being willing to come back to the government and take on this responsibility.

And I also appreciate Mr. Zakheim being here as well.

I think that you probably are getting a flavor of what I believe is the consensus in the Congress, and that is that on both sides of the aisle the majority of us want to do whatever is necessary and justifiable to provide the appropriate funding levels for defense. I don't think that you'll see any opposition to well thought out requests that really do provide a basis for our long-term security in meeting both known and, perhaps, unpredictable threats.

The real dilemma, for those of us sitting on this side of the table, is how we do that. And I have to echo the chairman's questions that we really need your help in doing that, because we're in a situation that will make it very difficult to provide the kind of support that is requested.

You know that I have been honored to visit our troops and facilities literally all over the world. And I have seen our men and women in uniform literally on the front lines doing the work that they sign up to do, but that we need them to do for all of us. So I'm certainly among those who will support the kind of well thought out requests that I believe will support our services and put us in a good position for the future. But I am, as you might guess from the tenor of the questions, at least on this side of the table, looking for some help.

Now many of us have heard estimates ranging anyway from the $18 billion to $32 billion from the vice chiefs of staff, to $50 billion from an estimate from former secretary of the defense, all the way up to $100 billion from the Center for Strategic and International Studies. That's a very large range. And everyone starts from the same premise that they're looking at our position, looking at what we need to do to be ready to confront any of our security needs. And we, obviously, are trying to make sense out of such a broad range of defense funding need projections.

And I go back to your comments about projections. None of us know exactly what will happen in the future, but certainly many of us on the floor voted to increase money for defense in the budget and tax cut debate. We were ready to support Chairman Conrad's alternative that would have provided an additional $100 billion over the 10-year window, which is on the high end of the estimates that have been projected. Many of us also supported other amendments from Senators Landrieu and McCain that would have reduced the tax cut to provide funding for defense.

Unfortunately, we got no help from the administration to try to have a more balanced approach toward cutting taxes and providing for defense. In fact, as you I'm sure know, and as I was somewhat surprised to read, even publications like the Weekly Standard have criticized the administration for fiddling with tax cuts while the military burned. And that article goes on to say that the real reason the White House is abandoning the two-war strategy is that under the current budget constraints they can't afford it.

So when that budget and tax cut was signed into law on June the 7th, I think, many of us really were, if not confused, at least concerned, that the administration was speaking out of both sides of its mouth.

On the one hand, you and Secretary Rumsfeld and the chiefs and others were conducting a review that we knew would lead to additional requests for funding. On the other hand, there was no willingness to make the hard political decisions that would have provided those dollars in the budget. And, in fact, 20 days later the president submitted a defense budget amendment that did increase the budget authority by the $18.4 billion that we're faced with in this hearing.

Now what I'm struck by is whether or not the Department of Defense was involved in the overall budget preparation. I know a little bit about how budgets are put together in administrations, and I would like to know whether the White House knew at the time it came forward with its tax cuts and its opposition to those of us who were willing to increase defense spending in the budget, whether the White House knew the extensive budgetary needs that DOD would present and that were left out of the blueprint and the April budget? Or were you just left out of the overall budget planning and we're playing some catch-up right now?

WOLFOWITZ: I think throughout the process we have been in very close, essentially daily contact with our colleagues at OMB. You know, as you mentioned in your comments, there are a range of estimates about what defense spending needs are. I think it might be worth pointing out, and I don't know whether most of the outside estimates you mentioned, they're in the range of $50 billion to $100 billion; we're well under them. On the other hand, we are above the levels that were, in fact, considered during a budget debate up here, whether it's $10 billion, I think, was Senator Landrieu's proposal or proposal from the Republicans on the Armed Services Committee.

We've tried to work very hard and to work with OMB to get these numbers down to ones that we can truly, fully justify. We worked hard and we will continue to work hard. You're asking for help to help in finding savings.

We're going to need some help from the Congress on that score. We came up with a proposal. We have a proposal up here that will get us some of the serious bomber capability that we need, but it requires taking 30 B-1s out of the force and using that money to upgrade the remaining 60. And judging from some of the complaints we've had from individual senators and congressman, it suggests that it may be a tough road forward to get those kinds of savings.

Peacekeeper is a different kind of example, where we have to ask for extra money in this year's budget in order to retire Peacekeeper. When we eventually retire Peacekeeper it'll take roughly $150 million a year out of the budget. In my view, it should have been done quite a few years ago. But we have to ask for money to do it and we don't.

When we're talking about all these estimates and out-year trust funds and so forth, there's no credit given to the fact that the out- years there will be $150 million a year in perpetuity that we have saved. I don't think the way the current system is set up it creates the right kinds of budgeting mechanism, scoring mechanisms to encourage kinds of savings I think you and I and practically every serious observer of the Defense Department would like to see.

CLINTON: So in other words, the administration was well-aware of the needs that would be required in defense at the time that they put forth their budget and the tax cut.

WOLFOWITZ: If you mean at the time they submitted the blueprint budget last year, we had only just -- in fact, I wasn't confirmed at the time. I don't know what well-aware means. We were in no position back then to give you the kind of detailed justification of a defense increase of the kind we've done now. And, in fact, we were working round the clock through May and June to come...

CLINTON: Well, there was no doubt that there was going to be a significant request for increased defense spending, was there, Secretary Wolfowitz?

WOLFOWITZ: I think that's precisely why they asked in the budget resolution to have this discretion for the chairman to put a new mark in for defense. I don't think anyone expected that mark would be lower. It was expected it would be an increase, and that we would, during the course of this work this spring and early summer, come up with the specification of that increase.

CLINTON: Well, you know, Mr. Secretary, I'm hoping that we're going to be able to work out the very difficult decision-making that will be required to do what you're requesting.

I would certainly add, on my own behalf, to the chairman's list of three alternatives, the alternative of revisiting the tax cut. You know, as I sit here and hear what are very serious concerns about our defense posture and our security needs, I am just amazed that we would be setting ourselves on a fiscal course that I believe will lead us back into deficits, that will pose the kind of impossible political choices that the chairman outlined with the Medicare and Social Security trust fund on the one hand, necessary discretionary non- defense spending -- whatever you set that level at -- on the other hand, including education and the like, and our defense needs.

CLINTON: And I guess I would just ask you -- I know you're a student of defense and of our government. As you look down the next 10 years, what is more in the interests of our country: a huge tax cut that puts us into deficits and undermines our ability to meet our needs, or funding our defense needs?

WOLFOWITZ: Senator Clinton, I think what is most in our interest, looking down the road, is a healthy economy. And I think a lot of this argument about tax cuts comes down to judgments about what will produce a healthy economy in the future. I don't think you can have a successful defense program without a healthy economy, and that's why I can't say defense comes first. I do think they go together.

And I do think that there is no more important responsibility we have as custodians of the public trust than to try to ensure the future peace and safety of future generations. But I think part of that involves having an economy that continues to grow. The reason we have the surpluses we enjoy today is because the economy has grown. The reason we have the problem Senator Conrad is pointing out is because our growth is slowing. And I think a major judgment behind that tax cut is a judgment that it will contribute to economic growth.

CLINTON: Well, I could not agree with you more, and I would, you know, look forward to talking to you in the next five to 10 years about what does and doesn't work to create a healthy economy. I mean, one of the reasons that the prior administration had to make the tough choices it made is because it inherited deficits that were growing at a rate that was unsustainable, that froze out private capital.

And I would certainly argue that the fiscal responsibility that the past administration and Congresses engaged in that made it difficult to fund everything that was required, put us on the path to a strong economy. And I regret deeply that we've taken what I consider to be an unfortunate detour off that path, which will make the choices that you're asking us to make today ever more difficult.

But you know, the proof is in the pudding. We'll see how it plays out. But we're going to have some very tough decisions because we've squandered the opportunity of the accumulated surpluses to do the kinds of things with defense, with our failing infrastructure in other areas, that would make us as a nation richer, safer, smarter and stronger in the future, and that's what I regret deeply.

And we will, certainly speaking for myself, do the very best we can to meet the legitimate needs that you have presented to us today. But it's an unfortunate conclusion that I reach that we're faced with this instead of being able to make the kinds of planning for the future in defense and other areas that a strong, secure nation should be able to in a time of increasing threats.

And so I look forward to working with you, but I think we all have our jobs cut out for us.

WOLFOWITZ: Senator, I might say that I think economizing on defense is not a way to deal with long-term...

CLINTON: I didn't say that. I didn't say that. I didn't imply it. I wouldn't support it.

I'm just saying it's unfortunate that at a time when we had surpluses and an opportunity to do the long-term planning, instead we have given it away. And I believe given it away that leads us back into deficits that will make it even more difficult to meet the balanced kinds of challenges that our nation faces on both the domestic and the international front.

Thank you very much.

CONRAD: Thank you, Senator Clinton.

NATIONAL PRESS CLUB LUNCHEON WITH SENATOR HILLARY RO-DHAM CLINTON (D- NY), 7/19/2001

MODERATOR: RICHARD RYAN

LOCATION: NATIONAL PRESS CLUB BALLROOM, WASHINGTON, D.C.

SEN. CLINTON: Thank you, Dick. Thank you very much. (Applause.) Thank you. Thank you very much. Thank you. Thank you very much, Dick, and thank you for that gracious introduction. I am absolutely de-lighted to be here with all of you, and to have this opportunity to discuss an issue that is on my mind, and then to answer your questions.

I want to thank Jerry Zeremsky (ph) for helping to arrange this luncheon, and Kathryn Skiba (ph) for inviting me to be with you.

Let me though begin with just a word about a great loss for this city, our country and journalism. And of course I am speaking about Katharine Graham. The last time I saw her was just a few weeks ago, and we were talking about plans to get together again. She was always so hospitable and welcoming my family to her home on Martha's Vineyard. And earlier than that, when I was speaking at the American Society of Newspaper Editors, she happened to be there, being honored for her contributions to defending the Constitution as well as promoting the highest standards of journalism. And I called her at that time "Mother Courage," because to me she gave courage to a lot of us -- not just those in the media, but to many, particularly through her remarkable autobiography. And I think that may perhaps be even truer for young women. She will be greatly missed, and we offer our thoughts and prayers for her family.

I'd like to take my time today in this unique and respected forum to speak about an issue that is particularly on the minds of many New Yorkers, and increasingly has become something that I am committed to working on and speaking out about throughout New York, here in the Senate. And it's also very fortunate that it combines the concerns that are at the heart of my work on two of the committees on which I serve, the Environment and Public Works Committee and the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee. And that is the hidden health hazards that surround us, the unnatural things in our natural world that are or could be posing a threat to our human health.

You know, nearly 40 years ago on the pages of the New Yorker, after being rejected by Reader's Digest, which might interest this audience, a biologist by the name of Rachel Carson, wrote these words: "For the first time in the history of the world every human being is now subjected to contact with dangerous chemicals from the moment of conception until death." Now, that seminal work, titled "Silent Spring," launched the modern environmental movement, and it encouraged government, science, industry and citizens to look at the inner relationship of our environment and our health in a whole new light.

"Silent Spring" is really a story about a silent century, because throughout the 1900s, a time of great industrialization and economic and population growth, we had small regard for what we were doing to our air, our land or our water. We really didn't know any better. In fact, until the latter decades of the 20th century, starting with pioneers like Rachel Carson, we only began to learn about what it was that we were doing to ourselves. Much of the activity that created the environmental changes that concern me started as a result of war efforts, when it was absolutely essential that the entire country get behind preparing us to take on the threats that we faced in the Pacific and in Europe. And so we were doing a massive job of creating new products, new chemicals, and we really didn't have time to stop and think about what the impact might be.

And yet now, in the beginning of the 21st century, I think it's time for us to stop and take stock, so that we have a better understanding of what we have done, and are continuing to do, and can take appropriate measures to deal with any of the potential hazards that are created.

You know, concerns about chronic diseases like cancer or birth defects or asthma or autism extends to every community throughout our country. And also I am speaking I know here at the Press Club which is a place filled with seasoned and hardened and objective journalists, I suspect that in your own hearts and minds, and maybe even through your own families' experiences, you might share some of the anxiety that I hear on a regular basis from my constituents.

You know, chronic diseases like asthma, heart and lung disease and others are caused by three factors: genetics, behavior and the environment. Now, we are making great progress in mapping the human genome. And some of you who followed me on the campaign trail throughout New York know that I talked incessantly about the human genome. I just couldn't get enough of what it is we were discovering, because I found it one of the greatest accomplishments of humanity. And it is going to give us tremendous amounts of information that will help us better prevent and treat the problems that we may have inherited, or the susceptibilities that we carry.

Now, as for human behavior, each one of us I am sure makes our New Year's resolutions, and swears to do better, because we have a lot of information about what we do to ourselves. You know, we know we should-n't smoke, we shouldn't drink too much, we should eat the right foods, we should exercise. A study released last week in fact examined people who belonged to a particular religion whose members follow a very strict regimen of diet and exercise and, perhaps not surprisingly, they tend to live 10 years longer than their neighbors. Now, I have friends who say, Well, who would want to live those 10 years? (Laughter.) But the fact is that they do, and I suppose the one lesson we could draw is convert -- (laughter) -- but at a minimum we should convert our lifestyles to maximize our chances of living a healthier life, and frankly saving health care costs for treatments that could be avoided had we taken better care of ourselves.

But today let's talk about a third, silent factor, the hidden health hazards that are in the world around us that currently we have so little knowledge of or control over, dangerous conditions that threaten our lives, and particularly the lives of our children that we often cannot hear or see or smell or touch. But it is the stealthy, crippling nature of these hazards that manifest themselves in unexpected cancers, brain tumors and other diseases that I think we have to address. We are only beginning to understand their nature and their scope and the relationships between them and us.

Now, in recent years, mostly through the study of twins, researchers have shown that our behavior and our environment play a much greater role in causing chronic disease than we ever once thought. As researcher Judith Stern put it so vividly, "genetics loads the gun, but the environment pulls the trigger." So we need specifics. Is the drinking water on our tables going to harm us? Will holding cell phones against our heads for hours some day cause a brain tumor? How about the pesticides on the laws in front of our homes or our children's schools, or on the fruits and vegetables that we buy at the store? What about the cumulative effect of extended exposure to a variety of environmental factors over a period of years? Is there some unknown synergistic impact on our health?

Now, at least science and medicine, public officials and citizens are asking these kinds of questions. There was a time that I remember very well when we didn't know any better -- you know, when we laid out in the sun and baked for hours. And I can remember -- and maybe some of you had the same experience -- during my own childhood when the local truck that sprayed for mosquitos would come down our street, we thought that was a great occasion. We would jump on our bikes, we would chase it with you know the clouds of pesticides blowing in our faces. And, I know, I can hear some of you thinking, Well, that explains a lot. (Laugh-ter.) But, you know, I don't advise it to anyone listening or watching. And so we have come a long way in understanding obvious risks like that.

One of the first major discovering about the link between the man-made environment and our health concerned lead -- lead in gasoline and lead in paint, which can cause reduced IQ and behavioral and learning disabilities in children.

Now, since we began to phase out lead use in the 1970s the number of children under the age of 6 with blood levels of lead above the current health standard has decreased by over 80 percent. But even armed with irrefutable evidence about the impact of lead, we still experience problems with exposure that do in many ways defy our own common sense, because we are still seeing the results of lowered IQ and behavioral problems that should be and could be avoided. For example, in New York State, where the cases of lead poisoning have dropped in recent year, we still lead the nation in the number of older houses with lead hazards. After all, who knew that that paint 50 years ago would cause these kinds of problems?

And research released earlier this year by scientists at the Children's Medical Center of Cincinnati found that children who had even less blood levels of lead than deemed acceptable by current federal standards still experienced a reduction in their IQs.

So, while we are coming to grips with the health threats from lead, there are so many other things we should be taking a hard look at. We know that chronic diseases are the number one killer of people in our country, that three out of every four of us in this room will die of a chronic disease. They also account for over 70 percent of our health care costs, about a third of a trillion dollars a year in care, treatment and lost productivity. Now, that is slightly less than the federal government spends on Medicare and Medicaid combined, and more than we currently spend on defense.

And the incidence of chronic disease is on the rise. A report being released today shows children in America experiencing a 20 percent increase in asthma in the past 10 years alone. It is the number one cause of school absenteeism. Now, we have also seen big increases in endocrine and metabolic disorders, such as diabetes, and neurological diseases such as Parkinson's.

Despite the enormity of the chronic disease problem, we have no way to effectively and comprehensively track the outbreak of most chronic diseases nationwide. Now, we do track infectious diseases, and for good reasons -- because we need to respond quickly when an infection appears. But we do not, for example, track birth defects nationally. They are the leading cause of infant mortality, according to the Centers for Disease Control.

But the cause of 70 percent of all birth defects -- 70 percent -- is unknown. We are making progress on map-ping cancer cases, but we don't keep track of autoimmune diseases nationally. We don't monitor in any on-going, comprehensive manner the outbreak of asthma in children across the country.

Now, thanks to widespread news coverage this week which resulted from aggressive monitoring of infectious diseases, we know that a crow in southern Georgia died from exposure to the West Nile virus. Now, a crow dies and that is and should be national news because of what it tells us about the spread of that disease.

Fighting these infectious diseases like West Nile is a crucial part of our national public health agenda. But when a child living near a toxic waste site gets leukemia, where is the public health alert then? Why don't we hear about it until a dozen children have cancer? I believe it's because we cannot easily understand why these diseases are occurring and whether there may be any way to make linkages among similar cases of chronic illnesses. Now, on occasion we do, thanks to state and local public health officials, sometime even due to word of mouth or investigation by the media, learn about a cancer cluster or other disease clusters, and we then zero in on it and try to find answers to it.

Now, take Libby, Montana, the site of a former vermiculite mine where one in 40 residents had died or suffered from illnesses related to asbestos. The public health problem was not fully realized until the Seattle Post-Intelligencer pieced the story together just last year. Or take the cases of lung cancer on Staten Island in New York, reported by the New York Daily News yesterday, Tom, where people are afflicted with the disease at a rate 40 percent higher than the rest of New York City, which is not explained by rates of smoking.

Or take a more personal look at this. Three people -- Dustin Gross (sp), Zachary Beardsley (sp) and Karen Jo Miller, who's with me today -- they all have or have had cancer, and they and their families don't know why. Dustin and Zachary, both about five years old, live in Fallon, Nevada, and both have leukemia. In fact, 14 children have been diagnosed with leukemia in Fallon in recent years.

Now, the odds against so many children having the same kind of cancer at the same time in a small town with a population of about 8,000 are extraordinarily high. I went to Fallon with Senators Harry Reid and John Ensign in order to hold a hearing for the Environment & Public Works Committee to try to hear what experts and citizens had to say. And we learned that Fallon is home to a naval air station, actually the home of Top Gun, where they use a lot of jet fuel.

And Fallon's drinking water contains 100 parts per billion of arsenic, 10 times the level deemed safe by the Clinton administration. And it's an area where there's a lot of farming, so pesticides are regularly used. Now, what, if any, does that have to do with the cancer? We don't know. But if you were the parent or if you were sitting where I was sitting, with

Harry and John, looking into the eyes of parents who were looking for answers, I think you'd agree we owe people a better response than what we're giving them right now.

Karen is a woman who was diagnosed with breast cancer. She lives on Long Island, where breast cancer occurs at rates above what we would expect in any random sample. And many women and their families are understandably worried, because, again, Long Island is a place where a lot of farming went on for a very long time, where there was a heavy buildup of military, defense-related industries, starting in and around the Second World War and continuing, where there's an aquifer that runs the whole length of the island that is the repository for what drains off, and many other potentially questionable matters that happen all over the country that occur on the island, like, for example, you know, electromagnetic fields or the quality of drinking water.

I held a hearing of the Environment & Public Works Committee there, along with Senators Harry Reid and Lincoln Chafee, and we heard again from experts and from citizen experts like Karen, asking questions. And because of the very good work of my predecessors, Senator Moynihan and Senator D'Amato, the Long Island breast cancer research study is ongoing, and we're going to try to find some answers by linking genetic information with environmental information. So we have a lot of work still ahead of us to understand what it is that is happening with the persistence and increase of chronic diseases.

Now, we fear the unknown so much more than we fear what we do know. We're a nation where most of us believe in God and we can understand maybe, although it is hard at times, why this person is randomly hit by lightning or inherits a genetic predisposition to a particular disease. We can also understand how our personal behavior, like smoking or eating the wrong foods, could cause health problems. But what we're not prepared to accept is that a cancer or a birth defect for a little boy or girl may be there because of some man-made environmental cause or contributing factor; in other words, something we could have prevented and failed to do so.

Now, I'm not sure that I or anyone could have come here and made this speech before the beginning of this century, because we just didn't know enough. And we didn't have the information technology available and we didn't have the mapping of the human genome, and we weren't as aware as we needed to be. So knowledge and awareness coming together really makes this the moment when we can begin to fight back.

Now, in Hinckley, California, as we all know, Erin Brockovich fought back when she helped victims of pollution go after the utility company that poisoned their water with Chromium 6, which causes cancer as well as liver, kidney, circulatory-system and nerve-tissue damage. In Marion County, Ohio, the residents are fighting to find out more about the higher-than-normal number of leukemia cases among the graduates of one high school that sits on top of an old toxic U.S. Army waste dump. Thirteen youngsters who attended one of the high schools in Elmira, New York have been diagnosed with cancer since 1997. It, too, was built on a former industrial site where 2,000 cubic yards of soil contaminated with lead, cadmium, chromium and other pollutants was recently removed from the area.

On Long Island, Karen Jo Miller and so many brave survivors are fighting back. She formed the Huntington Breast Cancer Action Coalition, which, among other many good works, has helped to complete a map that compares the incidence of cancer and toxic waste sites in her community.

But I don't think we can leave this to local people fighting on their own. I think it's time for us to fight back on the national level. And for the past several years, we've been training for this fight. Now we need to take the next step. And I think there are eight big things for us to do in the fight against hidden health hazards.

First, establish a comprehensive national tracking system for chronic disease. That's the brain child of the Pew Environmental Health Commission, and it's a cause being advocated by advertisements in many of the publications represented here; by Health Track, whose executive director, Jim O'Hara, is here with us today. It's worked on the regional level.

As a result of cancer-tracking efforts, elevated rates of oral cancers among women in the southeastern United States were linked to the use of chewing tobacco. Similarly, elevated death rates for lung cancer in coastal areas of Georgia, Virginia and northeastern Florida and Louisiana were eventually linked to exposure of shipyard workers to asbestos during World War II. We need that kind of attention to the details of chronic disease nationwide.

Second, put environmental health officers in every state's public health department. I was surprised to learn we don't do that. We have infectious disease officers, but not those who track chronic disease and who also are responsible for tracking the environmental issues. Now, that is someone who citizens could turn to when they're concerned about possible sources of pollutants, and it would provide a force of public accountability as well.

Third, create a chronic disease rapid-response force, as advocated by the Pew Commission and the Trust for America's Health. This force would bring environmental, scientific and health experts into potential cancer and disease clusters, including those revealed by the national tracking system. As my friend and colleague, Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, says, we want to have a protocol established; like when there's an airplane accident with the National Transportation Safety Board, we would send in the chronic disease rapid-response force.

Fourth, we should properly fund chronic disease prevention and research. Now, we know that the cost of such diseases is staggering. One hundred million people have chronic disease which costs us more than $325 billion in annual health care and productivity costs. Yet the administration's '02 budget request cut chronic disease prevention and health promotion at the CDC by $175 million, or 23 percent, and did not increase CDC's environmental health program by a penny.

Research funding is important because we are on the verge of major discoveries, thanks to advances that we celebrate in genetics and in the science that researchers are now bringing to study toxins at the molecular and genetic level. Similarly, advances in information technology give us the tools to do what we couldn't have done before.

Fifth, sick, sick schools. I have an amendment in the Senate-passed education bill calling for a study on the impact of sick schools on kids. There's growing concern that schools with poor air quality, mold, inadequate ventilation, crumbling structures and bad drinking water, as well as those built on top of toxic waste and former industrial sites, are harming the learning ability and health of students. According to one GAO study, 15,000 schools in our country have indoor pollution or ventilation problems affecting over 11 million children.

Sixth, clean up brownfields. There are an estimated 600,000 brownfield sites around the country. The Senate passed a bill, I think 98-0, to help communities clean up these contaminated lands. And the bill includes an amendment that I sponsored to target assistance to neighborhoods that are experiencing a high-er-than-normal incidence of chronic disease.

When I was with President Bush in New York recently, I had a chance to speak with him about this bill, and I was very pleased to hear that he supported this idea and was very enthusiastic about it. And I hope the Congress will act soon to send the bill to the president for his signature. Then, of course, we'll need to get on to Superfund reauthorization, but let's deal with brownfields first.

Seventh, we need to improve air and water quality. We know that polluted air exacerbates respiratory illnesses such as asthma, and may even contribute to heart attacks. And the water we drink is life-giving, but contaminants can be harmful. I'm pleased that the new chairman of the Senate Environment Committee, Jim Jeffords, is committed to moving legislation that will reduce the pollutants in our air and provide more funding for our nation's infrastructure for clean water.

And eighth, we have to coordinate pollution and disease data so that when we get this information, we can integrate it and draw conclusions about what is happening. And if something happens in Nevada and on Long Island, we can find out what common ingredients there are to have caused these that we then can act on nationally.

Now, we need, though -- and I want to reiterate this point, as I have in each of the hearings -- even though we cannot ignore these hidden health hazards, we should not rush in the opposite direction and scare people into believing that everything is a hazard or a problem. We need the facts to replace the fear. A lot of the anxiety people express to me is based on their concern, but there is no factual basis to either prove or disprove that concern, which is what I think we need the science to begin to prove so that we can answer the questions that people legitimately have.

Let me cite one example where more facts are needed. I would just be curious to know how many of you in this room have ever let your children or grandchildren play on wooden playground equipment, and how many of you knew at the time -- I certainly didn't -- that the wood in most of the playground equipment has been treated with arsenic?

And the reason it was treated with arsenic was to make it repel pests so that termites and other insects wouldn't eat away at it. But this is arsenic that, through rain and natural deterioration, can leach onto the ground and directly into the little hands and then the mouths of a lot of children who play on that equipment, and if they were anything like me, spent as much time on the ground as on the equipment.

Now, I don't think we need to be reminded that arsenic is not a good thing to have our children ingesting. An ounce of pure arsenic -- and I'm not very good at judging this, but if you were to hold up a glass of water and imagine an ounce, an ounce could kill everyone in this room.

Now, arsenic's deadly power, when taken in large doses, has been known for a very long time. "Arsenic and Old Lace" is a perfect example of that. But what we didn't know until recently is how a very small, minute amount ingested at low doses over a long period of time could also be harmful. We now know that such low dosages can cause bladder, lung and skin cancer, and possibly other cancers as well. We know it is toxic to the nervous system, can cause heart and blood- vessel problems, and may suppress the immune system and heighten the risk of diabetes.

Now, in light of these concerns, the Consumer Product Safety Commission is seeking public comment on a proposal to ban wood treated with chromated copper arsenate from playground equipment. We don't know how the CPSC will ultimately vote on this, but I'm delighted that they have voted to let the public comment on this idea.

I've previously publicly stated my concerns about the president's nomination of Commissioner Gall to chair the commission, because this is one of those issues that I want to be sure there is a balanced approach toward, and her philosophy really errs on the side of favoring industry and manufacturers. So I'm hoping that will not be the direction of the commission.

And certainly I can't mention the word arsenic without also saying how troubled I and so many others were about the Bush administration's delay in implementing tougher standards. Now, I know one of the reasons -- and it was a legitimate reason -- is that it would be expensive for many of the communities facing this challenge to do on their own. That's why I believe that the federal government should help communities such as those in Fallon and Albuquerque, other place, deal with problems like arsenic in the drinking water.

And I'm hoping that this will help the administration to rethink some of our priorities, because we have a massive underinvestment in our water infrastructure and we're paying a price for that. So my deep concern about the delay in actually promulgating the standards which were supposed to have been set by June 22nd is that we are delaying enacting a regulation that had been thoroughly studied, for which there is very sound science. And that is not the way we should proceed in dealing with the hidden health hazards, because once they are no longer hidden, we should have the will and use the resources to act.

Now, I began with some words from Rachel Carson. Let me close by quoting her again, and, appropriately for this audience, from an interview she conducted with CBS News. She said, "You know, man's attitude toward nature is today critically important, simply because we have now acquired a fateful power to alter and destroy nature. But man is a part of nature, and his war against nature is inevitably a war against himself. We are challenged as mankind has never been challenged before to prove our maturity and our mastery, not of nature, but of ourselves."

Now, I hope we will meet that challenge. I think the eight points I've outlined could be a good beginning to help us do just that, to begin a journey of discovery, unafraid and not hysterically, but with a maturity that brings people together, takes a hard look at the information, investing the research that will give us more data, and then act on the very best evidence that we have before us to prevent disease and particularly to begin tackling the extraordinary human and economic costs that chronic disease imposes on our country.

Thank you all very much. (Applause.)

MR. RYAN: Thank you, Senator. As you can see over here, we have a number of questions to ask. I'd like to start out by -- this questioner suggests that what you propose is going to cost a lot of money. Do you know how much it might cost and how much the taxpayers will be asked to foot the bill?

SEN. CLINTON: Yes. The Pew health tracking project estimates that it would cost about a dollar for every person in America -- that's $275 million -- to get such a system up and going. And that would be an annual cost that, in the beginning, I think would probably approach that for the first years. And then, of course, as, you know, we became more efficient, I would hope that it would be cost-effective even below that. But $275 million to me is an incredibly good investment when we think about the $325 billion that we spend treating disease instead of preventing it.

And so I think that the estimates that the health-track system has put forward seems, you know, very reasonable to me. And I would just add that it's one of the many reasons why I believe that the administration has missed an opportunity to make the kinds of investments that will make us as a nation richer and safer and smarter and stronger in the future, because of their decision to go with a very large, in my view, fiscally irresponsible tax cut. We're facing challenges that are going to be difficult to meet from defense and from health care and from many other areas.

MR. RYAN: This questioner asks, how can we expect to mitigate the effects of pesticides and other forms of cancer-causing agents when Congress and the administration appear not to be providing sufficient resources for the EPA to carry out its job?

SEN. CLINTON: That's a very good question, and it goes back to what I was just saying. I really believe that investment in this kind of research and in the sort of enforcement of regulations and laws that will make our air cleaner and our water safer are really not only in our best human interest but make such economic sense over the long run.

You know, our air is cleaner today in many areas because of actions that were started 30 years ago. A lot of our lakes and rivers are cleaner because of enforcement. I was troubled to see that the administration might postpone the clean-water rules that had been promulgated by the previous administration. I just believe strongly that the commitment to the environment is no longer a fringe issue. It is very much a kitchen-table concern of people all over our country.

You know, you could not have gone to a more conservative or Republican place in America than Fallon, Nevada. Harry Reid told me, when he invited me to go -- well, after I'd accepted -- (laughter) -- he said, "You know, they only gave me about 21 percent of the vote." I said, "Harry, if they only gave you 21 percent of the vote, I don't know what they're going to make of me if I show up." But those were, you know, very decent, hard-working people who now are asking some very tough questions about why all these children have leukemia, and one just recently died.

I just think we've got to say very clearly there is not a conflict between the economy and the environment, our energy policy and our health care policy, if we do it the right way.
(Applause.)

MR. RYAN: Given your concern about the environment, do you think the United States should adhere to the Kyoto treaty?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I was disappointed that the administration repudiated the treaty. I certainly can understand that there may be certain aspects of the treaty that deserve a second look and maybe some renegotiation, which had anyone asked me, I would have said, you know, if you don't approve of the treaty as a whole and you think there should be more requirements placed on the developing world, then don't repudiate it but go in and try, based on the fact that you're a new administration, to renegotiate or change some of the provisions or postpone the schedule of enforcement in some way, but don't repudiate America's global leadership on this extraordinarily significant issue of global warming.

Again, there is no doubt about the science, despite some people's efforts to persuade us otherwise. We know that we are experiencing global warming. We are experiencing increases in severe weather throughout the globe. And we pay a very big price for that in insurance costs in our own country and federal reimbursements and the like.

So I would hope that something could come out of the current conference going on in Bonn that would enable the administration to put our country back into a leadership position on this issue. I don't think we should be outside the circle of nations, particularly our European allies and Japan and Canada, who are trying to grapple with a serious threat to the well-being of our grandchildren and great-grandchildren. (Applause.)

MR. RYAN: A number of questioners would like to know what your position is on stem-cell research.

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I was very impressed with Senator Frist's thoughtful statement yesterday and very encouraged that his support for stem-cell research perhaps presages a similar position on behalf of the administration. There were some specifics attached to his position that I think are worrisome to scientists that I would like to see thought about more carefully, but the basic idea of committing our country to such research, I think, is in our best interest.

One issue, though, that I am troubled by is that so far the debate has focused on public funding, where our federal dollars go to support such research. And that is, of course, appropriate, because those are the purse strings that we hold. And to have the kind of open, transparent system that Senator Frist spoke of yesterday in the public sector, I fully support.

But I'm also concerned about private financing. I don't believe that it would be in our best interest or, frankly, up to our highest ethical and moral standards with respect to the very difficult questions that this research posed and the unintended consequences that can flow from it if we put the private funding sort of off to one side and permit it to go forward without any kind of check or balance.

I would like to see us look at a decision that Great Britain made so that both public and privately-funded research has to adhere to comparable scientific standards and meet ethical standards that are set by a commission that consists of people with expertise and input. So we should be able to pursue this research, which I think is so critical for many of the diseases that I talked about, but I also believe we've got to be very careful. So it's a difficult decision. I'm on the side of going forward. But I want to be sure we have appropriate checks in place so that we don't find ourselves going down a path of cloning, for example. That would be, in my view, very dangerous.

MR. RYAN: A couple of questioners note -- one says, "Do you think there will ever be a national health care system in this country?" And the second, "Do you ever think the United States will have socialized medi-cine?"

SEN. CLINTON: (Laughs.) I can't imagine why anybody would ask me that. (Laughter.) The answer to the second is no. But the answer to the first, I think that we're going to have to revisit how we finance our health-care system. And I have no way to predict what -- (applause) -- what the outcome of such a debate will be. I'm certainly prepared to tell whoever leads it what not to do. (Laughter.)

But I would hope that it would be a subject of increasing concern, because we're spending nearly 14 percent of our gross domestic product on health care in our country. We don't cover everybody. We don't have the kind of public-health system that some of our friends in other parts of the world do, which has very good outcomes for their patients.

We see our great hospitals, particularly in places like New York City, under tremendous financial stress, be-cause there is no way for a teaching hospital or an academic medical center to provide the services they traditionally provide in a for-profit health-care system. You cannot train doctors and nurses for a profit. You can't take care the sickest of the sick or the poorest of the poor for a profit. And you can't expect every bit of research that you carry out in your labs to lead to a blockbuster drug. And yet, if we don't have those functions being performed, then the rest of our health-care system suffers. We're facing a tremendous nursing shortage. There's just a lot that we're going to have to come to terms with.

I'm delighted that the Senate passed the patient's bill of rights. I hope that it gets through the House and gets to the president, and I hope he will sign it, because I think first things first; we have to put doctors, nurses and patients back in the center of the health-care system and not HMOs and accountants and others who are engaged in -- (applause) -- you know, denying or delaying care. But even when that is passed, we are nowhere near dealing with the internal inconsistencies of the way we finance health care.

And one thing I don't think I was ever very successful in doing, you know, seven and eight years ago was separating out the delivery of health care from the financing of health care. The financing -- if we were to start fresh and design a financing system for health care in our country, there is no way any business, any union, any health-care professional or any citizen or legislator would ever accept what we currently have. And we're just going to have to face up to that. And I hope that, you know, we'll be able to do it in a very open, bipartisan manner sometime in the future. (Applause.)

MR. RYAN: There are quite a number of questions here that refer to Congressman Gary Condit and the in-vestigation going on. And many of the questioners would like to know, do you think that he ought to resign, as many other members of Congress have suggested?

SEN. CLINTON: You know, I think we ought to keep our attention focused on all of the people who are missing in our country. (Applause.) And I really -- I have nothing further to add to that.

MR. RYAN: Also a large number of questioners here want to know when you're going to run for president or if you will run for president. How about running for vice president? Somebody suggested about a ticket in 2004 with Clinton and McCain, maybe McCain and Clinton. (Laughter.) What's your thought?

SEN. CLINTON: This is a very creative, imaginative group. (Laughter.) No, I have said that I am not running and I'm having a great time being pres -- being a first-term -- (laughter) -- being a first-term senator. You're going to get me in so much trouble. But I do -- you know, I do think everyone who wants to run should run.

MR. RYAN: No matter who. For our New York reporters here, a couple of questions. Which Democrat are you supporting in next year's New York governor race, Andrew Cuomo, who's already declared, or H. Carl McCall, the state comptroller, who has decided not to seek your Senate seat? And another one says, "Would you please handicap the race for the next mayor of New York City?" (Laughter.)

SEN. CLINTON: I am for whichever Democrat wins the nomination in either race. And I think, you know, we have a very good chance to take back both the mayoralty and the governorship. And I'm going to be campaigning very hard for whomever the Democrats of New York choose.

MR. RYAN: And this questioner wants to know, how do you see New York's chances for the 2012 Olympics?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I actually think that they should be very good. You know, the plans that have been put together are really impressive. And there's a broad-based group of supporters that is working very hard to entice the Olympics. I can't imagine, you know, a better place to have the global sporting events than in the global city of New York. So I'm going to do everything I can to persuade the International Olympic Committee to come to New York. I think it would be, if it's done the right way, very good for the city.

MR. RYAN: Before I ask the last question, I would like to do a little bit of business up here. Number one, I'd like to present you with a certificate of appreciation for your appearance here today at the National Press Club, and secondly, present you with a National Press Club mug, which I hope will find a good place on your desk somewhere.

SEN. CLINTON: It certainly will.

MR. RYAN: And the question -- well, there are a number of questioners that asked today, "Where's Bill? How's Bill and Chelsea?" which you might answer quickly. And the last one says, "What is your recommendation for a new college graduate to select a husband or wife who will become president of the United States?" (Laughter.)

SEN. CLINTON: My goodness. You know, Bill and Chelsea are fine. And he is having a great time doing a lot of work on behalf of some of the causes that he cared about during the presidency. He's going to be moving into his office on 125th Street in Harlem in an empowerment zone that the Clinton-Gore administration helped create. And as I'm sure you know, Chelsea graduated from college, which was a real rite of passage for her mother, at least. And so I'm very proud of her.

You know, I don't think that is a question that anybody can answer, because it is just not anything that any-one could ever even imagine planning for, despite what sometimes is written or what people claim later. When I was growing up, you know, running behind those pesticide-spraying trucks -- (laughter) -- I never could have imagined that I'd be standing here as a senator from New York or that I would have married someone from Arkansas who would become president. Those things just would never have crossed any-one's mind. And the best you can do is just fall in love and follow your heart. That's always the best advice I think you can get.

Thanks very much. (Applause.)

MR. RYAN: Thank you, Senator Clinton; much appreciated. Thank you all for coming here today. And I'd like to thank all those who watched or listened to the program. And I'd also like to thank National Press Club staff members Melinda Cooke, Pat Nelson, Jo Ann Booze, Melanie Abdow Dermott and Howard Rothman for organizing today's luncheon. Thank you.

"Larry King Live," CNN, 8/3/2001

KING: Senator Clinton, what surprised you?

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: I guess how much fun it's been. You know, I've had...

KING: Fun?

CLINTON: Oh, absolutely. I've had a great time, and I have to say that, you know, the people who have been absolutely great to me are the women sitting here. We've had a lot of fun together. We've come up with all kinds of advice for one another.

I've been more the recipient than the giver because I have so much to learn. But, you know, in addition to what Jean said about how I have absolutely no control over my time, which was a big surprise, I really am impressed at how hard everybody works. You know, it really is a hardworking collegial body. And you make friendships across party lines, across geographic divides. So for me, it's just been a wonderful surprise.

KING: Senator Hutchison, does this camaraderie still exist, women for women? I remember the last time you were on you said, women will not go and campaign against other women, no matter what the party. We have an allegiance to each other.

SEN. KAY BAILEY HUTCHISON (R), TEXAS: Well, what I said was that I wasn't going to campaign against Dianne Feinstein, because she is my friend. And I think that that happens with men as well. When you have certain friends -- you know, Trent Lott wouldn't campaign against John Breaux. That's not so unusual.

Now, we have made some friendships, but we may have friends that are running that we have to support. We just have to take it as it comes.

KING: Do you feel a special need, Senator Boxer, to welcome the new ones in?

SEN. BARBARA BOXER (D), CALIFORNIA: Oh, not a need, a true desire. I mean, I was thrilled. I remember Senator Mikulski saying when she was the only Democratic woman there, and she was the first Democratic woman elected in her own right, that -- how did you put it, Barbara? You said, "Some women..." Go ahead, take it from there.

SEN. BARBARA MIKULSKI (D), MARYLAND: Well, I said I wanted to be the first, but I wanted to be the first of many.

BOXER: But you said, "Some women look out the window waiting for Prince Charming..."

MIKULSKI: Yes, and I look out the window waiting for more women to come to the United States Senate.

(LAUGHTER)

MIKULSKI: But thirteen women...

KING: It's a lonely life, huh, Barbara?

MIKULSKI: No, it's not lonely. But no, when I was -- when I first came to the United States Senate, it was only Senator Kassebaum and I. We did our best on the issues, articulating the voice of women, getting women into clinical trials. We had dear friends in the House like Senator Snowe, congresswoman then, and Boxer. But it's really different. We have this incredible, critical mass now where I would say we're making a difference. And we have a little saying: Each one of us is making a difference. When we work together, we make change.

KING: Do you feel that, Senator Feinstein?

SEN. DIANNE FEINSTEIN (D), CALIFORNIA: Oh, I feel that.

KING: Do you feel you have clout?

FEINSTEIN: Well, I feel what's always been an all-boys club, so to speak, is now open. I think the message of the group is that each of us has come at it from a different way. Therefore, for women, looking at politics, looking at government, I like to believe that we are true role models, that we say it can be done. Women can read this book. They can see we're all different. We all have, maybe, different views on issues, but that really isn't important. The important thing is that we can serve, we can serve with integrity. We can participate in the big public policy debates of our time. And, I think, do so with credibility and a lot of integrity.

KING: Senator Snowe, a special camaraderie, being women?

SEN. OLYMPIA SNOWE (R), MAINE: Oh, absolutely. I think that that bond is there and it has been created by our monthly dinners that evolved into the book. We get to share...

KING: Still do that?

SNOWE: Oh, yes, absolutely. We just did last week, as a matter of fact, because we think it's so important to be able to know one another on a personal basis. And obviously, to get to know the new members of the Senate as well and to have four additional women to the United States Senate is a real bonus, because now we're omnipresent in every respect. We're everywhere and we can seize the moment, so...

KING: Do you feel your clout, Senator Collins?

SEN. SUSAN COLLINS (R), MAINE: You know, the great thing about the Senate is it's only 100 people. So as Debbie was saying, there's a real opportunity to pursue your priorities. A lot of us have worked in partnerships on issues we really care about. Barbara Mikulski and I have teamed up on an issue involving the pharmaceutical industry and the high cost of prescription drugs. We've worked together on home health care and a host of issues. And you can really make a difference, and that's just a wonderful feeling. It's why all of us are in public office.

KING: Are you enjoying it, Senator Landrieu?

SEN. MARY LANDRIEU (D), LOUISIANA: Very much, Larry. And while this group looks wonderful and it's great to have 12 of us and 13, it's important to know there have only been about 30 women elected to the Senate out of about 1,950 to be elected ever.

So, while we are very proud and have every reason to be proud of the accomplishments of this group, we still have quite a long way to go. But we're having a good time.

KING: Before I go to break, Senator Lincoln, you are the youngest, are you not?

SEN. BLANCHE LINCOLN (D), ARIZONA: The youngest woman in the history of our country.

(LAUGHTER)

LINCOLN: ... who served in the U.S. Senate

UNIDENTIFIED SENATOR: She brags about it all the time.

(LAUGHTER)

KING: Do you feel like the baby?

(LAUGHTER)

LINCOLN: No, I'm not the baby. Kid sister, maybe.

(LAUGHTER)

KING: Do you respect -- I know Senator Clinton campaigned for you at times in the past. Do you respect your elders?

(LAUGHTER)

KING: On that note, we'll be right back. It may be the last word I got in all night. Don't go away.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

KING: Let's go around, discuss some various issues as it relates. When you have a thing like the Condit thing -- and we're not going to ask whether you think he's wrong -- but basically, though, basically, does it have an effect when everybody is turning to one area? And does it take away, Senator Mikulski, from other things?

MIKULSKI: Well, actually, we pretty much focus on our own agenda.

KING: Do you feel like some of that agenda doesn't get covered enough because they're covering all of this one scandal story?

MIKULSKI: Well, you know, the American people have a great interest in the Condit story. And it's under investigation. And I think we all hope for Chandra Levy's best. What we're focusing on though, right now, is our amendments, what we're working on, coming into the fore.

This work that I'm doing with Senator Collins on a bipartisan basis is how we can control the cost of drugs without curtailing...

KING: But do you feel that that gets less attention when the media is so focused in another area?

MIKULSKI: No, I think we know how to break through. This is a crowd that knows how to break through the media.

KING: Senator Clinton, do you feel that when emphasis goes one way, it takes away from others?

CLINTON: You know, I've been so impressed over the years, Larry, at how the American people really can follow issues they care about. And they can really sort through whatever's going on to find out what is happening on prescription drugs or the patients' bill of rights or any other matter that is a real kitchen-table issue.

And so for me, it's been a real joy working with my colleagues on matters that are going to make a difference in people's lives.

KING: You don't feel, Senator Lincoln, that one takes away from the other, when you get home at night and all the networks are doing this one thing?

LINCOLN: Well, every now and then, I might say, Well, I sure wish they had covered the fact that we are attempting to write a new farm bill and how important that is for rural America. And a lot of that's just because rural American sometimes doesn't get a big enough flag.

KING: So it's frustrating?

LINCOLN: Sometimes it is, but I do think that, without a doubt, Senator Clinton is exactly right. I have complete faith in the people of Arkansas and the people of this nation, that the issues that are of great importance to them, they're going to weed through whatever's out there to find the information that they need. They call our offices.

KING: Senator Hutchison, is it frustrating for you?

HUTCHISON: Oh, I think we are getting coverage. You know, we're talking about missile defense. We're talking about the president's trip overseas. We're talking about where our foreign policy ought to be. And I think it's just important that we keep focused on the things that we're trying to do for our country.

I've been working with Senator Feinstein, just lately, for a breast cancer stamp, preauthorization. That has brought in millions of dollars in research for breast cancer, because we're trying to find a cure. We teamed with Barbara Mikulski to make sure that we have mammogram standards so that women will be able to know for sure and feel good that their mammogram is accurate.

So these are the things that we're working on. And I think we are making a difference.

KING: Senator Snowe, is it a diversion that affects you?

SNOWE: No, not at all. And I think the coverage, you know, about the disappearance of a young woman is obviously appropriate. I mean it is a serious matter and I think we are all concerned about that. But the beauty of our system is that we stay focused on the issues that are important, as well to the American people. And the system keeps working, the process keeps working. We focus on the key issues, and we don't get derailed by other things.

I mean, that's the importance of the way we work.

KING: Is anybody bothered by it -- Senator?

STABENOW: I think sometimes it is frustrating to me to know that we are working on the issues that people care about very much, that really directly affect their lives. And that it may not be the lead story, certainly.

We passed a patients' bill of rights, putting doctors and nurses back in charge of medical decisions and making sure that we hold those who make medical decisions accountable for how it affects individuals. It certainly got attention, but I would love to have seen it be the lead story on every channel, to let people know that we're fighting for health care and HMO reform.

So certainly, in terms of priorities, I think the things -- whether it's passing an education bill or a patients' bill of rights, or now we're focusing on Medicare prescription drug coverage -- all of those things; I think all of us would love to see be the lead stories at night. But regardless of that, we're going to keep working on the things that matter to people.

KING: Senator Feinstein, does it bother you?

FEINSTEIN: It bothers me somewhat. And I will tell you why. First of all, this goes all over the world, not just the United States. And I think for some people, it gives a very false picture of the United States Congress. It gives a very false picture of what people do with their time, how we behave.

For example, one of the things right now -- and I watch cable TV at night, and I see it just inundated. Well, we're now talking national missile defense. This is a huge issue in terms of the future of the United States. I would much rather, to be honest with you, tune into your show and see a debate on the science, on the military aspects of either theater missile defense, or national missile defense, what it means for the ABM Treaty, what it means in terms of whether this is going to be a safer world in the future.

Instead, we are all sort of captivated with what has become a huge drama. And I think the drama, in a way, belittles what all of us are all about.

KING: Senator Landrieu, what do you do when the media says: "That's what people want to watch." You know, which comes first?

LANDRIEU: Well, when I was saying the reason you see the difference here in our perspectives is because what is on the news is not necessarily what we see in our offices all day long, getting back to the schedule. I mean, our office is inundated -- Larry, in our offices in a day, we may literally conduct anywhere from 30 to 50 opportunities to meet constituents during the day. And that's, you know, roughly -- in meetings, speeches.

And they don't come in speaking about what's on the television and this particular incident, this disappearance. They're talking about health care, prescription drugs. They want appropriations. They've got economic development projects.

And I think I can speak for all of us without knowing and looking at your schedules that, you know, I haven't had one person walk in my office, really, and talk about that particular issue.

KING: Really? Let me get a break and we'll come right back. We'll pick up with everybody. You can all jump all in. Don't go away.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

KING: Sen. Cantwell said something that must have been funny because Hillary was laughing. What did you say to her?

CANTWELL: Well, no, I think -- you're bringing up this point, which I think with the Internet and the advent of 24-hour cable shows, you do find these stories getting more attention and obviously going over things and absorbing time and space.

But I did read a news account. We've obviously been dealing with this energy crisis in the Northwest, and so is California. And there was one article that mentioned that during this time -- why didn't we know about the partial deregulation that was going on in California and the potential affects? And someone said, well that was the same time as the O.J. trial, and that that overshadowed the attention.

So whether that's true or not, or whether someone would have paid more attention to the consequences of how that legislation might have played out or the consequences, there is this time and space that is there and available now. And we're filling it.

And the question is, are there more creative ways that we can fill it, that are interactive with the public, that they want to hear, that they will -- that will allow us to bring government closer to the people in what we are doing and communicate with them.

(CROSSTALK)

KING: Barbara and then Barbara.

BOXER: We could all -- of we could just sit in a room and close the door and figure out a way to find Chandra and to find all the missing youngsters, girls, boys and the rest, that, obviously, we would drop everything and do it.

But we know that the police have to work on that. What we need to do is what we can affect. And we can affect the electricity crisis; and we can affect the water supply; and we can affect whether our kids are honored or they're not, or they're neglected.

So, if we could fix all that, we would fix it -- in a minute. I mean, I met with Chandra's parents. I have to tell you that was a horrible meeting because I wanted to fix it, and I couldn't fix it.

(CROSSTALK)

KING: Put some individual...

MIKULSKI: Larry, I think our heart goes out to the families.

(CROSSTALK)

KING: Never interrupt Barbara.

MIKULSKI: No, but you have...

KING: The power of the Senate.

MIKULSKI: What is the job of the United States Senate? It is not to be on "HEADLINE NEWS." The job of the United States Senate is that we are supposed to wake up every day and think about the day-to-day needs of our constituents and the long-range needs of the country. And then, using the processes established by the Constitution, to work hard and go at it.

Now you asked the four new women what surprised them the most. Well, let me tell you what delighted me the most as the senior woman. I run a little workshop, teaching the new members and this time we including the guys as well -- how to get started. I have been astounded and pleased at how quick they have been to jump into the Senate, to grab hold of the committees.

They haven't been there an hour and half, and they've been offering amendments. They've been representing their states. You know, they tease me and call me the coach. I don't even have to blow my whistle anymore. They're right out there. And that's what the Senate is, out there...

KING: Senator Collins -- activists?

COLLINS: I would. And Barbara Mikulski was one of the first people who called me after I was elected. And Mary and I attended one of her workshops to learn how to get appropriations for work-well projects in our state. It's just -- she's been just wonderful to all of us in helping us be objective.

KING: Senator Hutchison, how well has Senator Clinton been accepted?

HUTCHISON: Oh...

KING: I mean, not we haven't had many first ladies. You know, there's been only one.

HUTCHISON: That's true. Well, she is the first, and -- but she has been so careful to do everything that she's expected to do, not to step in front of anyone. And she has co-sponsored amendments for all of us. I mean, we've worked together, and I think she is showing how hard she wants to work for New York. And she's doing just what Barbara Mikulski says.

KING: Would all of the veterans agree that she's...

MIKULSKI: Oh, she's just a regular senator.

(LAUGHTER)

CLINTON: I mean, these women sitting here have been so helpful, but they've also been very willing to offer constructive criticism, as well as helpful advice.

KING: Oh, they have?

CLINTON: Absolutely. And I have to put in a special plug for my Republican colleagues, because they have been terrific to me personally and, I think, to all of us.

KING: Do you ever feel, Senator Clinton, like a come-down from being first lady to one of 100?

CLINTON: No, no.

KING: Not at all?

CLINTON: I am so honored. Yes, I'm absolutely honored to be in the Senate. And you know, that always strikes me as a strange thing to say. I mean, as Senator Byrd would say if he were here, this is the oldest functioning deliberative body in any country in the world. And you know, the United States Senate is just the greatest opportunity to serve you could imagine.

(CROSSTALK)

KING: All right, I've got to get a break in, and then we'll jump back in. Everybody will get in. We'll be right back. Don't go away.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

KING: We forgot Senator Carnahan for a moment. Has it been worth it, as far as having been appointed to this job due to a tragedy?

CARNAHAN: I don't think so, really. All these ladies here have been such an inspiration. When you read the book, you'll see that a lot of them have overcome -- they triumphed over tragedies in their own life. They've overcome a number of things.

And so, I'm just one of them in that respect, because I have my own tragedy that I have to overcome every day. But I know that these ladies have done some of those same things. And they've been an inspiration to me.

LANDRIEU: But these four new ones have been really spectacular, all of them in their own right. And I think all of us though, as Jean was just saying -- have just the utmost respect for how she stepped into that role and did it. It's not something we've given her. She's earned it for herself.

And it was immediate from the first day she was here, that she had shared such a partnership that she could just step right in. And the people of Missouri very fortunate. To have that couple having represented them for all these years and she has been spectacular. And it's been an inspiration to all of us, I mean, literally every day.

KING: Senator Stabenow, you wanted to...

STABENOW: Well, I was going to comment -- before you were saying we are one of 100. Larry, I think we think of ourselves as being one of two people representing our state. I know for me, representing Michigan, Carl Levin and I represent Michigan. And when we talk about each of us, there's differences that we may find ourselves in relating to advocating on behalf of our states...

KING: But you have six-year terms. You have federal jobs, more so. I mean, the Congressman is serving to see the Medicare check gets there on time, right?

STABENOW: Well, I still feel -- I mean, I'm very concerned about the Medicare check.

KING: Do you serve individuals...

STABENOW: Absolutely. I have...

KING: I thought that was for the...

(CROSSTALK)

STABENOW: No, no, no. No, I don't.

FEINSTEIN: I wanted to just say one thing about Hillary, because it's been very interesting. She could have come into the Senate with very sharp elbows. She could have come into the Senate as a first lady. She didn't do either. That's been very interesting to watch, because if you're really going to be good in the Senate, you really have to get very technical and very good at some of the issues.

In other words, you develop your own portfolio of expertise. She's been willing to do that. And it sent a very loud message, I think, across both -- across the aisle. And I think, as a representative of the state, she has put that person foremost, which is very important to New Yorkers.

KING: Do you agree, Senator Snowe?

SNOWE: I ran into a former Senator in the cloakroom a few months ago and he served during the late '50s and early '60s. And I asked him about his observations and what he thought about the Senate of today.

And he said, the biggest difference is the fact of the presence of women on the floor of the Senate. He said that is a real big difference.

KING: Senator Hutchison, does the old rule of freshmen keep quiet still stand?

(LAUGHTER)

KING: By this show, I wouldn't bet on it.

HUTCHISON: Senator Mikulski broke that one.

(LAUGHTER)

KING: That used to be kind of unwritten.

HUTCHISON: It used to be, because I heard about that from some of the earlier senators. But all of us have to represent our state. And the great thing about the Senate is that everyone understands that.

So, like, I'm on the Appropriations Committee. I was chairman of the Military Construction Subcommittee, now Dianne is chairman and I'm the ranking member. But the military construction issues, we're going to agree on. We're going to work together. The same with Senator Mikulski who is also on the committee. We are here to make sure that all of our states get a fair shake, get what they need. Certain states have different needs. And there's a camaraderie, absolutely.

KING: All right, we'll get a break and come back.

I'll reintroduce the panel in case you just joined us: We have 12 of the 13 members of the Senate. This is all involved with a hit book that came out last year called "The Nine Women of the Senate" -- "Nine and Counting: The Women of the Senate" was the title. They appeared on this show, all nine.

And how they are 13. And a new book has come out, the paperback of that version with a new afterword called "And Then There Were Thirteen." You are seeing 12 of them. And we'll be right back.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

KING: I know this is history in the making because there has never been this many women in the Senate. And we've got them all here together, except for Senator Murray, who had legislative duties she could not get out of.

Let's reintroduce the panel. They are Senator Barbara Mikulski, Democrat of Maryland, first elected in 1986 the Dean of women in the Senate. Senator Kay Bailey Hutchison, Republican of Texas, elected in 1993, the first Republican woman in the Texas legislature. Senator Dianne Feinstein, Democrat of California, elected in '92, who co-wrote with her granddaughter, "Meet my Grandmother: She's a United States Senator."

Senator Barbara Boxer, Democrat of California, first elected to the Senate in 1992. Senator Olympia Snowe, Republican of Maine, elected in '94, the only person to serve as the state's first lady and one of its senators at the same time. Hillary couldn't top that. Senator Susan Collins, Republican of Maine, elected in 1996. Senator Mary Landrieu; Senator Landrieu is a Democrat of Louisiana elected in '96, the youngest woman ever elected to the Louisiana legislature. Senator Blanche Lincoln is a Democrat of Arkansas; in '98 she became the youngest woman ever elected to the U.S. Senate. She was 17.

(LAUGHTER)

KING: Senator Deborah Stabenow is a Democrat of Michigan, elected in 2000; in '74, she became the youngest person ever elected to the Ingham County Board of Commissioners. Senator Maria Cantwell, Democrat of Washington, elected in 2000; served one term in the U.S. House, became executive for the computer -- for a major computer software company.

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, elected in 2000, first -- and the former first lady of the United States. Senator Jean Carnahan, Democrat of Missouri, the widow of Governor Mel Carnahan, who died in that tragic plane crash on October 16 of 2000. On December 4, officially appointed to an interim term of two years to a Senate seat won by her deceased husband.

Senator Mikulski, tell us about the book. How did this book come about? Where do proceeds go?

MIKULSKI: Well, the book really tells the story of our lives. It has a marvelous extra chapter on the four new women. It talks about how we get to the Senate, how we juggle our lives in the Senate. Every single woman here has incredible family demands.

Blanche has twins. Mary has two adopted children. Many of us had elder care issues that we had to deal with. Then it talks about how we stay in the Senate, how we do our job, and for interview tips. Really, tips on how to be successful.

KING: Oh, it's a how-to book?

MIKULSKI: It's about -- a how-to.

(LAUGHTER)

(CROSSTALK)

MIKULSKI: And the proceeds will go to the Girl Scouts.

So the paperback's out. It's, I think, affordable. We really -- we think that -- we are saying to a lot of folks out there. If you read the book, you learn a lot about us and our lives. But also, we think there's a lot of lessons learned for everyone juggling -- balance needs between a family and a career, and also the kind of challenges where you do run into subtle discouragement.

KING: Senator Hutchison, were you surprised at the success of this book?

HUTCHISON: I wasn't, because I think what binds us together in many ways is the obstacles that we've overcome. And I think people can read the book and see that we have overcome just about every obstacle that you could meet when you go out into the real world.

So I think that is encouraging to young girls and to women, that you can overcome it if you persevere and you dust yourself off and you get up and keep on going.

KING: Anybody want to add anything just to know...

LINCOLN: I think it's so important. We're all women, but we're not all exactly alike. You know, we certainly appreciate and are glad about our similarities, but we also respect our differences. And this book highlights, as the other senators have mentioned, the challenges. That's our common denominator: the challenges that we have met in coming into a world that was predominantly male. There are a lot of those.

FEINSTEIN: I think one of the things that we are, are door- openers. We've opened many doors. We've been the first to cross the threshold.

KING: Pathfinders.

FEINSTEIN: Yes, in a sense. And once that door is open, whether its first lady or CEO of a high-tech company or a state legislator or a mayor, or the first anything, that door remains open for all time.

And so, I think by us...

(CROSSTALK)

BOXER: Senator Feinstein and I were the first two women to represent a state. So...

(CROSSTALK)

(LAUGHTER)

KING: We have California.

UNIDENTIFIED SENATOR: By the way...

(LAUGHTER)

STABENOW: You know, Larry, there are, I think, important things though that give significant changes for women, specifically that have resulted because of women in the Senate and the House, with the first wave, prior to my time in 1992, women coming into the Senate was probably the first time a focus on women's health research, led by women right here.

And now we read, or we hear on the radio about some new research project, some new information for women. That wasn't just an accident. That came about because of women saying: We're going to focus on women's health research. And surprise, surprise, we chose women as the subjects of the research.

(CROSSTALK)

KING: Let me get a quick break, and we'll come right back with our women of the Senate. Don't go away.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

KING: Senator Cantwell, you ran a big company. Now...

CANTWELL: I was an executive of my own company.

KING: Well, and now you're with a company that's not supposed to make money. Big difference?

CANTWELL: Well, I think that there's, you know, both a public trust in delivering good service to people and delivering it well. And for us, one of our biggest challenges has been dealing with the good economic times that we've had, but now there's economic slowdown. And so there are big challenges to being good economic stewards for this country.

KING: Is that a good background?

CANTWELL: I think it is; I think it's important. We all have diverse backgrounds here; but there are more women working in the work force than ever. And I think there was a statistic, there are women who work in small business than work at the "Fortune" 500 company. So I think having somebody in the United States Senate who's had a background in that is not a bad idea.

KING: Senator Collins, is it -- or you wanted to say something?

COLLINS: I just want to make the point that we did all take different roads to the United States Senate. And one of the purposes of this book is to tell people that there is no one path, but to inspire young girls to realize that they can grow up to be a United States senator. And there's no one path. There's no one ideology; but you can get there if you persevere.

KING: That was the hope of a young girl 30 years ago didn't have.

UNIDENTIFIED SENATOR: That's right.

COLLINS: Well, I feel very lucky because Olympia and I have the role model of Margaret Chase Smith. But...

KING: Your state was the only that...

COLLINS: Yes.

LANDRIEU: Larry, I wanted to follow up on that for a minute. I'm glad Susan raised it, because as Kay said, she wasn't surprised at the popularity of the book, but I, for one, was. I mean, I kind of had to get dragged kicking and screaming to do this project. I thought, "no one is going to buy this book," but I was wrong, because of this issue. Because the stories are about how we all got to the Senate.

Barbara Mikulski is a social worker. Kay is a lawyer. Dianne was a former mayor. Barbara was a community activist and on the city council. And I could go around -- Blanche came out of the farming community, Hillary's a lawyer. And what Susan said, we all came to it.

And so when people read the book, I think that's what they thought: There's no one perfect way, there's no one right way. We can all serve in different capacities.

KING: There's something we haven't discussed, and Senator Carnahan, we know, is a widow. Is it hard not having a partner and being in the Senate?

CARNAHAN: Well, it's been said that -- I think it was Cokie Roberts' mother who was asked when she replaced her husband, someone said to her, "How will you ever get along without a wife?"

And she said, "Probably not too well." The men do have a benefit in having a wife, having someone who sees after the home and the children and so forth. Whereas a lot of the women who are not married or are separated from their husbands by distance have to see after everything. And so I admire what they're doing, because they're balancing a lot of balls.

KING: What's it like for the husband, Senator Clinton?

CLINTON: Well, I think we all have very supportive spouses, those of us who are married, because this is a job that you need a lot of support in. And I really admire Jean and others who are out there every day, you know, working hard to do this job.

You know, it's really important, I think, though, that every one of us -- to just reiterate what we said -- are here because of people who came before, and we're so fortunate. You know, I certainly look to the women who were here before I was here, women who were groundbreakers. And it's a tough job, whether you have somebody at home or not. It's a very demanding job.

And I have to say, before I was actually in the Senate, I didn't really fully understand how demanding it is, because you're really having to be two places at once. You have to fulfill your obligations here in the capital, and you have to pay attention to what goes on back at home.

KING: And do the husbands have special understandings as well, ladies? Do all your husbands, they have the -- I mean...

(CROSSTALK)

LANDRIEU: We're right here in Washington and...

KING: Your wife is better known than you.

LANDRIEU: Well, but Frank moved here to Washington. He's been terrific. And I think in many ways, he's been a role model. Our spouses have had to, you know, make different decisions, and each family's made a different decision. But he's been here and he's been wonderful. Some of us commute. We're back in our state...

(CROSSTALK)

STABENOW: Larry, I was just going to say, I'm not married, but family, as a whole, has to be extremely supportive. I have a very supportive mother who lives just a few miles from my home back in Lansing, Michigan, who watches out for things.

And even though my children are now 21 and 25, I mean, they have been terrific -- my brothers and their families. It really becomes a family affair. And if you have people that are really supportive around you, just like with anything, any goal that you try to achieve, it's important that your family be supportive.

KING: Senator Lincoln, are you well-supported at home?

LINCOLN: Absolutely.

KING: What does your husband do?

LINCOLN: He's a physician, so his schedule is quite demanding as well. But it requires choices, just as other people across this great nation who work make choices every day, too.

Some of them are difficult; some of them are not so difficult. But he's extremely supportive with our children, and our aging parents, as Senator Mikulski mentioned -- I'm kind of in that sandwich generation between my small children and my aging parents.

But my husband's been enormously supportive, not only here, but getting here as well. Because the campaign trail is unbelievable.

KING: They have to take a back-step, though, don't they, Senator Hutchison, the husbands?

HUTCHISON: Well, my husband, I guess, in a different category. He is a preeminent municipal finance lawyer, a partner in a major law firm. He has his own life and he is respected for himself, which I think is very important.

KING: I've got to get a break. We'll pick right up.

It's not easy folks, trying to get everybody balanced time.

We'll be right back and Senator Snowe is next. Don't go away.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

KING: We're back. We only have two segments left, so we're going to try to get through some of the issues.

Senator Snowe, was it tough when Senator Jeffords -- when it happened?

SNOWE: Yes. And a surprise, and obviously very disappointed. He's a friend -- and just didn't expect it. You know, I had wished we could have worked it out.

KING: You became in one second a double minority -- a woman and a minority member of the Senate.

SNOWE: Right, and sort of saying -- you know, being a -- yes, that's true, minority, minority, minority. Being a Republican and a moderate sometimes is like being a member of "Survivor."

(LAUGHTER)

(CROSSTALK)

SNOWE: You get a distinct feeling you're no longer welcome as a member of the tribe. But anyway...

(LAUGHTER)

KING: Senator Boxer, how well are you working with the new president?

BOXER: Well, I'm looking for common ground, Larry -- looking for common ground. I tell you, I work, really, with my colleagues more than with the administration. For example, Sue Collins and I have a bill to make the Environmental Protection Agency a cabinet-level position. We think it's going to happen. And so, I really focus more on getting things through the Senate.

KING: Is this bipartisan, as you two seem to be, with this approach?

(CROSSTALK)

COLLINS: It is indeed. We're working very closely on the bill, and I think, because we're working together in a bipartisan way, that we're going to get it through.

KING: Do you think we'll ever see, Senator Clinton, true campaign finance reform?

CLINTON: Well, I hope so, you know...

KING: We keep hearing it, but...

CLINTON: Well, you know, the Senate did its job. We worked hard to pass a good bill and send it on to the House. And I really hope that the leadership in the House will let there be a vote on true campaign finance reform. I think would be great for the country.

KING: Senator Hutchison, what do you think the president's going to do about stem cell research?

HUTCHISON: Well, I think he's really agonizing about this decision. He realizes it's so important and he is reaching out to every scientist, every doctor, the pope, we know -- so I think he is going to try to make a decision that is right. And I think it's probably the toughest decision he's going to -- has made, at least up until this time.

BOXER: Didn't he, in the campaign, say he was against embryonic cell research? So he's really rethinking that now?

KING: I think he said that.

BOXER: Oh, he is rethinking. OK.

HUTCHISON: But the issue is more defined now, I think.

KING: This is a tough moral issue. Have you ever had, yet, to -- have you all had to compromise?

UNIDENTIFIED SENATOR: Oh, yes.

KING: You do that all the time? Isn't that hard to do when...

UNIDENTIFIED SENATOR: Democracy is about compromising.

KING: But you're strong individuals. Isn't it hard to...

STABENOW: It's not about compromise principle. We compromise among in appropriations committee...

(CROSSTALK)

STABENOW: But you know, it's not about principles. It's really compromising in terms of meeting needs of various parts of the country, various parts of your state. A variety of priorities that people have in trying to find some common ground.

LANDRIEU: Larry, one of the examples is going to be energy. You know, we're developing an energy policy for the nation, and you could look around at each of our states and know that there's a particular piece of this energy policy that is very important. Debbie, the Great Lakes in Michigan, you know, in the Gulf Coast region, producing natural gas. Dianne has been working on CAFE standards. And so it's going to be a negotiation to try to fashion a bill that...

(CROSSTALK)

KING: ... new world in the Senate, to compromise value?

FEINSTEIN: Well, there are big issues and there are small issues. There are big issues. I mean, many of us here, a big issue, for example, is a woman's right to choose, for many of us. That is a big issue...

KING: So you would never compromise in that area?

FEINSTEIN: Well, again, it depends. But you've got to look at the issue. Now, I think part of being successful in what we do is knowing when, as I say, to go to the wall and really fight for something straight out, and when not to, when to compromise.

KING: Got to know when to hold them and know when to fold them.

FEINSTEIN: Exactly.

KING: We're going to take a break. We'll be back with our remaining moments. We're going to try to get a word in from everyone in these final moments of our panel of 12 of the 13. The book is "Nine and Counting: The Women of the Senate." The paperback is now out with an afterword, "And Then There Were Thirteen." Don't go away.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

KING: Senator Landrieu has just made me an offer to follow them all around for a day. Well, first: Could I keep up with each of you? Because you're all going in different directions.

(CROSSTALK)

UNIDENTIFIED SENATOR: Wear comfortable shoes.

KING: That would be impossible.

OK, a show of hands: anyone want to be president?

(LAUGHTER)

KING: No one wants to? Senator Mikulski, did you get over to see that train accident? Was that weird?

MIKULSKI: Well, Baltimore was hit by both a terrible train wreck, as well as some issues with Johns Hopkins. I say hats off to the fact that we had such brave firefighters and emergency management. And quite frankly, under President Clinton, we were (UNINTELLIGIBLE), so we had all of the standby and everything ready to be able to protect lives and property.

KING: Did you head to the scene?

MIKULSKI: I was on the phone with the governor and the mayor. I think that you can't show up and be showbiz. Those firefighters had to do their job, not be with Barbara Mikulski. They had to be in the tunnel. And so my job was to be on the phone with the mayor and the governor to make sure that we were having the right resources at the right time.

KING: Do you all try to go home every weekend? Do you go home at the same time?

UNIDENTIFIED SENATOR: Every other weekend.

KING: Every other weekend. Is it tough having two residences?

UNIDENTIFIED SENATOR: Yes.

MIKULSKI: I commute everyday.

KING: Oh, that's right, you drive.

MIKULSKI: I'm a commuter.

FEINSTEIN: And the length from the West Coast is a tough commute...

(CROSSTALK)

KING: I'm sorry?

LINCOLN: Try taking a husband and two kids and a dog home with you when you go, traveling back and forth.

KING: Is it essential to touch base at home?

UNIDENTIFIED SENATOR: Oh absolutely. That's our job.

SNOWE: It's also nice to get back to home because it's a breath of fresh air, getting back to a normal lifestyle.

(CROSSTALK)

COLLINS: And it reminds you of what's important and what people really care about. And often that's different than what people in Washington are talking about.

KING: You have the furthest trip, don't you? Yes, you do.

CANTWELL: Well, I think, you know, California is probably about five-and-a-half, six hours on a plane, depending on what the headwinds are like. But I think that you go because you find that there is actually more commonality than you would think, if you go and you talk to people about issues.

I said I was going to go to every corner of the state every year. And what I found is by going there and talking to them, you actually come up with the ideas that are part of our legislative agenda. There's solutions to some of these issues for a framework.

FEINSTEIN: There is an inside-the-Beltway mentality.

KING: No kidding?

FEINSTEIN: Yes. And so when we go home, and you say -- you talk to -- well, real people about real issues and you can bring back stories and anecdotes and suggestions, it is really helpful...

KING: Senator Clinton, do you miss the trappings of the White House?

CLINTON: Well, you know, Larry, being in the White House is a privilege that is just unique, and I enjoyed it. I'm grateful for that chance, but I love being in the Senate. And part of what I love about it are the people who are in the Senate. And not only the other senators, but you know, there's really hardworking, dedicated staff people -- professional staff who are there year-in and year-out, no matter who's in the majority.

You know, it is a very impressive enterprise. And one thing I hope I can convey to people is how important the work is and how difficult and challenging it is. There isn't enough understanding of that these days. And I'm very proud to be a part of this extraordinary body.

KING: Is it still the best job in the world, ladies? Someone said that once. It was a male senator, I think, but...

UNIDENTIFIED SENATOR: No, I want your job, Larry.

(LAUGHTER)

(CROSSTALK)

KING: You've been bucking for it for a long time.

UNIDENTIFIED SENATOR: She'd be good.

UNIDENTIFIED SENATOR: She'd be very good.

KING: Senator Snowe?

SNOWE: The reason is because you have the ability to move heaven and earth to do something -- to right a wrong. And I think that is the value of this job. And it's unfortunate today that public service has been devalued, because -- and it has.

KING: You've shown that here tonight. Thank you all. We've run out of time. I tried to give everybody an equal shot. Thank you Senator Carnahan, Senator Clinton. Thank you all very much.

The book is available right now. It's in paperback, "Nine and counting: The Women of the Senate" with the

U.S. SENATOR KENT CONRAD (D-ND) HOLDS HEARING ON THE BUDGET AND ECONOMIC OUTLOOK, 9/4/2001

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and thank you for holding this hearing.

And thank you very much with your entire team for being here with us.

I was particularly interested in the last exchange with Senator Frist about the cost of health care, something that I have given a lot of thought to over the years. And I think that it's absolutely appropriate to view what is happening now, as -- both in the private and public systems, as posing increasing stresses to the financial capacity of both businesses and government to afford health care.

And I was interested particularly in your comment that we don't have enough information. I certainly, for one, believe, Mr. Chairman, we ought to do whatever we can to acquire the information that CBO and others would need to advise us, so that we were making decisions that were based on the best possible information. And I would hope that's something we could look to in the future.

CLINTON: I also wanted to just make sure I understood the other point that Senator Frist was making with you about solvency, because I do think that the public and all of us need to understand what it is we're concerned about. And is it fair to say that, even though the existing system, as you described in your response to those questions with respect to Medicare and Social Security, are solvent at this time, that the potential of any Social Security reform that would cause us to incur transitional costs would be an additional expense that you've not yet taken into account?

I've heard, you know, some of the Social Security reform proposals with transition costs ranging from $1 trillion to $3 trillion depending upon the shape of the proposal. Are those in your 10-year projections?

CRIPPEN: None of the transition costs you refer to would be in our projections. We -- in the main, it is current law. And we -- the solvency of the Social Security trust funds are estimated by the actuaries, which I believe now is to 2038 for Social Security and much closer for HI. And what we were addressing before was has anything affected them this year, and the answer is no; those solvency dates remain roughly where they were.

CLINTON: And the concern that many of us on this committee have spoken about in previous hearings really is focused on the impending demographic effects of the retirement and increasing medical demands of the so-called baby boomer generation. And those are expected to begin making claims on the system, I think, in 2011.

So that the projections that we're talking about really have more to do with whether or not our country is going to be in strong fiscal condition to deal with future demands that we believe, in a responsible way, we should be prepared for.

And similarly with respect to the solvency of Medicare, that does not include a prescription drug benefit because that's not part of the Medicare program at this time; is that correct?

CRIPPEN: That's correct.

CLINTON: I'm also very interested in Senator Hagel's concerns about defense, which I think all of us share. And Senator Nelson also spoke to that.

Could -- I haven't seen the projects that CBO made about the $50 billion annual spending with respect to maintaining existing force levels, and could I get a copy of that?

CRIPPEN: Absolutely.

CLINTON: I'd like to see what that's based on and how it's derived.

But with respect to defense, the request that the administration has made, the $18 billion request, that's also not in your existing analysis; is that correct?

CRIPPEN: That's right.

CLINTON: Nor is the very important piece of legislation known as the education bill and the potential costs going forward also included; is that right?

CRIPPEN: It is not included, yes.

CLINTON: I for one am a very strong supporter of Senator Hagel's, I think, brilliant idea to have the federal government do what it said it would do, which was to pay for special education, which is something that I hear about everywhere I travel in New York because of the increasing costs.

But forward-looking special education payments that would be part of the federal government assuming the responsibility for special ed, which we should have when we started that program 25 years ago, that's not in your assessment.

CRIPPEN: It is not.

CLINTON: Similarly, the bill that is working its way through the House and will someday, I suppose, come to the floor of the Senate, with respect to energy, the kind of tax credits and other issues that will be addressed in meeting the energy crisis that may have abated some but has not disappeared, those figures are not in your projections.

CRIPPEN: They are not.

CLINTON: Also with respect to additional tax reform measures, many of us are concerned about the alternative minimum tax, which we know will drive many millions of taxpayers into a higher bracket thereby wiping away whatever rate reform they might have enjoyed, those are not in your figures are they?

CRIPPEN: No. Beyond what was provided for in the tax bill, no.

CLINTON: And many of the tax bill's provisions don't kick in until next year at the earliest and, you know, 2010 at the latest; is that right?

CRIPPEN: Yes, some of them don't -- for example, the estate tax repeal doesn't occur until the end of the period. And then everything is set in legislation to expire in 2011.

CLINTON: Now you have referred several times in your testimony to the need for the economy to continue growing. Has the CBO done any work over the last 15 to 20 years about those factors which contribute to a strong economy?

CRIPPEN: Not quite the way I suspect would be useful for you. We are better at looking at the past than we are looking at the future. So we have, of course, done some examination of what's happened. And most recently, in these last four or five years, the rapid economic growth, the good economy, was due to unforeseen increases in productivity. And as Senator Corzine suggested earlier today, the question for us is do those productivity increases continue?

Clearly, at the moment they aren't, but then always in a downturn they diminish. The question is, will they come back with the economy? And we think they will, at least some.

So what has caused, certainly in the recent past, good economic growth, has been good productivity. There are things that you might think helped that, whether it's tax policy, as Senator Corzine was suggesting, whether it's education and other things.

But there are really, when it comes down to it, Senator, only two pieces to economic growth in a simplistic way. One is the growth in the labor force, and the other is the growth in productivity. And so those are the two policies or the two ultimate goals you want to pursue with policies.

CLINTON: Well, that's right. What I'm concerned about is...

CRIPPEN: (inaudible) how you get there.

CLINTON: ... what I'm concerned about is, given where we are right now, whether there are steps that could do either of those effectively with respect to labor force growth and participation and productivity increases. And I know that's not your province; that's more of a policy issue. But I think many of us are concerned that we don't have an economic plan. We have had a tax cut plan, but we don't have an economic plan.

And looking at what factors could be enhanced or motivated in order to increase labor and productivity numbers is something that, obviously, we take very seriously. And there are many of us who think that if you're looking at the government budget situation right now, we should go back and revisit the idea that was in the Democratic alternative about some kind of trigger, to send a message to the markets that we're not going to go into a backward-looking posture, where we begin to slide back into uncontrolled deficits -- the triumph of politics on both sides of the aisle takes hold again.

So I'm wondering if you have thoughts about the trigger idea after having, I'm sure, talked about it with your staff, because of previous questions that we're addressed to the CBO.

CRIPPEN: I think the only thing we concluded, Senator, is that we don't know. That is to say trigger mechanisms don't give anybody much comfort in both how they would be constructed and how they would work. As you're suggesting, perhaps the capital markets would look at them more robustly than we have.

Again, one has to be careful, of course. And one of the big arguments against a constitutional amendment for a balanced budget or something like that is the straitjacket it might put the country in in times just as this, or worse, whether we're in a recession or weak economy or war or some other things.

And so one has to think about triggers look awfully good on one side of an economy and maybe not on another or on one side of a debate or not another.

But ultimately I think it comes down to policy-makers to take action, and whether you can foresee what those actions should be five or 10 years from now, and put a trigger in place, I don't know.

CLINTON: Something to be considered.

CONRAD: Thank the senator.

U.S. SENATOR EDWARD KENNEDY (D-MA) HOLDS HEARING ON STEM CELL RESEARCH. 9/5/2001

CLINTON: Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and thank you, Mr. Secretary.

I think, as probably all of us feel after these couple of hours together, there are a lot of unanswered questions which we will look forward to struggling through with you and those with whom you consult because clearly, as Senator Warner said, this is an issue of such great importance and resonance not only throughout our country, but throughout the world.

I'm still sort of acquiring information, trying to get it straight level, because there are just a lot of contradictory attitudes that are being expressed about what we have and what we don't have. And I think it's important that we have a factual base. You were not here, Mr. Secretary, for Senator Specter's testimony, but I'm sure your staff will fill you in and give you a copy of it. He certainly takes the position that is I think somewhat different from the one that you've expressed about what the viability and accessibility of the stem lines are.

We need to come to some basic agreement about what the evidence shows, and I hope that you will work with us on that because certainly Senator Specter and Senator Harkin have held a number of hearings on this issue, going back now nearly two years. And Senator Specter has a different basis of information available to him than what you've presented. So I hope that we can work through that so that we all know what we're talking about.

Secondly, the serious question that's been raised about the potential impact, if not contamination from the mouse cells, and also I believe blood serum from cattle is also used to nourish these cells in some of the settings, is one that we all have grave issues about. We are concerned that our government's own standards about how to treat the introduction of animal elements into human material have not necessarily been followed in the various locations where we've identified these stem cells.

So clearly we have a lot more work to do on that, because as you point out, the resource is going to take a number of years, and I think many of us would be very disappointed if at the end of all those years, the work could not be useful to the alleviation of human suffering because of the contamination that affected these cells.

One other question that I need some guidance about is in the president's speech, I believe he said he supported the House bill. And as I understand the House bill, it not only bans reproductive and therapeutic cloning in the United States and certainly any federal involvement in such efforts, but it goes a step further and says that if in England or Germany or Japan any therapy or treatment is created from therapeutic cloning, that treatment could not be imported into the United States. Am I understanding that correctly, and both the House bill and the president's positions?

THOMPSON: Senator Clinton, I have not done any research on that subject, I'm sorry to say. So I don't particularly want to answer that question at this point in time. I'd be more than happy to do the research and call you or write you with an answer on that.

But I would like to hopefully make a correction, and not to be confrontational. The contamination -- I don't believe there's contamination. Just because these cells rest on a mouse layer of cells doesn't mean that they're contaminated. And I have talked to FDA; I have talked to NIH. And it's such a traumatic experience for these cells to be taken out of the embryo that they have to have this cushion.

CLINTON: Mr. Secretary, I understand that, but the point that was made this morning -- and I'm just trying to get a base of information so that I can make the best possible decisions. But as I understood the chairman's point this morning, our government has issued guidelines about how mouse nutrients are to be injected into any kind of human material. So that clearly we know it happens. The xenotransplantation efforts that you referred to are ongoing. I read the letter that was distributed. Frankly, it still is a little concerning to me because the long list of steps to be taken to guard against any kind of untoward consequence of xenotransplantation are a little bit daunting to me.

But put xenotransplantation to one side, as I understand what the chairman said, our government had issued very strict guidelines about the introduction of mouse nutrients into the human material. And we have no guarantee that these stem cells in India or Sweden or anywhere else have followed the American government's guidelines, do we?

THOMPSON: We do not.

CLINTON: We do not. So I don't think any of us want to be confrontational. We're trying to understand what it is we're doing. So I don't think that if our government has rules about how to avoid contamination, that they have issued to researchers about how to use mouse nutrients, I think it's a fair conclusion to draw that in the absence of following those rules, some might conclude contamination has or could occur. That's my only point.

So my only point is that as we go forward to try to understand what it is we're doing here, we need to be open. We cannot close our minds. This is not an inquisition. This is not trying to determine who's right and who's wrong. We're trying to figure out what we are doing. And there have been many questions raised since the president's speech that deserve an answer. The scientific community deserves an answer. The Congress deserves an answer. And certainly people who are out there wondering about this deserve an answer. So on those several points, I would appreciate additional information.

I'm also hoping that as we look at this, the question that was raised by Senator Mikulski, which I think is a very important one, is that we have chosen to adopt a different approach than Great Britain, for example. As I understand it, they have an embryonic research advisory board that attempts to govern both public and private sector investments in this research. We've adopted a different approach. We've adopted these restrictions on federal funding, and very few on private funding. And I take seriously your point, and happen to agree with it, that the basic research is likely to be done with the public sector dollars.

Now that, though, raises some of the concerns that scientists have suggested to me, which is that it's very difficult to do the kind of basic research without those public dollars. That really is the core of whatever therapeutic use can come from this research. So that we're concerned, I think, about the potential shelf life of these stem cell lines; the specialization that can occur, rendering them useless for the research; the numerous references to the mouse lines that have been developed.

We don't know how many mouse lines to get those that are now replicable and usable. We are really out there in the dark trying to figure it out. If we're going to make an analogy to the mouse lines, we ought to have as much information as we can to know was it 1,000 mouse lines that eventually produced five viable mouse lines? Or was it 54 mouse lines that produced five viable mouse lines? I don't have any idea.

So I think that every one of us are grateful for the hard work that you and the NIH and the professional staff have done, and we're grateful that the president had a deliberative process that led at least to the door being opened. But as we learn more about these 64 stem lines, as we try to figure out how to reconcile Senator Specter's very strong statement -- it was a passionate statement this morning about what he believes to be the facts about these stem lines -- with your very optimistic statement about the stem lines, and the fact that if we go with the optimistic view, which is that this is all we need and this is all we're going to get, how many years do we lose? What do we give up? -- the questions that Senator Warner raised.

So I think, Secretary Thompson, that for many of us we are still in the asking questions stage. And if I may, just one final question -- you've said several times, you said in response to Senator Murray, that you envision private researchers taking up where the publicly funded basic research leaves off. What thought has been given to how these private researchers will be able to overcome the proprietary rights issue as they engage in commercial development? Will the kind of memoranda of understanding that you've reached between the government and the research institutions -- how will the private researchers be able to do that?

THOMPSON: Senator, first off, I didn't mean to imply anything. I just didn't want to leave this hearing saying that all of these lines are contaminated. I don't think they are.

Secondly, you raised a lot of points. I don't know those answers. I can tell you that I've been involved in this thing since a month after Jamie Thomson discovered. First as a governor, I have been an advocate, a passionate believer that this shows great promise and I still believe that. And we have to do the research, and we have to do the basic research, as you've indicated, to find out how can these cells be used. Maybe adult stem cells may be more usable, more placid than embryonic stem cells. That comparison has not been made. That has to be done.

In regards to the patent rights, I have talked to the people at NIH and they tell me this is no different; that the MOU and the statement of material transfer allows for this research to continue. And the intellectual rights, the research writing of the scientists will be able to be continued and will be saved for NIH. But once they develop a product, like they do any other product that doesn't use embryonic stem cell lines, then the private sector and the patent laws and the commercial laws of America take over. And they will have to negotiate with WiCell or get a license to use that. But that's no different than any other product that has been developed by NIH or by the private sector when there's an already existing patent out there.

KENNEDY: Thank you very much.

Senator Edwards?

EDWARDS: Good morning, Mr. Secretary.

THOMPSON: Good morning, Senator Edwards. How are you?

EDWARDS: I'm fine.

We appreciate your passion about this issue, and the work you've done in the past on it. There were a number of us that had concerns when the president made his speech about the rigid guidelines that he established, understanding that there are serious scientific and ethical questions that have to be resolved; and how those guidelines would be applied in the context of a very new science. I think all of us would recognize this is a very new and rapidly developing science.

THOMPSON: And very exciting.

EDWARDS: And very exciting -- potentially very exciting.

I think our concern is we want to make sure that that potential in fact is realized. At the time the president spoke, and shortly thereafter when you talked about the subject, you talked about 60- some-odd stem cell lines being available; the nature of the research that you thought could be done based on those stem cell lines.

Let me ask you first, are you aware of -- have you actually been on-site where these stem cell lines are located? And we have a list of where they are across the country and across the world. Have you actually been on-site and examined the stem cell lines?

THOMPSON: No, I have not. I have been in the University of Wisconsin lab many times, but I haven't been anywhere else, if that's your question.

EDWARDS: The American Society for Cell Biology has established four criteria that they think should apply in this context in order to satisfy the research that needs to be done. The first is that the cell line be available to publicly funded scientists, both at NIH and to universities around the country. The second is that the owners of the stem cell lines not impose restrictions that would limit that research; third, that they have growth and handling characteristics that are compatible with quality research; and fourth, that they retain the capacity to generate every adult cell type.

They're pretty simple actually. One is to make sure that it's available to the scientists who need to do the research; second, that there aren't legal restrictions and other restrictions that would limit the ability to do the research; third, that the stem cell lines themselves are usable for the research that needs to be done; and fourth, that they have the capacity to generate the adult cell types that need to be generated.

Do you know, as you sit here today, how many of the stem cell lines that meet your test also meet those four simple tests?

THOMPSON: I know 64 meet the president's guidelines in regards to federal funding. There are 64 that we have inquired about and re- inquired about and have met with personally.

EDWARDS: Can I interrupt? Do you think those are reasonable tests -- the tests that they lay out -- those four simple tests?

THOMPSON: I think that those four are adequate, and I think that...

(CROSSTALK)

EDWARDS: You think they're reasonable.

THOMPSON: They're reasonable.

EDWARDS: OK. Can you tell me, as you sit here today -- I mean, you and the president have already established the limitations -- can you tell me as you sit here today how many stem cell lines meet those four tests?

THOMPSON: Dozens.

EDWARDS: What does that mean, dozens? Twenty-five? Thirty? How many?

THOMPSON: I would say dozens. I would say 20 to 25 at this point in time. But as you were not here, there's three stages in which these embryonic stem cell lines go through. The first one is the proliferation, and there are several of those 64 lines that are in the proliferation lines. Several in the characterization lines, which shows over here, and several are in the cell line established, and it takes six to eight months to develop a good embryonic stem cell line. Some of these that have not met the full cell line establishment criteria yet will be, by the time they apply for the money and the money goes out at NIH, and that's going to take somewhere between eight or nine months to get the money out.

To give you an example, the Sweden Goteborg University has 19 lines, Senator Edwards. Three of them are in the cell line established, which means they're ready right now for research and that further research could be done. There are four in the characterization and there are 12 in the proliferation. Now, over the course of the next six to eight months, several will move from proliferation to characterization to the cell line established, and that's during the process that they will be applying for federal research dollars.

To tell you exactly today how many, I can't tell you. If I was pressed, I would say there'd be 24 to 25 that would meet the cell line established criteria, Senator Edwards.

EDWARDS: That leads me to my next question. You said, when I originally asked you, you said dozens, and then when I asked you a follow-up question about it you said 24, 25, something in the 20s. How do you know that those 24 or 25 meet this reasonable -- you described as reasonable -- criteria that the cell biologists have established?

THOMPSON: Well, basically because the MOUs that we've discussed with the entities -- the 10 entities that have them -- have indicated they want to share with the scientists. Two, that they can be used. Three, that they replicate or are pluripotent, which is the scientific word for that. And I don't know what the fourth one was; but, as I understand it, they meet those four qualifications.

EDWARDS: Well, let me ask you a follow-up question to that. How many genetically diverse stem cell lines -- and again, as we sit here today, not the potential, what we actually know about -- have the ability to regenerate themselves indefinitely? How many do you know about today?

THOMPSON: We think all 64.

EDWARDS: OK. So it's some of the other tests that you're not certain...

(CROSSTALK)

THOMPSON: Yes. The other characterization, the other things like the freeze-thaw testing, the cell marker assays, which are SSEAs 3s and 4s and PTA 61s and 80s, and the chromosome analysis and the testing for pluripotency. We're not sure about all of those things. But we do know, in order for this to be proliferating, they already started proliferating right after they've been removed from the blastocysts or in the cells in the cultural dish. They are proliferating right then. So all 64 lines have proliferated, we do know that for a fact.

EDWARDS: But you, HHS, NIH, have not physically been to the sites to actually examine the cells yourselves?

THOMPSON: No.

EDWARDS: Do you plan to do that?

THOMPSON: I probably will not, but I know the scientists will be doing an exhaustive study, which they already are. We're in the process of setting up the registry. We have signed -- you were not here -- but we did sign an MOU and a material transfer agreement yesterday with Wisconsin Alumni Research Foundation that allows for their five embryonic stem cell lines to be made available to the NIH scientists right now.

EDWARDS: Are those five lines available to the non-NIH scientists around the country, publicly funded scientists?

THOMPSON: Yes. Carl Gulbrandsen is here and you can ask him that question, but he has indicated yes, any scientists -- they want those lines...

EDWARDS: And what do we know about the availability of all the other stem cell lines?

THOMPSON: All I can tell you, Senator Edwards, is that the entities have been in to meet with Dr. Lana Skirboll and her staff, and I have personally met with them. I have not negotiated with them, but I have met with them, and they've all indicated to Dr. Lana Skirboll and to the staff at NIH that they want to make their cell lines available to scientists and for NIH to get the basic research done. They're excited.

EDWARDS: But at this point who controls that decision? Do they control it?

THOMPSON: The entities.

EDWARDS: We, as a nation, have left to them control over what kind of research can be done on these cell lines?

THOMPSON: No, no. They own them. I mean, they developed them, so they have control over them, and now what we're doing is...

EDWARDS: Yes, but we've created -- through this decision by you and the president, we've created a monopoly, and those people who have existing cell lines -- if I understand you correctly, what you're saying is they now have control over what research, if any, can be done by -- I mean, it's all well and good that they're well-intentioned about it, I appreciate that. But suppose they decide; no, in fact, they're not going to permit that to take place, or they're not going to permit the research to take place or they're only going to allow the NIH to do it and they're not going to allow the other scientists to do it?

THOMPSON: That is not what I've said, Senator. What I've said is that they all have indicated that they are in agreement and want to cooperate not only with NIH, but with other scientists to do the basic research on their stem cell lines.

WARF has gone a step further. They have negotiated now with NIH in an actual agreement, which was signed yesterday with NIH, to make their five cell lines that Jamie Thomson, the father of embryonic stem cells, has developed. He has licensed those to WARF. WARF, in turn, has licensed them or has given the permission to be used by NIH and other scientists through an MOU and the material transfer agreement for any type of research that the scientists want to do on those.

The second thing we're doing is we're developing a registry at NIH, making all of the 64 lines hopefully available for scientists around the world to be able to pick the line that they want to use for their research projects when they apply for federal research dollars.

EDWARDS: But the critical word there was "hopefully." And I know my time is up, but my obvious concern is, and I think it's a critical issue in this ongoing process, is by establishing the criteria that the president established, he limited the number of lines that even are potentially available and left in the hands of the people who presently have the proprietary control of those lines the decision-making about whether they're going to be publicly available. We can't force them to make them available. They have a legal right to do whatever they choose to do. And I appreciate that they're well-intentioned, but it certainly hasn't been an unusual thing in the past to have people act out of their own personal financial best interests, and it wouldn't be a shocking thing to see that happen in this case.

So I think the restrictions that have been imposed, obviously, create ongoing problems. I'm hopeful with you that we'll be able to get these folks to make these stem cell lines available, but I think that's a serious question as we sit here today.

And I thank you, Mr. Secretary, for your answers.

THOMPSON: Thank you. All I can tell you is, in answer, Senator Edwards, is that we've got five. The first one we've negotiated with, which is the one that has the patent in America, is the one we've reached an agreement with, and we feel very good about that, and we think the other ones will follow through. I can't promise you today that definitely we're going to have them all signed up next week, but we're working on them and we're working as fast as we possibly can to reach an agreement with them.

EDWARDS: Thank you, Mr. Secretary.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

KENNEDY: Thank you.

Mr. Secretary, I would just make a very brief comment, and then if there are others who want to have a final question, obviously they're welcomed.

No one could sit through the course of this hearing now since 9:30 and not know of your own very strong commitment in terms of the research in this area, and your belief that this offers some enormous opportunities and hope for families across this country from these dreaded diseases that afflict every family in America, and that is very commendable. The president is fortunate to have the kind of advocacy that you've expressed here.

There are those that view this situation somewhat differently, and we are here trying to listen, as we have carefully to your presentation, and made in a very convincing way. Will there be the availability of stem cells for the research and the opportunities in an area that was really unthought of -- or maybe thought of, but not in reality until two and a half, three years ago -- and with all of the kinds -- the best of the researches that are done at NIH, will there be the sufficient kinds of product out there to permit the kind of opportunities for breakthroughs? Now, you make a very convincing and compelling case that there is.

I think there have been some legitimate issues and questions that have been raised that cause us some concern. I think one of those issues that I have raised very briefly, as others have, the question of the conditions on safety, and the issues of the use of nutrients from mice, and the fact that in these various stem cell lines that you talk about here, you would be hard-pressed to think that any of those follow the very strict guidelines that have been issued on August 24, 2001 on mice from a colony that's continually monitored for infectious diseases.

We know about Mad Cow disease. No one expected that that kind of infectious disease would be able to move from animals to human beings, from a colony that was not allowed to inter-breed with animals outside the colony, routinely tested for infectious diseases, was quarantined for three weeks prior to the procurement of cells.

Now, we're told that we have to stay with these cells. We have to stay with the ones. Even if we are able to take mice and create the new stem cell lines further after August 9 that would meet all the requirements that the administration has put out on CDC, we're saying, "No, no, you can't do it. August 9 is it." And even if we are able to discover after two and a half years that we may be able to do it without the nutrients from mice -- maybe other kinds of nutrients which would save us that kind of perhaps kind of risk -- we're told we can't do it because it's after August 9.

We commend you for the arrangements that you've made and able to getting one of the 10 suppliers to make a strong commitment to make available the stem cell lines. And we're impressed by your own work in the past in saying that you've been in touch with all of the others and you believe that they will make them available. I think most of us would say that no one underestimates your ability to talk to someone and get an understanding and form an impression about whether that's for real or not, and I have a lot of respect for that. I think many would say we ought to get it in writing because what we have seen, as I understand it from similar situations, that there hasn't been the kind of readily available access when similar kinds of situations have been out there in terms of research at the NIH.

And I think most of us have been around here long enough to see what OPEC was able to do to our economy and to the impact that this has on our society when they get together -- 11 of them. And we're talking not 11 countries, we're talking about 10 basic -- some countries -- but basically 10 entities, and that raises concerns.

So these are all important. We had brief comments about the patents, and you've commented about that. I know you've worked on it. So these do raise some serious questions. But as far as I'm concerned, I want to take what you've said here today and hear from this next panel, their reactions to some of these and then to sort of work with you. I do find at the end of the day, sort of an August 9 deadline -- a sort of drop-date line -- and the unwillingness to be able to, in spite of what follows on in terms of breakthroughs in the areas of research, serve as a barrier to important progress in terms of cancer or Alzheimer's, very troublesome.

But we have learned a good deal this morning, and I've been enormously impressed by your presentation. We will keep in close touch with you on this issue. We want to try and work with the administration. We, again, thank the president for addressing it. And it's just a desire to make sure that we're going to be able to get done what he has said that he wanted done and what, I think, offers the greatest hope for the American people.

Senator Dodd?

THOMPSON: Can I just say, thank you, Senator Kennedy, for your tremendous interest and passion on this subject. And we may not totally agree on whether or not the August 9 deadline is correct or not, but I think we both agree that we need to get the research done and the questions answered.

I thank you for your passion, your advocacy of this issue, and I want to publicly state that I support that and want to work with on as much as I possibly can to accomplish that.

KENNEDY: Thank you very much.

DODD: Mr. Secretary, just to pick up on some of Senator Kennedy's comments -- I think Senator Clinton used the right word -- this is not an inquisition at all. Obviously, there's deep interest in the subject matter not only here and obviously in the scientific community. As we've heard painfully on many cases from the people-at-large in the country who don't understand all of this and a lot of the news media may be, in a sense, hyping a bit what the potential is, but understandably when you've got a family member, a loved one who is suffering and you hear about the potential to be able to deal with Alzheimer's or diabetes or other such illnesses, it is very, very exciting.

I for one, I want to thank you. You're in the box here and we're kind of raising the questions to you, but I think you deserve a great deal of credit for bringing this along as far as you have. I mean, there are some of us here who would like to have seen the administration go a bit further with this, in my view; not that I wanted to see it all, I strenuously oppose the idea of somehow creating -- someone once used the word hatcheries -- I would vehemently oppose that.

But I also understand with the ability to provide people with families through in vitro fertilization and that there are excess embryos here, and I raised the issue with you earlier as to whether or not then there is going to be a position taken on banning the destruction of those excess embryos. And if there is, that would sort of be consistent, I suppose, with the view that they can't be used. If it's not, it raises the quandary, if you're not opposed to their destruction, how could you be opposed to using them? If, in fact, these other lines that we hopefully are going to do exactly what you've described don't pan out, we've got another source there to deal with.

I think you've done a tremendous job and you're right, we now have a position taken by this administration to publicly finance research, having drawn lines -- and I have difficulty with an arbitrariness of an August 9 at 9 p.m. -- but, nonetheless, this is breakthrough. This is good. And we ought not to allow this hearing to end on a note that somehow, while there is still some disagreements over whether or not August 9 there's some additional embryos that ought to be used, this is very positive. And so, I didn't want the hearing to end without expressing my gratitude to you.

I suspect you had an awful lot to do with this. The fact that there was this speech on August 9, I suspect that you had a lot to do with the fact that there was some breakthrough here, moving the line a bit further than I suspect some inside the White House wanted to be moved. You don't have to answer that. I just have my own suspicions about it and I'm grateful to you and a lot of other people are. And I know that you've got a first-rate team.

I can't tell you how excited I am about the work that's being done in adult stem cell research. I've had wonderful conversations with my friend from Tennessee, who's been enlightening me on cord blood stem cells and what that can mean. And, again, at NIH, I've had wonderful conversations with your acting director out there about how realistic cord blood stem cells might be. But nonetheless, it's very exciting, the work that's being done and so I thank you for being here today and thank you for the work you've done.

Obviously, some of the questions that have been raised; Senator Clinton's questions, Senator Kennedy's. We need to follow up on these pretty quickly, because if it turns out that you're wrong and we can't extract these things, then we've got to revisit this issue. I know you don't want to admit that this morning, but the only thing you said that worried me is that we will never reconsider the August 9 date and I'm not going to ask you to repeat that because I'd like to believe you may want to rethink it. So if we have to come back to that, we're going to have to come back to it and we'll talk to you when that occurs.

Thank you.

THOMPSON: Senator Dodd, thank you and thank all of the members in the panel. I'll tell you, this has been a great discussion and the beauty of it, this holds so much promise of everybody out there that has a loved one that has suffered from breast cancer or for dementia or anything who is waiting for the possibility. We just can't get the information out there that the cure is around the block.

DODD: I agree.

THOMPSON: We have to get this basic research done. The president has allowed that to continue. I'm excited about it and I know you are, Senator Dodd, and I thank you very much for all of your comments and all of your questions today.

(UNKNOWN SENATOR:) Mr. Chairman, just two minutes.

I, again, want to thank Secretary Thompson and the president. A lot of thought, a lot of consideration, a lot of individual meetings, and this issue deserves it because it is -- again, as we look at science -- one of the few issues that we've had to face -- humanity's had to face that has the opportunity both for promise altering the basic building blocks of life, but could also have the unintended consequences. I want to thank you for that.

I do believe that we should expeditiously implement the policy put forth by the president. It's carefully crafted. As this moves forward, it will be important -- again, because science changes so quickly, so rapidly -- that we continuously reevaluate both the progress as well as the needs of this research.

If there's one thing that has come out from your comments and the comments in the last several weeks is that this is an uncharted area of scientific inquiry, whether we're talking about mouse cells or xenotransplantation, which we've addressed in one context of transplanting whole organs, but not quite as much in cells. It demands an ongoing public discussion among the policy-makers, like here today; the scientific community, who we'll hear from shortly; ethicists; the religious leaders; and the American people. It's absolutely critical to have that discussion on an ongoing basis not just today, but an ongoing basis as science does change and progresses.

We are going to have wait several years before we know whether or not the embryonic stem cell research is going to yield the promise that we all hope that it will. In the meantime, I believe we should move forward expeditiously in implementing the president's policy and continue to examine the progress closely over the coming months and years.

THOMPSON: Thank you.

KENNEDY: Thank you very much, Mr. Secretary.

Senator Clinton?

CLINTON: I just wanted to say that I wouldn't want you to leave thinking that because I and others have raised some very tough issues, we don't totally respect what you are doing and have done.

And I also want to thank our colleague, Senator Frist, because I think he might also have had some things to say and do that have led us to this point. We're very grateful for that. But we need this kind of open, honest dialog where -- this is a decision that because of living in a global media age, we're bringing in millions of people to be part of. It's not going to be made by scientists in a closed lab or senators behind closed doors. This is a society decision that has to be addressed in that way. I know, given your background and what you've done with this particular issue; and, in general, that you understand that and will be, you know, working to lead public opinion as well.

Thank you very much.

KENNEDY: Thank you, Mr. Secretary.

THOMPSON: Thank you.

KENNEDY: The hour is late, but I think we'll try and get started on our panel if we could.

We will invite Dr. Douglas Melton, who is the chairman of the Department of Molecular and Cellular Biology, Harvard University's leading stem cell researcher. He has made numerous important discoveries in diabetes research. Dr. Melton was honored for his outstanding accomplishments in medical research by being named to the National Academy of Sciences in 1995.

Ms. Karen Hersey is the senior counsel for Intellectual Property at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. She can speak from extensive professional experience from the complications that can arise in seeking access to essential medical research materials.

Dr. James Childress is the Edwin Kyle professor of Religious Ethics at the University of Virginia. Dr. Childress served with distinction on the National Bioethics Advisory Commission, whose report on stem cells is a thoughtful guide to the complex ethical issues raised by this research. It's a special pleasure to welcome Dr. Childress, who is formerly the Joseph P. Kennedy senior professor of Christian ethics at Georgetown University and who has been a great, great leader in all the areas of bioethics and someone I've respected over a long period of time.

Dr. Kevin Fitzgerald is the Dr. Lawlor Professor for Catholic Health Care Ethics at Georgetown and associate professor of oncology. He has written extensively about the moral ethical issues raised by new advances in medicine.

Dr. John Chute conducts research in adult stem cells at Bethesda Naval Medical Center, and I believe that research on adult stem cells should proceed in parallel with vigorous research programs in embryonic stem cells. We welcome his testimony on this important topic.

It's a pleasure to have all of you and we'll look forward to moving ahead. I'll ask Dr. Melton if he'd be good enough to start?

MELTON: Good afternoon, Chairman Kennedy and Senator Frist. Thank you for inviting me to speak here today about human embryonic stem cells.

In the last three years, the potential of these cells has been widely debated in the public, and rightly so. The subject forces us all to revisit the question of when life begins. And we have to scrutinize the crossroads between scientific inquiry, our efforts to improve the human condition and our moral and ethical responsibilities to preserve human dignity.

I am not here to testify on the moral, religious or political aspects of this research. I appear before you as a scientist and as the father of a young boy with Type I, or juvenile diabetes. I will furthermore not speak to you about the human burden of diabetes and will simply say that I work on human embryonic stem cells to try to treat or cure diabetes.

My remarks today will, therefore, be confined to the scientific potential of these cells and the implementation of the president's plan about which we've already heard. In my written testimony, which I'd like submitted for the record, I summarize the properties of embryonic stem cells and put that research in a larger context of recent biological activities and studies at the NIH.

Let me just say now that the ability of these cells to make any part of the body is what holds their promise for therapies. We've already heard about the numerous diseases that can be potentially treated: Parkinson's, Alzheimer's, osteoporosis, and the disease that has my full attention, juvenile diabetes. And I'd simply like to say at this point that while adult stem cells have some similar properties, based on what we know today, adult stem cells do not have all the properties of embryonic stem cells. To give an example, there is no credible evidence for the isolation or growth of an adult pancreatic stem cell, and that alone justifies, in my view, the work on embryonic stem cells.

I don't need to remind you all that the president made an important speech on the 9th of August, and I'd simply like to comment on that date, as I feel it has important implications for the implementation of his plan. That date was not chosen for scientific reasons and its arbitrary selection will unquestionably have an effect on the progress of research. For example, as we've already heard, it will not be possible for federally funded researchers to explore new ways to derive human embryonic stem cells; stem cells that have a broader genetic diversity, or perhaps were grown in the absence of mouse tissue. For example, grown with human as opposed to mouse tissue.

Nevertheless, as Secretary Thompson has rightfully pointed out, the door has been opened and some research can now be done, and I would like to address two issues and make a proposal for the implementation of the president's plan.

One of the things I feel the committee has struggled with is the lack of information about these 60-plus cell lines and legitimate questions were asked about them. Let me simply say that scientists are, by their nature, inquisitive and skeptical, and we hold dear the practice of publishing results following an independent review by qualified experts. Moreover, by publishing results, scientists generally agree that the reagents reported therein, including cells, are to be made available and shared with the research community. In this way, the results can be independently verified, new directions and discoveries can be explored.

The problem with the present case is that only a handful of these 60- plus embryonic cell lines have been published, so it is not yet possible to give evaluation or comment on the quality of the lines. Nonetheless, legitimate questions can be asked about their growth, differentiation potential, age and purity. These issues have already been raised this morning.

What I can say is that decades of experience with mouse embryonic stem cells show that they lose their differentiation potential, become contaminated, accumulate mutations and tend toward spontaneous differentiation or uncontrolled differentiation after a certain period. This is related to the question that Senator Mikulski raised about shelf life. Stated otherwise, there is incontrovertible evidence that old mouse embryonic stem cells do not have the same potential that young ones do. If I were to give an analogy with a human, it is true that these lines can grow forever and are, in that sense, immortal, but they lose their potential. A 150-year-old person may still be alive but does not have the same potential as a 20-year-old.

I hasten to add that I am not criticizing the NIH nor the scientists who have reported the isolation of these 60 stem lines. Indeed, the scientists have not published their work and they may well wish to further characterize the cells before doing so. It's, therefore, in my opinion, too early to tell how many of the 60 lines are truly useful. Preliminary indications nevertheless suggest that the final number will be significantly less than 60. If the available lines have been extensively grown and have a high passage number, that will further reduce their value.

Let me now turn to the question of availability. A separate issue concerns whether these lines will be made available, and we've already heard that the entities that have derived the lines have proprietary and commercial interests. Experience shows that the negotiation of transfer from those who own the reagent to federally-funded scientists can be slow, expensive and sometimes accompanied by onerous restrictions. It is obvious that the legitimate interests of companies may not coincide with scientists research plans and our nation's public health policy.

I was delighted to hear that Secretary Thompson has made progress with WARF in establishing one such relationship, but it is yet unclear whether he'll be successful in doing so with the other entities.

To get to my final point, I'd like to make a suggestion which I've made before to Secretary Thompson and the NIH, which is a plan to move forward that I think will be most effective given the limitations presented to the scientific community. Specifically, I suggest that the NIH create a repository, not a registry, for this 60 embryonic cell lines. The NIH could collect the lines, determine their quality and certify them for distribution to qualified researchers. Equally important, this plan would have the NIH negotiate favorable terms with all of the suppliers that could be set out in the material transfer agreement.

At the moment, it's very difficult for a scientist to individually negotiate such arrangements, and the federal government and the NIH are in an immeasurably stronger position than are individual investigators to obtain the human embryonic stem cell lines from suppliers. In that way, as I have said, they could verify their quality and arrange for their distribution. I'd like to know whether the NIH would be will to consider doing that given that their resources far exceed that of individual investigators.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I think the president and Secretary Thompson have proposed a plan that will allow federally supported researchers to begin to explore work on human embryonic stem cells and work towards a cure. It's an important step. If my remarks today seem cautions, the reason is the uncertainty I have about the quality, availability and longevity of the cell lines.

Assuming that some of the 60 lines are made available, federally supported scientists can work to understand how these cells can be directed to differentiate and this will lead to new insights into human biology and disease. However, it seems to me perfectly clear that as these studies progress to the point where clinical applications can begin, I expect the plan will have to be revisited principally because the viability or utility of the 60 cell lines will have been exhausted by that point.

In closing, I thank you and the committee once again for the privilege of speaking to you about this important area of biology.

KENNEDY: Ms. Hersey?

HERSHEY: Good afternoon, Mr. Chairman, and distinguished members of the committee.

My name is Karen Hersey. I am senior counsel for intellectual property at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. It's my understanding that I've been invited here today for the purpose of providing you with an introduction and an overview of the subject of material transfer agreements, known as MTAs, about which you have already heard this morning, and the role that they traditionally play in the exchange of materials for scientific research.

As we already know from our colleagues at the University of Wisconsin, there is every expectation in the academic community that access to stem cells for research will involve the execution of a material transfer agreement between the stem cell provider and the organization requesting them.

MIT does not have a medical school, and in terms of the numbers of materials that we request access to, it is small compared with those institutions that have larger faculties, larger student bodies and medical schools. However, MIT's faculties, students and staff are engaged in a substantial volume of research in biology, biotechnology, bioengineering and so forth, where biological materials are used every day to investigate and teach areas of advanced science.

HERSEY: Like every research unit, whether academic or industrial, MIT investigators depend upon the availability of and the access to, new materials developed by others to move their research forward.

The materials are often proprietary to their owners and not commercially available, or they may be commercially available at a very steep price that the university generally does not have to pay only if it accepts materials under restrictive conditions. And in some cases, the materials will be made available to the academic and the industrial communities under a common set of terms that we in academia find ourselves trying to work with in a contractual framework that is not suited to our environment.

Twenty years ago when I first joined MIT as a licensing attorney, the term material transfer agreement was virtually unknown, or at least unknown to those of us in the administration.

We can reconstruct from the lament we often hear, recalling the good old days that materials were transferred from scientist to scientist and from organization to organization through a phone call or a verbal handshake.

From time to time one page documents or releases arrived generally containing warnings that the materials might be toxic, that they were not to be used for human subjects research and requiring the receiving party to release the sending party from all responsibility for use of the materials.

These one page notifications were almost always signed by the investigator receiving the materials. A check of our database shows that MIT institutionally signed a total of eight MTAs in 1989. That was yesterday.

Today the story is far different. My office at MIT has overall responsibility for incoming material transfer activity at MIT. We have one attorney and one paralegal negotiating more than 75 material transfer agreements a year. We have a database where all MTAs their status as active or inactive, the lab where the materials are placed, the responsible investigator are logged and where the restrictions on the use of materials are also logged. There are over 600 entries covering materials in active use and we are a relatively small university.

The larger state universities and medical schools are looking at exponential increases in these numbers.

So what has happened to change the simple handshake between science into a full-blown negotiation between organizations often taken months? No doubt there are any number of theories out there that might be supported, but as I consider the events over the last decade and a half, it leaves me to attribute the change to three factors.

The first is the explosion of the biotechnology industry and the recognition by both the industry and the academic community during the 1980s and 1990s that certain combinations of the materials, certain methods of producing them or methods of using them could in fact be patented. From then on, the materials, especially those that were unique took on an added value and the transfer of them under terms that would protect intellectual property rights of the owner became singularly important.

The second was the companion recognition in the late 1980s that the sharing of materials might just translate into an advantageous business opportunity for the owner. If materials could be cast among academic scientists, industry bench scientists and government researchers, might there not be interesting know-how improvements in new discoveries that could real back end if the materials owners implanted hooks into its agreements.

Third, it's clear from the negotiations that we conduct now that fear also played a role in the demise of the traditional transfer by handshake. That is a fear of deep pockets liability if materials were misused and also a fear that a potential business opportunity for the materials owner might be thrown away if the materials were sent out with no hooks applied.

That background should provide a clearer understanding of why in today's typical material transfer agreement received by an academic institution, it is now common that some combination of limitations, restrictions, give-backs, or reach-throughs will be found. Before materials can be introduced into scientific research programs, the terms under which the owner is willing to make them available will need to be reconciled with the proposed scientific research program, the sources of funding for it, and the institutional policies having to do with freedom to publish, the importance of sharing research findings with colleges and with technology transfer.

If I may, I would like to just take a very short time to take you through some of the very common but problematic terms that we are apt to see in the agreements that must be signed before the transfer of materials can be accomplished.

I would like to say that it's between nonprofits -- except for nonprofits, it is totally unusual for us to see a one-page material transfer agreement unless the type size is minute. Most often these agreements will run well beyond the two-page quick transaction limit. They will commonly define or identify the materials they cover and routinely expand that definition of materials to subsume progeny that might be split off or replicated.

While that's clearly understandable, unfortunately, all too often the definition of the materials as expanded by the owner to encompass modifications and derivatives of them. This is where the problems for the receiving scientists are likely to begin. For if the owner owns the materials under this expanded definition, the owner also ends up with ownership of the modifications and the derivatives made by the receiving scientist.

The ownership problem is exacerbated if the materials provider also wants ownership rights to all improvements, inventions or discoveries developed as a result of using the materials.

If there is not an ownership issue, there is most likely a licensing issue. Materials owners may require an exclusive license royalty-free to all inventions and research results made through use of the materials, or they may require open ended options or first refusal rights to license inventions relating to use of...

KENNEDY: We're going to give you another minute or two to wrap up.

HERSEY: Yes. Thank you, Senator.

At a minimum, the materials provider -- if the materials provider is a commercial company or university may expect to grant that company a royalty-free, nonexclusive license.

I would just like to end by giving you a couple of observations that might help as you look at or contemplate the kinds of agreement that may come in with the materials that are going to be used by NIH research. We do have at MIT a slightly more difficult time with material transfer agreements coming in from foreign organizations. There is a problem with control over use of the materials, intellectual property rights, and in fact some of the materials are not owned by the foreign institutions at all, but by the faculty, the scientists who develop them.

I would just like to end by saying finally, how do material transfer agreements really affect the scientific work of a university? They tend to be comprehensive legal agreement presenting unique and complex issues for a university. That means they're time-consuming to negotiate as you have already heard, and hold up research efforts. They often contain ownership licensing and reached through terms and conditions that are inconsistent with federal requirements attached to federally funded research.

They may prohibit or restrict publication of research in a way that is unacceptable to the academic institution, and they may discourage innovation because in fact the materials provider will control commercialization rights.

Thank you very much.

KENNEDY: Thank you.

DR. Childress?

CHILDRESS: Good afternoon Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee. I am James Childress. I teach religious ethics and biomedical ethics at the University of Virginia and also serve on the National Bioethics Advisory Commission.

I've been asked to present my own views on the ethical issues in human stem cell research. In doing so, I will sometimes draw on INBAC's report on this topic along with its recommendations, which I as a commissioner helped prepare and also endorsed.

I will briefly summarize several points from my longer written testimony, and I would respectfully request that that testimony be entered into the record.

KENNEDY: All of the testimony will be included.

CHILDRESS: Thank you very much. I appreciate the thought and consideration that went into President Bush's policy. But other more flexible policies are also ethically acceptable and even preferable.

President Bush's policy suggests that it's ethically acceptable to use federal funds for research on stem cell lines that were derived prior to his announcement August 9 if the derivation also met certain ethical requirements. Specifically, the donors of embryos that were created solely for reproductive purposes must have given an informed consent without any financial inducements.

If this policy is ethically acceptable, satisfies basic ethical standards, and I believe it does, then it should also be ethically acceptable to do the same thing prospectively. That is to provide federal funds for research on stem cell lines derived in the future after August 9 as well as before within the same ethical guidelines.

The prospective policy would offer greater and needed flexibility, especially in view of the scientific uncertainty about the value of the approved cell lines. And it would be ethically preferable because it would increase the possibilities for imported research without violating ethical standards.

This prospective policy can be undertaken without sanctioning or encouraging further destruction of human embryos. Those were legitimate major concerns in President Bush's statement.

We can establish effective ethical safeguards to ensure that a couple's voluntary decision to destroy their embryos is voluntary and informed, or that their decision to donate them for research is voluntary, informed and uncompensated.

The research then would only determine how the destruction occurs, not whether it will occur.

In making these points, I want to stress that no consensus exists among religious and secular moral traditions in our society about the moral status of the un-implanted human embryo. Public policy in our pluralistic society has to respect diverse fundamental beliefs, and yet it must not be held hostage to any single view of embryonic life.

Whichever policies are finally adopted to enable stem cell research to go forward within ethical limits, we will need a very strong public body to review protocols for deriving stem cells from embryos and to monitor this research.

Perhaps the Council on Bioethics, which President Bush has announced, can fulfill these functions.

If not, some other public body will be needed. For example, the UK has established by statute the Human Fertilization and Embryology Authority, which reviews all embryo research, as well as licensing reproductive technology and fertility clinics. It reviews all embryo research in public and private arenas. And Congress might consider that model for our society as well.

In a recent editorial in Science, ethicist LeRoy Walters stressed that governments and their advisers should be humble and flexible but also decisive and courageous.

We must carefully scrutinize claims of scientific promise, but we must not unduly constrain research that may help alleviate human suffering and reduce the number of premature deaths. Indeed, we have a collective moral duty to try to alleviate human suffering and reduce premature deaths, just as we have a collective moral duty to respect important ethical limits in dealing with developing human life.

We must also provide clear and stringent ethical safeguards in stem cell research, along with strong review and oversight. And I think, in the final analysis, we must avoid unduly rigid rules that appear to be arbitrary and inconsistent.

Thank you very much for your attention. I will be glad to answer any questions.

KENNEDY: Thank you.

Dr. Fitzgerald?

FITZGERALD: I would like to thank the chair, Senator Kennedy, and the members of this distinguished committee for this opportunity to come before you today to discuss this issue. I would like to bring to bear on this issue my background in molecular genetics, in bioethics and in religion, to present a somewhat different perspective on this issue than I think we've heard yet today. And in doing so, I would like to offer a caveat. There is no way that I can do justice in the brief time allotted to me to the numerous serious, well informed and thoughtful people who are deeply concerned about this research and the ethical and moral ramifications of pursuing it. And these people of course include scientists who have no specific religious affiliation.

Since I have limited time, let me focus on an issue that was raised earlier by Senator Frist and then again by Senator Dodd. And that is the issue, what do we do when we do not know?

And there is much in this area we do not know. We do not know much of the science, and we do not know much of what the ethical, moral and social ramifications will be.

How are we going to respond to that lack of knowledge? Because in that lack of knowledge, we truly run the risk of overselling the promise and under-emphasizing the problems associated with human embryonic stem cell research.

As Senator Clinton stated, it is extremely important that we receive and create a factual base here on this issue. And that factual base will of course include more than just the scientific facts.

In addressing this controversial issue, many groups and committees such as the National Bioethics Advisory Committee and also the proposed committee to be directed by Dr. Leon Kass, many committees have been gathered together bringing experts from various fields of inquiry and interest to propose how our pluralistic society should respond to this controversial area of biological research in pursuing progress while protect justice.

For instance, as Dr. Childress has mentioned, in trying to balance the concerns of many people in our nation, the National Bioethics Commission came to the understanding that human embryos are not just tissue. They do have some moral status and some value to society. In deciding that, the National Bioethics Advisory Commission, as well as others who have come to similar conclusions, set the bar higher for us to pursue human embryonic stem cell research, than it might be said for other avenues from research.

So in order to clear that bar and justifiably pursue this research, one would have to meet a high standard.

In addressing a comment made earlier by Senator Specter, he said it's important that science may have the full range of opportunity. I think it's also important to recognize and remember that we already limit what science can do, especially in terms of human research.

The two areas that are most often raised as important to address in meeting that higher standard for human embryonic stem cell research are need and also the number of people who will benefit from this research.

Let me first address the issue of need. Do we need human embryonic stem cell research?

Granted, human embryonic stem cell research is scientifically quite interesting, fascinating and of great interest to the people who do that research to pursue. However, often times we talk about pursuing it in connection to the number of therapies and cures that will be discovered. In fact, I believe the phrases of "countless number of people" and, as Senator Specter, it will touch virtually every family in America.

I would argue that we could make the same claims for other avenues of research. Certainly research being pursuing in genetic therapies, research in cardionics, researching drug development and of course research in adult stem cells.

All of these other areas of research do not need to set the bar as high in being pursued: Embryos, human life is not destroyed. Yet at the same time, scientists involved in those avenues of research could make similar claims as to potential of their research and the number of diseases they are addressing.

Secondly, when we talk about the number of people who will be treated and or cured by any of these medical areas of research, we must be careful. We must be careful again not to oversell the promise. And remember that in fact, there are many even in our own nation that do not have access to these new technologies and cutting- edge medical products.

Actually Senator Murray brought up a very interesting example. She asked the question, "Would we have to keep human embryonic stem cell products hostage to such things as male baldness?"

And the interesting parallel there is, in the early '90s, a drug was developed with FDA approval to treat a disease that afflicts hundreds of thousands of people a year. It's called sleeping sickness. It happens in Africa. The drug was the most effective drug against that disease known. That drug was developed because it might be a cancer research tool or a cancer therapy. When it proved not to be so, the company that was producing the drug decided not to produce it any more even though it could cure or at least treat hundreds of thousands of people.

However, the drug is back. It is back because it has a side effect. It causes hair loss, and so they have turned it into a cream that women can use to treat excessive facial hair.

When we say that we are going to promise people these wonderful potential therapies and cures, are we indeed giving them the accurate assessment of how our systems work?

My issue is not necessarily specifically with the pharmaceutical industry but in promising the people of this country and perhaps the world a solution and a promise that we cannot fulfill.

I think I very much appreciate the work of this committee. I appreciate the reflection that has gone into the many proposals here and the many presentations. And I certainly hope that we continue in our reflection on this very serious issue.

Thank you very much.

KENNEDY: (inaudible) of that drug you're talking about is methotrexate. My son, who had osteosarcoma took that. He was in a NIH trial and survived. I know it's about 85, 95 percent survival rate for children in that area. And so you would have a tough time convincing me about that particular one.

I just picked that up.

FITZGERALD: Well, actually the drug is flurazepam, not methotrexate.

KENNEDY: OK, I stand to be corrected.

Dr. Chute?

CHUTE: First, I want to thank you Senator Kennedy, and the committee for inviting me to appear here today. I come to this issue as a clinician first, as a clinically trained hematologist and oncologist. And for the past five-and-a-half years I've also now been directing research in adult hematopoietic stem cell biology.

I also want to say that it's been with great interest that I've followed the work of Dr. Thomson and those who have done embryonic stem cell line research. And I've been fascinated that they've been able to propagate these cells in vitro as long as they have shown they can in peer review journals, and they can get these cells to differentiate into neuronal hepatofelio (ph) muscle and hematopoietic cells.

And it's very understandable that patients with very serious diseases are very excited and hopeful that there may be cures in the future for such things as diabetes, Parkinson's and Alzheimer's derived from further research on these cells.

But as the national discourse on embryonic stem cell research has progressed, there has been ironically a diminishing appreciation of the exceptional progress that has been ongoing and occurring in adult stem cell research. And I appear today so as to highlight the critical importance of the ongoing research in adult stem cell biology.

In the year 2000, there were 1.2 million new cases of cancer in the United States. Cancer is the second leading cause of death in the United States. And the incidence of cancer is increasing.

Adult hematopoietic stem cells have been and are currently used successfully in the treatment and the cure of patients with leukemia, lymphoma and other hematological (ph) malignancies. Also of great interest is newly developed methods of transplanting adult hematopoietic stem cells have now been shown to affect major remissions in solid tumors. And there's a group at NIH lead by Dr. Barrett and Dr. Child who have recently shown that kidney cancer can be put into remission with the donation of donor normal bone -- excuse me -- peripheral blood stem cells, which is a fascinating new development in the use of these cells to treat cancer.

Therefore, as this work moves forward an even greater number of patients will benefit from adult stem cell transplantation. As further evidence, I submit to you that the two most important medications that we as oncologists give to patients in their cancer treatment are Epogen and Nupogen, which are both growth factors, both of which were developed and isolated through federally funded adult stem cell research.

These medications promote the recovery of red and white blood cells following chemotherapy, and allow patients quality of life to be significantly improved while also preventing life threatening infection.

Adult hematopoietic stem cells are the idea vehicle for gene therapy to treat such diseases as sickle cell anemia, hemophilia and immune deficiencies. More than 100,000 children in America are inflicted with these life-threatening genetic diseases.

For the first time in the past two years, two recent publications have shown the successful gene transfer in to patients with disease. Both of these studies used adult hematopoietic stem cells.

At the end of the year 2000, there were 70 Americans awaiting organ donation for kidney, liver, heart or lung disease. Recent animal studies indicate that current administration of hematopoietic stem cells, along with organ transplantation may dramatically lessen the need for immuno-suppression. If this work moves forward, thousands more patients will be able to be successfully transplanted with organs with much less morbidity.

In addition, to these current applications, even broader clinical therapies will derive from adult stem cells in the near future. Published reports in the last five years have shown that transplanted bone marrow stem cells can differentiate Invivo into functional liver cells, skeletal muscle, brain cells and even functioning cardiac myocytes.

These data indicate that a rare subset of hematopoietic stem cells are in fact pluripotent and posses at least limited plasticity. Adult cord blood stem cells can be maintained in culture now for up to 12 weeks. Our laboratory has shown that bone marrow stem cells can expanded 10 fold in just a week or culture under specialized conditions.

Whether adult stem cells with match embryonic stem cells in the treatment of diseases such as Parkinson's or Alzheimer's remains unknown and in my opinion is probably unlikely.

But given the dramatic progress in adult stem cell research in the last five years, I think continued funding is merited.

To close, I would like to just make a few points about embryonic stem cell research that are scientific concerns.

First, immune barrier for embryonic stem cells to work in the transplantation for the treatments like Alzheimer's and Parkinson's will require immune barriers to be crossed.

Scientists who are expert in the field, and in specific, Dr. Thomson at Wisconsin, has argued that cloning is the way to get beyond this. And in fact, I think the scientific community recognizes that if these immune barriers cannot be crossed with some method such as nuclear transfer, that the translation into actual therapies for patients will be extremely difficult.

Second, animal studies indicate that the transplantation of embryonic stem cells actually has a high incidence of teratoma or tumor development in small animals. In vitro differentiation genetic engineering of embryonic stem cells prior to transplant has been proposed as much to circumvent this problem.

But both of these approaches have further technical concerns. As Dr. Thomson himself has recently cited, the heterogeneous nature of embryonic stem cell development in culture has hampered the use of embryonic stem cell derivatives in transplantation.

So I close with a very brief following statement. The limitations of embryonic stem cells as a source of transplantable tissue should be openly and honestly presented to the public since treatments and cures in these cells are certainly not imminent.

In contrast, adult hematopoietic stem cells are successfully used in the treatment of patients with common diseases every day. And genetic engineering is not required for these cells to be safely applied.

New treatments for diseases are imminent with adult stem cells and not hypothetical. And while scientists continue to explore the basic biology of embryonic stem cell lines, the needs of thousands of patients who benefit from adult stem cell research should not be sacrificed.

Thank you.

KENNEDY: Thank you. Thank you, very much.

I thank all of the members of the panel. We're going to recess. I would like to come back for some questions at 2:15. I know this goes as some concern perhaps for your schedules, but if you can. If you can't, I can understand. We will submit some written questions.

I don't think it will take long. Hopefully, we would have you out by 3:00 o'clock. But if we could do that, we would very much appreciate it. We've had a very full morning and the two parties have these caucuses that start at 12:30. See most of our members have gone. I think by 2:15 they will have ended. And we hopefully might have some additional participation.

I am very, very grateful to all of our panelists.

(UNKNOWN): Mr. Chairman?

KENNEDY: Yes.

(UNKNOWN): Let me just add that this is fascinating based on our discussion this morning. If some of the panelists cannot stay, if we could just submit them written questions. We don't know what their schedule is.

KENNEDY: Certainly.

(UNKNOWN): Because I do have questions and again I hope that we can spend some time this afternoon. But if we could submit written questions if you cannot stay.

KENNEDY: Thank you. We will meet again at 2:15. The committee stands in recess.

(RECESS)

KENNEDY: We'll come back to order. And I'll invite witnesses to return to the stand if they would, please.

Thank you very much for adjusting your schedule. And I'd like to go through some questions here if I might. I might start with Dr. Melton.

You've expressed several concerns about the restrictions placed on stem cell research under the president's proposal. Do you believe that the restrictions could significantly impede the scientific progress and slow development for new cures using these cells?

MELTON: Yes. Yes, I do. I do think they would impede -- they will impede progress.

KENNEDY: Do you want to elaborate on that? We talked this morning about the issue of accessibility, reliability and the safety, the contamination. What is your own -- as a researcher, which is your own concern about?

MELTON: Well, I could give one example, which is, you could imagine with the cells that are available scientists discover a means by which they can turn human embryonic stem cells into pancreatic beta cells for the treatment of diabetes. You would then want to use human embryonic stem cells that have been derived freshly in the absence of these potentially contaminating mouse feeders and use those for therapies because that would eliminate concerns about known and unknown viruses.

And as I understand it, the new cell lines which would be derived would be ineligible for federal researchers. Is one example of the possible problems that will likely arise.

KENNEDY: How concerned should we be about contamination do you think? I mean, have you used products from other countries? What's your own kind of sense -- what's your own knowledge? What would be your -- how high would you think that the risk might be?

MELTON: Well, I'm not really qualified to comment on that. But I would say that the FDA, as I understand it, will treat this as a xenotransplant, which means that the hurdles and the requirements for using it in therapy will be much more onerous. Dr. Chute can probably comment more on the difficulties in using animal products for treating humans.

KENNEDY: Dr. Chute?

CHUTE: Good morning, Senator Kennedy.

In our laboratory we have worked with a feeder layer that was a porcine feeder layer to grow adult hematopoietic stem cells. And I have had iterations with the FDA both on using a porcine and a human feeder layer. And one question -- there is a series -- a long series of safety tests that you have to do on the human cells that are cultivated with xeno feeder layers, such as mouse, porcine. And even with a human feeder layer, there is still a very, very long lists of safety tests that have to be done.

But I would make a comment that I don't think it's impossible -- I don't think it's impossible that if you use a mouse feeder layer that the human cells derived from those cultures could ever be used in a clinic. I think it just makes it more arduous without question. You might add a year or two potentially to the time before you get to the clinic.

KENNEDY: Well, you're certainly restricted now under the August date.

CHUTE: Right.

KENNEDY: So you can probably get there.

After reviewing the agreement, Dr. Melton, signed by NIH and the University of Wisconsin I see that it expressly forbids use of the cells for therapeutic or diagnostic purposes. What are the implications of restrictions of this kind for the work you do in trying to find new treatments for juvenile diabetes?

MELTON: Well, first, I'm sort of surprised by that news because I haven't seen the agreement. But if it is the case, as you say, that the cells could not be used for treatments, that, I would think, would be a damning condition. I mean, clearly, there is no point in doing the research I'm doing if it weren't for the possibility of treating people. So I'd have to see the conditions to comment further.

KENNEDY: Ms. Hersey, the present plan gives a handful of suppliers control over all the federally approved stem cell lines. And based on your experience negotiating agreements with private companies, wouldn't you agree that this type of monopoly is likely to make it difficult for NIH funded researchers to get prompt access to the cells?

HERSEY: Well, I think it's -- yes, I think it's going to make it very difficult, Senator.

KENNEDY: Are you familiar with other -- are there other types of situations that you know from the past that are in any way similar to this kind of a monopoly?

HERSEY: There have been several, especially where the company holds patent rights. We have seen a number of them. In some cases, the NIH has been able to step in, as they have this time, and try to make a difference for the university researchers. But I would say at least 20 percent of the time, we cannot get access to the materials we want because of the encumbrances.

KENNEDY: Dr. Childress, I want to underline one point you made in your testimony. Is it fair to say that you see no ethical differences between a stem cell derived from a discarded embryo on August 9th and one derived at a later date?

CHILDRESS: As long as we meet the kinds of ethical standards that President Bush laid out -- and I think those were -- those are important ones about the embryo being left over following efforts at reproduction, that the donors give voluntary informed consent and there is to be no financial inducements. That if we go forward and can apply the same ethical standards to the derivation of stem cells from embryos in the future, I can't see an ethical difference. I can't see that what happened before August the 9th and what happens after is ethically different.

The concern that some have expressed that this might well sanction and encourage the destruction of embryos I think also is problematic as a concern. Because after all, even to this point, people may well have made decisions about destruction of embryos and the possibility of privately-funded research, since that research has been going forward.

Furthermore, we really don't have evidence from fertility clinics that people who are deciding to discard embryos make this a major factor in decision making. So I would be inclined to say that we can build the ethical safeguards to prevent the kind of scenario that has concerned many.

KENNEDY: Have you formed any -- you followed the fetal transplantation issue closely?

CHILDRESS: Yes.

KENNEDY: Have you formed any impression or -- maybe I'd ask others on the panel about whether we ought to try -- in that debate, we had the agreement for the use of certain fetal tissue. But we also established guidelines for utilization in the private sector -- the private sector. Have you thought about that issue as well? And can you tell us what your thinking has been? What the advantages or concerns would be, or perhaps the disadvantage?

CHILDRESS: Well, first of all, I think there is significant parallels between the kinds of ethical safeguards one would try to set up -- which appear to have been effective in the area of, you know, human fetal tissue transplantation research, and the kinds of guidelines that would be appropriate in two different settings. One would be the use of embryos left over after in vitro fertilization.

But also, the research we've not really talked about today, the derivation of embryonic germ cells from aborted fetuses. And one could draw a parallel there also. And that area of research has been omitted from much of the recent discussion. And I'm not sure whether it merits further attention or not. I've not followed the scientific developments on that side. But one could perhaps make a case for paying some attention to that as well.

KENNEDY: Throughout your distinguished career, you've shown a deep, sort of, reverence for life. Do you think that allowing federally funded doctors both the use and derived stem cells from discarded embryos consistent with those deeply held beliefs?

CHILDRESS: I believe so. First of all, if we worked with the notion, which the National Bioethics Advisory Commission also tried to articulate, that it's very important to recognize that the embryo deserves an important form of respect -- appropriate to that stage of developmental life. Now there will be widespread disagreement in society about, as I've mentioned earlier, about the moral status of the embryo and exactly what kind of respect it deserves, what kind of protection is appropriate.

On the National Bioethics Advisory Commission, we drew several implications from a notion of respect for the early embryo. One certainly was that in this area we should not be buying and selling embryos. Or if we're going in the direction of fetal tissue, we should not be buying and selling fetal tissue. And we -- one could also argue that you should not use left over embryos unless they're necessary.

Now, there would be considerable debate. I happen to be on the side of those who think that given the promise of this research for alleviating suffering and reducing incidents of premature death that we ought to be exploring all sources of stem cells at this point. And I certainly agree with my colleagues who stress that we should not neglect adult stem cells in this process. And just see which ones would be most important in developing the kinds of treatments, and we'd hope, cures, that might be possible.

One implication that we drew of this principle, respect for the early embryo, was that at this point we should not deliberately create embryos for purposes of use in research, whether through IVF or so-called therapeutic cloning.

Now, we emphasized -- and I would agree with this emphasis -- that the point we are making was at this time, because it may well be necessary to revisit this question of so-called therapeutic cloning if the basic research ends up producing some clinically effective treatments that may well best be done -- or perhaps only be done with matched tissue. So it may be necessary to revisit that at some point.

But as we've heard from many colleagues, we still have a long ways to go before that becomes a critical question again. And then might raise the issue of the necessity of going that direction.

I would be opposed though at this point to a ban on therapeutic cloning worrying that that would indeed set an inappropriate limit for future developments.

KENNEDY: OK. Well, I'm going to -- we will submit some of the questions of our colleagues. And I'm grateful to our panel.

I thank all of our witnesses for the excellent testimony. It's been an extremely informative, important hearing. It's clear that stem cell research offers a virtually unprecedented opportunities to find cures for a host of dread afflictions from cancer to heart disease, diabetes to spinal cord injury to Parkinson's disease to Alzheimer's disease.

But it's also clear that there are serious concerns in the scientific community about whether the restrictive rules currently imposed by the Bush administration allow this research to proceed speedily and effectively. These concerns range from the number, safety and durability of the existing cell lines to where they will truly widely available to researchers.

The memorandum of understanding that Secretary Thompson announced this morning specifically prohibits the use of a cell lines in clinical research, the research that is done to actually test possible treatments for illnesses. Billions of patients and their families expect that stem cell research will move forward as rapidly as possible. It would be unacceptable to offer these patients and families the promise of effective cell research but deny them the reality of it.

We will continue to examine the question raised at the hearing. I'm optimistic that Congress will take whatever steps that are necessary to assure that stem cell research proceeds effectively and ethically.

And our committee stands in recess. I thank our panel. Thank you very much.

"CBS Evening News," CBS, 9/13/2001

Joining us now from Washington, United States Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, of New York. Senator, thank you for your time tonight. You met with...

Senator HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (Democrat, New York): Thank you, Dan.

RATHER: ...President Bush today. What happened?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, Dan, we went to the White House and a small group of us--Senator Schumer, the senators from Virginia, and I--met with the president and his security team in the Oval Office. We received a briefing about what is currently the outlook for return to normalcy, other security considerations. We discussed the upcoming trip that we will make with the president tomorrow to New York. I'm delighted that he'll be able to come and see firsthand what you've been reporting, and I thank you for that--and what I saw yesterday. And he pledged his support for some significant resources, $20 billion for New York and the other states that were directly impacted by this attack. We then went into a larger meeting where the president expressed his resolute determination to follow through on the following up of the perpetrators--finding where they are, bringing them to reckoning and to make it clear that every nation has to either be with us or against us. Those who harbor terrorists or who finance them are going to pay a price.

RATHER: Senator, there's talk of what amounts to a m--new Marshall Plan to help rebuild New York City. Was that dis--discussed with the president today directly?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, y--those words weren't used, Dan, but that's what we're facing. The devastation, as you have seen, is just overwhelming. We not only have the--the physical destruction that I saw from a helicopter yesterday and from the ground later, which has to be dealt with, but everything you can't see--the communications that don't work, the generators that don't work, the subway that's closed. We have the human toll, the loss of life; the task of continuing to try to rescue anyone we can find alive; the task of bringing home to everyone who's lost someone, their loved ones; the counseling--the grief counseling; the mental health services; the people who lost their jobs. You know, we lost, we think, probably about a 100,00 to 150,000 jobs. There weren't just high-paid financial traders, but you know janitors who have no source of income now. And most poignantly, we've got orphans and we've got widows and widowers and parents who've lost their children. So it's going to be a massive undertaking but I'm absolutely confident that with the president's support, the support of my colleagues, America's going to stand with and stand behind New York.

RATHER: Senator Clinton, you lived in the White House for eight years while your husband's administration tried to deal with Osama bin Laden. Did you ever in your wildest imaginations believe this kind of thing could happen?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, Dan, I've always been very concerned about the threat of terrorism. I consider that our number one homeland threat. But I--I did not imagine the planning and the calculation, the total cold-hearted evil that motivated the attacks that we saw. I think it's imperative that we support the president in his efforts to root out whoever did this and all of that individual's or institution's or state's involvement. But I would also say that this is a difficult war we are going to be waging. If it were easy, we could have figured it out before this terrible tragedy. I remember very well being in the White House and the difficulty of getting good intelligence, of knowing where a--a suspected terrorist is, of having to count on people who--whose loyalties are not to the United States but who might, for their own reasons, have provided essential information for one of our missions. The president understands this. He's fully aware that it's going to take a lot of patience and painstaking planning and we're going to support him.

RATHER: Senator Clinton, thank you very much.

Sen. CLINTON: Thank you, Dan, and thank you for the work you're doing and all of your colleagues.

RATHER: Thank you, Senator.

"Larry King Live," CNN, 9/13/2001

KING: Michael Cherkasky, president and CEO of Kroll, incorporated. I spoke a little while ago with New York Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, a very short time ago. And our first question was, was she concerned about the evacuation of the Capitol today.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Well, Larry, I had already voted so that I had left the Capitol. I was on my way back to the Russell Building so that I could talk with you tonight. And I was very concerned, but I quickly learned that there wasn't any real basis for concern. But we're taking every precaution we can, and that was one of the necessary ones.

KING: The president's going to your state tomorrow. Are you going too?

CLINTON: Yes, I am. I went to the White House earlier this afternoon. We had an excellent discussion. I met first in the Oval Office with the president, my colleague, Senator Schumer, the two senators from Virginia. We pledged our support. We received a briefing from the president.

And I was delighted to also learn that the president would support the request that Senator Schumer and I have made so that New York gets the resources that we need to deal with this extraordinary tragedy.

Then we had a larger meeting in the Cabinet Room with representatives and senators from a number of states. The president was resolute, determined. I felt very positive about the meeting.

KING: Will you be traveling with him?

CLINTON: Yes, I will. I'll be going with the president back to New York where I was yesterday with the governor and the mayor after we have the national prayer service at the National Cathedral.

KING: You know, you -- were in those seats. Sandy Berger told the Associated Press today that your administration -- the Clinton administration weighed a military strike against bin Laden in the final days of that presidency. What can you gather this must be like?

CLINTON: Well, I told the president today -- and I have publicly stated this, Larry -- that I do have some understanding of the extraordinary burdens that any president bears. And a time like this just magnifies them immeasurably.

This is a different kind of war. And make no mistake about it, we are at war. But we're at war against an enemy that doesn't have a capital, doesn't have a state. When Pearl Harbor was bombed, we knew where to look and we knew what we needed to do to win.

So this is a more difficult time. But I'm absolutely confident we are up to meeting this challenge.

During the years that my husband was in the White House, you will recall we did launch an attack on some of Osama bin Laden's assets in Afghanistan and we were successful in a limited way with respect to some of the personnel and equipment. But we were not successful in eradicating him and his network from the terrorist activities that they foment.

So this I know, and the president knows. Nobody is in any way misled about the profound nature of this challenge. But we have to be up to it, and we are up to it. And I'm going to support the president in the actions he takes.

KING: And is your husband, as well, fully in support?

CLINTON: Absolutely. You know, Bill was in Australia when this happened. The president sent a plane to bring him back. I think they really took measures to secure all of our former presidents, but particularly my husband and the president's father, because both of them had taken action against certain organizations and individuals. So I was very grateful for that.

So Bill is back home. He's in New York. And he has made it very clear, both privately in his conversations and his public statements, that he is 100 percent behind the president.

KING: I know the president's doing everything he can for you and your state. Are you giving him carte blanche as to what he can do internationally?

CLINTON: Well, I'm certainly supporting his authority to take those actions that are necessary on behalf of our country and our homeland defense. There is, as we speak, an effort under way to draft an appropriate resolution that will express the sense of the Senate.

I've been seeking the advice of some of the senior members who have been around here a while, who were part of the Gulf War resolution, and even going back further than that. So I'm confident that we will come up with an agreement that will give the president what he needs.

KING: What are you saying to those who ask you in defense in the like of how far we go with this?

CLINTON: Well, I think that we have to clearly define what we know about the threats, what we know about the perpetrators, what we know about those who harbor terrorists.

I was very pleased that the president, in his speech to the country, said that it's not only America's goal to track down and hold accountable those who carried out this dastardly attack, but also to serve notice on anyone who harbors terrorists.

And I would go even further, as the president has in our discussion today. We are going to be looking at those who finance terrorism; those who give any aid or comfort whatsoever, not only governments, but institutions, individuals, organizations wherever they might be found.

KING: And finally, what do you say to those New Yorkers who are still missing loved-ones?

CLINTON: Well, you know, we're only beginning to see the depths of anguish and pain that will be visible in the days and weeks ahead. We don't know yet how many people will never go home again, Larry.

We do know that we have orphans and widows and widowers. We have mothers and fathers who have suffered what no parent should ever suffer, the loss of a child. We've got a lot of hard work.

You know, when we think about responding to this attack, of course we think first and foremost about defending ourselves and tracking down those who did it. We think about the hard work of rescue and reconstruction and rebuilding. But let's not forget that we have a work of compassion ahead of us.

KING: Thank you, Senator.

CLINTON: Thank you, Larry.

"CNN Live Event/Special," CNN, 9/13/2001

JUDY WOODRUFF, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Joining us now from the Capitol, the Senator from the state of New York, Hillary Clinton. Senator Clinton, we have been listening to some heartbreaking stories from people looking for loved ones. Can you bring us any new information about recovery efforts there?

SEN. HILLARY CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Judy, they continue. They continue, even as we speak. They will continue as long as it is humanly to hope that we can find any survivors. We had some good news today when we found some of our firefighters and another citizen. So we are far from giving up on this aspect of this search and rescue mission.

WOODRUFF: Senator, what price do you now believe New York will ultimately pay in terms of lives, its economy, its financial well-being and so forth?

CLINTON: Well, Judy it's devastating. And of course this was not only an attack on New York, but an attack on America, and because New York is the global city and, you know, an engine of American economic growth this is a loss that is going to be felt throughout the country and even the world.

But directly at home where we have suffered most grievous losses, there is not any inventory of any kind yet. We are going about the painstaking business, as I saw firsthand yesterday when I visited with the mayor and the governor, of trying to make sure we account for every person.

The necessity to really know who may be missing is bringing people down near the site to the Armory on Lexington avenue where they can register and give information about their loved ones. I think we are at the beginning of what will be a very emotional time for our country, because the horror of seeing planes crash into the towers, the unbelievable just moment of pure horror in watching buildings collapse is now going to be made even more painful because we are going to have faces to go with those people who were just going about their daily business, doing their jobs.

And we are also going to know more about the individual firefighters and police officers and Port Authority officers and emergency technicians, all of whom lost their lives. The economic costs are just beginning to be calculated.

I was very grateful today when the president agreed with a request that Senator Schumer and I made for an additional $20 billion in the supplemental appropriation to deal with the overwhelming cost principally in New York, but also New Jersey has been effected, other places.

WOODRUFF: We are talking in the neighborhood of 40 billion now?

CLINTON: Yes and 20 of that will go for purposes such as beefing up our intelligence, repairing the Pentagon, the military assets we need making it clear that we are going to afford whatever security precautions are necessary at our airports and then $20 billion will go to the kind of rescue, reconstruction, rebuilding, counseling efforts that are going on right now in New York.

WOODRUFF: Senator, we are hearing from President Bush, Secretary Powell and others at the Pentagon and elsewhere in the administration that no effort will be spared, in effect, to go after the people that were responsible for this. Are you are prepared to give the president, in essence, a green light to do whatever he and the people around him think is necessary to find these people.

CLINTON: I am going to support the president's authority to wage war on these terrorists and wherever they are, root them out and make clear that anyone who provides comfort or financial aid is going to pay a price.

We are in the process of drafting the resolution. I have consulted some of my colleagues that have been here a lot longer than I, who went through the Gulf War and even before, to know exactly the best way to go about doing that. But we are going to come to agreement behind the president to give him the authority and the resources as Commander in Chief that he requires.

WOODRUFF: What about a threshold of evidence? Is that something that is a factor here?

CLINTON: Judy, you know, this is not a legal case. I use to practice law in another life, and we are not -- you know, we are not putting together the kind of case that we would take to a jury necessarily. Certainly we are painstakingly acquiring whatever evidence is available. But I'm not sure that it would be appropriate or prudent for the United States to just pursue this legally, to try to, as we did with the first incident at the World Trade Center, the bombing, spend years tracking down perpetrators, bringing them back to justice.

This is much more like the bombings of our embassies in Kenya and Tanzania. This is an act of war and I think we have to respond accordingly.

WOODRUFF: Senator, finally there was an Associate Press report today quoting senior officials as saying in the final days of President Clinton's administration, your husband's administration, that there was specific intelligence about the whereabouts of Osama bin Laden, that decisions -- that it was discussed whether to take action and ultimately a decision was made not to attack.

Do you have any information about that?

CLINTON: Well, Judy, I'm not privy to all the information. I know there was intelligence about his location. There was a plan that was put into place to try to pinpoint his location. It relied, as I recall, on human intelligence assets, namely people who were on the ground providing us with information.

And my memory is that at the last minute, those assets proved unreliable and were not able to form the basis for the kind of firm footing needed for launching the sort of attack that we are considering. That's how I remember it, but as I say, I wasn't in the thick of it. But I do remember very well, we acted similarly with respect to the cruise missiles that were launched at his camps in Afghanistan based on intelligence that he would be there at time.

It was very well thought out and planned and unfortunately, for whatever reason, he turned not to be there. And I want to just add that this is part of the challenge that our current president faces. We are engaged in a battle with an adversary who lives in the shadows.

When we were bombed at Pearl Harbor we knew where the enemy was. Not only does he have his own assets but because of his considerable wealth and connections with regimes around the world, he does have his own intelligence network, people within governments and military operations who frankly, keep him apprised of what we or anyone else are interested in.

So that's one of the reasons I really support the kind of painstaking patient approach that the president is pursuing. I know there are some who think we should be able to launch an attack, press a button tonight. But that's not way this can be done. I think all Americans have to be resolute. We have to be prepared for the action that will come and very supportive of those working with the president who are putting together the pieces, as difficult as that is, to give us the basis for action.

WOODRUFF: All right. Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York talking to us from the U.S. Capitol just a little over an hour after the Capitol had to be evacuated because of a threat. Senator, thank you very much for being with us.

CLINTON: Thank you, Judy.

"The Early Show," CBS, 9/14/2001

Early this morning, the White House and congressional leaders agreed to the final details of a $40 billion package to help combat terrorism. Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton is on Capitol Hill.

Senator Clinton, good morning.

Senator HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (Democrat, New York): Good morning, Bryant.

GUMBEL: You're going to be making the trip with the president to New York later this morning. You've already been there, though, haven't you?

Sen. CLINTON: Yes, I have. I came up the other day with the director of Federal Emergency Management Agency, along with Senator Schumer. We toured the site with the governor and the mayor. And I'm delighted, just grateful that the president's going back this afternoon to see what I saw.

GUMBEL: Tell us about the scene you saw, not just as an official but--but as a New Yorker, as a fellow citizen.

Sen. CLINTON: You know, Bryant, we helicoptered from LaGuardia. And, of course, the skies were still--there was no other air traffic. We came around the tip of Manhattan and we were able to hover and look at the damage, the wreckage, the smouldering remains of the building. And--I mean, I've just never seen anything to match it at all. There were people running as we were watching because they were afraid another one of the buildings was going to collapse. You know, it was as close to what I've imagined hell would look like, as anything that I've ever heard of or seen in my own life.

GUMBEL: You met in the Oval Office with the president and, of course, you're standing with others on Capitol Hill in a show of unity behind the president.

Sen. CLINTON: Right.

GUMBEL: But as the president talks of retaliation, have you any degree of concerns about how broad a retaliation or how unspecif--unspecified a retaliation we're talking about?

Sen. CLINTON: You know, Bryant, we're engaged in a very different kind of war than we've ever had before. I have confidence in the president, the administration, our military, to come up with plans that they believe will be effective against these networks of terrorists. You know, this is not by any means something you can just snap a finger about, make an order about. This is very difficult and challenging in--in countless ways. I know that from, you know, my husband's own experience. I think we have to be patient and resolute and s--and see, you know, what the plans are and--and how they're carried out.

GUMBEL: But, Senator Torricelli was with us moments ago and was talking about using this as an opportunity to go after not just those who were involved in these strikes but any and all who've essentially ever been involved in any terrorist incidents. Is--is--is Congress, is the Senate willing to give the--the president that broad a mandate?

Sen. CLINTON: You know, I think most New Yorkers and certainly most Americans want us first and foremost to go after those who perpetrated this evil act and everyone who gave them safe harbor or financial assistance or any kind of support. I think we have to focus on the immediate and clear and present danger that we face as recent news accounts have demonstrated, and as I've been informed. You know, we're still making sure to round up anyone who possibly could be part of the terrorist network that aimed these attacks at the heart of our country. So I--I would put my resources and best efforts behind going after those who caused this particular attack and loss of life. And let's see what we can do there. Now if it leads to others who are involved or--and allied with them, then I think we should take a look at that.

GUMBEL: Senator Torricelli and others have talked about convening after all this is done--convening a board of inquiry to hold those accountable at CIA and NSA and FBI for what he viewed as a monumental failure of our intelligence community. Do you view it as a failure?

Sen. CLINTON: You know, Bryant, I'm sure that in retrospect there were steps we should have taken, measures that might have proven effective. But let's not underestimate the enemy against which we are now fighting. It is very difficult--and I think frankly, until Tuesday, it was unimaginable, the kind of measures and security precautions that we might have to live with for the foreseeable future. So I'm--I'm focused on the here and now, on getting the resources that we need in New York and supporting the administration and the work that the president is undertaking. If there is a useful purpose to be served in trying to find out what we could have done and make amends for that so that we never, ever suffer these grievous losses again, then--then I would support that in the future. But right now, let's focus on helping--try to continue the rescue and recovery efforts and, you know, provide the help and support that people who lost their family members and loved ones and their jobs and--and dev--and the devastation that we know has occurred--let's help deal with that first.

GUMBEL: Your husband, former President Clinton, was in Australia at the time of the attacks. And I know that President Bush sent a plane to secure his safe passage back home. What has he been saying about this to you?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, you know, he's outraged. When I reached him in Australia, he was heartbroken and angry. He supports the president. He knows many of the people personally, he's worked with many of them professionally. He has confidence in their resolve and their planning. So he's giving full support to our country in a united way. You know that he went on to visit with some of the victims and the rescue workers, just as a tangible show of support and appreciation, gratitude for the sacrifices that have been made.

GUMBEL: All right. Senator Hillarer--Hillary Rodham Clinton, you have a busy day ahead.

Sen. CLINTON: Thank you.

GUMBEL: We wish you safe travels. Always a pleasure. Thank you.

Sen. CLINTON: Thank you, Bryant.

GUMBEL: All right.

U.S. SENATORS CHARLES SCHUMER AND HILLARY CLINTON DELIVER DEMOCRATIC RESPONSE TO THE PRESIDENT'S WEEKLY RADIO ADDRESS, 9/15/2001

SCHUMER: Hi. I'm Senator Chuck Schumer of New York.

CLINTON: And I'm Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York.

SCHUMER: On behalf of every New Yorker, on behalf of the 8 million people who live in this city, I want to extend our deepest gratitude to the president and the people of America who have given us their love and sorrow and grief and tears and support and prayers. In our darkest hour of need, you have shown us light.

Tonight there will be thousands of dinner tables in New York with an empty seat. There are thousands of families still waiting for that phone call, still dialing their phones endlessly, desperate to find a loved one.

In the wake of this cataclysmic event, our first thoughts go to all those who grieve. Everyone in New York knows somebody who's missing. Our hearts go out to those who are suffering. We are with them as one, from one end of this country to the other.

As New Yorkers, there is a sense that we have been violated, that some horrible person has taken something away from all of us as a city. But we will survive, and we will prevail. We are New Yorkers.

The terrorist attacks that occurred Tuesday was the 21st century Pearl Harbor. Like after Pearl Harbor, we need to be resolute in the months and years to come until we secure the unconditional surrender of the terrorists and those that harbor them. That means all of us of all races, religions, geographies and philosophies must unite. If we do unite, we will win. We will prevail over the people that hate us simply because we are free.

When I visited the rubble in New York, a woman grabbed my hand and said, "Senator, don't allow my son's death to be in vain." If we stand together united, strong and resolute, her son and the thousands of Americans who died with him will not have died in vain.

This even will never leave us the same, not as individuals, not as New Yorkers, not as Americans and not as residents of the planet Earth. But we can learn from it as we grieve. We can meet the challenge and rise to the next level of civilization. I'm confident we will.

God bless you all, and God bless America.

CLINTON: Chuck Schumer and I are deeply grateful to all Americans for the outpouring of support for New York in our hour of need. We also want to thank President Bush, Governor Pataki and Mayor Guiliani for their leadership and resolve.

We appreciate everything our colleagues in the Congress have done to ensure that we have the resources we need to search, rescue, recover and rebuild.

When terrorists struck the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, it was not simply an attack on our military and New York. It was an attack on America and our values. And we will show the world that, though buildings can crumble and innocent people sacrificed their lives, America and New York remain strong, our democracy is intact and our faith in God and in each other is secure.

Television has done a great service by keeping Americans informed during this crisis. But the horror of what has happened cannot be fully conveyed on the small screen.

When I toured the devastation in lower Manhattan this week, it was like looking through the gates of hell. Yet out of the smoky ruins, firefighters and emergency workers slowly emerged, changing shifts after 24 hours of grim, heroic work. Covered from head to toe in dirt and sweat and debris, they marched out of that rubble, dragging their axes behind them with their heads held high. Their courage and stamina serve as an inspiring and enduring reminder of the nobility of humankind, even as we struggle to cope with the evil acts of a few.

In the days ahead, our shock will yield to sadness as we cope with the enormity of our loss. We have orphans to comfort, parents who've lost their children, husbands and wives who will no longer have the comfort of the love they built, and we have a city to rebuild.

We will see to it that justice is done in full measure for what this terror has wrought. "Let us have faith, Abraham Lincoln once said, "that right makes might. And in that faith, let us to the end dare to do our duty."

The events of September 11, 2001, form a crucible out of which an even stronger nation can be forged. That is our duty, and I know that is what New Yorkers and Americans will do.

May God bless you all, and may God bless America.

"This Week," ABC, 9/16/2001

DONALDSON: When President Bush visited the disaster site in New York City Friday, among the officials who accompanied him was the junior senator from New York, Hillary Rodham Clinton, all traces of partisanship wiped away. Senator Clinton joins us now from our New York studios.

Welcome, Senator. Good to see you.

Senator HILLARY CLINTON (Democrat, New York): Thank you very much, Sam.

DONALDSON: It's true, isn't it? I mean, the Bushes and the Clintons have engaged in healthy, normal, political debate in this country, like so many others, and now, at the moment, that's all behind us, isn't it?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, you know, Sam, that's what's so great about our country. Now, in this moment of crisis, we're united, we're behind our president and we're moving forward together. I can't say enough about the extraordinary support that New York has received from the president, from my colleagues in Congress on both sides of the aisle. And I know that we're going to have whatever support New York needs in order to rebuild lives and rebuild our city.

DONALDSON: I ready a couple of op-ed pieces in a couple of New York newspapers suggesting that President Bush should have come earlier. I mean, do you think he should have come earlier?

Sen. CLINTON: Oh, Sam, I--I don't see any reason to engage in that kind of second-guessing. I was delighted that the president got here as soon as security and other considerations could be taken care of. We went with him to the site. I'd been there earlier on Wednesday. And when I saw him in the Oval Office on Thursday, both Senator Schumer and I were delighted that he was going and that he was going to see firsthand what we saw, because I think as anyone will tell you who's been down there, as good a job as you and all of our colleagues in journalism and especially on television have done describing what happened, you really cannot imagine what it looks like and feels like until you either fly over it or you see it, as I have.

DONALDSON: And your daughter Chelsea was, what, 12 blocks away when it happened?

Sen. CLINTON: Yeah. She was in the area, staying with friends. And both Chuck Schumer and I were spending the early moments of this disaster trying to make sure that our daughters were OK. We were lucky. They--they were. But a lot of people haven't been as fortunate. And you know, when I was at the armory yesterday visiting with families who are still hoping that their loved one will be rescued, they have their pictures in hand and the stories that they want to tell, I--I just couldn't help but feel both grateful for the fact that my daughter was all right, but having a redoubled commitment to doing everything I could to help those families that are going to have to face the reality of having lost a child or a husband or a father or a mother.

DONALDSON: It's terrible. Let's talk about American life now, though. What happens in the future from the standpoint of the question of security vs. relaxation, or giving up some of the freedoms we've enjoyed in this--in this country? How far do we go, for instance, on air--airline security?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I think everyone recognizes we have to tighten security. We have to do whatever it takes to keep our people safe. That's...

DONALDSON: Including profiling, Senator?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I think we have to do whatever it takes, Sam, and I believe that, you know, Tuesday changed everything. Tuesday was a day that America has never, ever had to experience. And I hope to heaven that we never have to again. But we are in a war situation and we're going to have to do things that people do in times of war. I just heard your interview with the mayor and I think he's right to look at examples in history like the Battle of Britain. Many of us have been studying what others did to carry on. And we know that we have to make tradeoffs in convenience, in our freedom of movement, without undercutting or losing our way of life and our values, which are really what make--make America special and great. And we can't ever let anyone undermine that.

DONALDSON: Do we get on airplanes now, and if there are people of Middle East origin--American citizens, for all we know--on that airplane, do we have a problem?

Sen. CLINTON: You know, Sam, yesterday at the Armory when I was talking with the relief workers and the families of missing people, I saw every kind of American. You know, one family came up, you know, holding the pictures of having lost both a son and a daughter-in-law. They were Muslim-Americans. Other families were telling me the story of, you know, their daughter who had just gotten married and would never, they thought, be with them again. Every shade of skin color, every kind of background. This was a blow at New York and at America and all we are, and we--we cannot...

DONALDSON: That--that's why I ask you, Senator about profiling...

Sen. CLINTON: Well, we--we can't--well...

DONALDSON: ...because you say it take--do everything it takes.

Sen. CLINTON: That's right.

DONALDSON: Does it take profiling?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, you know, I think that's going to be up to the law enforcement experts. And I think we have to be cautious, we have to be careful. But let's not go overboard and start, you know, pointing fingers at Arab-Americans, at Muslim-Americans who are just as devoted Americans as you or I are. We have to find the terrorists, no matter where they are, here at home or abroad, and we have to strike at their sources of funding and support. But we have to do so with the full knowledge that we cannot let anyone anywhere change the character of America. So, yes, we're going to take every precaution, every security measure that is required. But we're not going to let anyone undermine our way of life. And we're certainly not going to let law-abiding, decent, patriotic Americans, no matter what their religion or their background, be in some way pointed out or harassed.

DONALDSON: Before I let you go, speak to this issue of more deaths in this country, perhaps, for service personnel. One of the reasons given--and I would like you to respond to this, that your husband, when he was in office, used cruise missiles against Osama bin Laden and did not try to mount a ground operation, was a belief that the American public just wouldn't stand for casualties in our armed forces. Was that one of the reasons? And what about the future when it comes to casualties in the armed forces?

Sen. CLINTON: You know, Sam, as I say, I think everything changed on Tuesday. I think the American people have a much greater awareness of the enemy that we face and the sacrifices that will be necessary. I am absolutely confident that the president and his advisers will put together a plan that will take into account the great difficulty we face.

You know, I have some knowledge of what the terrain in that part of the world is like. I have a little sense of history, the successive attempts to try to conquer or invade or control Afghanistan; the most recent being by the former Soviet Union. This is an extraordinarily difficult undertaking. But we have to use any and all means that we believe will create conditions that will lead to the kind of positive outcome that we want.

DONALDSON: So...

Sen. CLINTON: Yes, there will be sacrifices and there will be losses, but we have to proceed in a prudent and effective manner.

DONALDSON: So, in a word, if we have to take casualties in this war against terrorism, we're just going to have to accept that.

Sen. CLINTON: Sam, we just took casualties in New York City. We took maybe 5,000 casualties. We took them at the Pentagon. We have already had men and women, innocent civilians, killed in this war, and we've lost some of the bravest people you could ever meet. Our firefighters, our police officers, our emergency personnel, who went in there. They were the front-line soldiers in this war against terrorism. We've already taken casualties. Now we are facing a--an implacable foe who stands against our way of life and our values. And this is a war that we have to pursue, but we have to do it in an effective and prudent manner. And it's going to take the patience of all of us. And that's why I think everyone has to support our president and all those who are attempting to find the source of this terrorism and stamp it out.

DONALDSON: Thank you very much, Senator Clinton, for being with us today.

Sen. CLINTON: Thank you.

DONALDSON: By the way, the official casualty figure has just gone over 5,000--5,097 missing figure is the one we're getting now.

"Face the Nation," CBS, 9/16/2001

With us now from our studios in New York, Senator Chuck Schumer and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton. Senator Schumer, how long do you think it's going to take to--to get this repaired? It's just astonishing. I mean, people are talking about a new Marshall Plan to rebuild Lower Manhattan. But as I just watched Byron this morning, you realize what an enormous task this is.

Senator CHARLES SCHUMER (Democrat, New York): It is a huge, huge task. It's--there's so much. Just yesterday, I heard that many of our subway lines can't run because they were either cracked or flooded or suffered structural damage. Our electricity grid system, which is so interconnected in New York, has trouble, the telephone system, and then the rebuilding is just enormous. We have lost, Bob, 30 million square feet of office space. That's the equivalent of 150,000 job places, you know, p--pla--places for people to work. It is a huge, huge task.

The one good thing I would say, New Yorkers are amazingly resilient. The scenes that we have seen, Hillary and I have seen, as we go throughout the city are just amazing. Both the grief that is shared by everybody. I just went back to my local neighborhood yesterday. I spent some time. I found at the local school, four kids have parents missing. The local firehouse, 11 missing. Every street has somebody s--missing. But at the same time, we are so dedicated to building our city back, the city we love, the world city, the international city, and we will, but it's going to take awhile, and it's going to take a lot of money. And we're so grateful that President Bush and the Senate and House, both parties united and really are helping us 100 percent. There's been no stinting.

SCHIEFFER: And I know both of you, Senator Clinton, had your own turmoil and--and angst, because as I understand it, Senator Clinton, you did not know for several hours where Chelsea was. Senator Schumer did not know where some of his children were.

Sen. SCHUMER: That's right.

Senator HILLARY CLINTON (Democrat, New York): Well, that's right, Bob. You know, from the moment we heard about it, the first plane going into the tower, you know, I called Chuck, he was trying to find out where his daughters and his wife were. Of course, his wife has responsibility for transportation in the city. I knew that my daughter was staying with good friends in the city, and I was desperately trying to find her, and it took some time to track her down. She was actually quite close to where this disaster occurred.

I don't think you'll find anybody who doesn't have a personal story. And I've been so struck by how everyone is doing their best to help each other cope with what the after-effects of this disaster are here in the city. And it goes far beyond the city. We have, you know, many people who came into work from the suburbs from New Jersey, from Connecticut. We now know--and I was at the armory yesterday, visiting with the families who are still desperately looking for their lost loved ones, that this affected every single kind of person you can imagine, American citizens, citizens from all over the world.

And, you know, I--I just can't thank America enough. Chuck and I came down with the governor and the mayor and saw the disaster firsthand on Wednesday afternoon and went to a briefing where the mayor and the governor told us exactly what was happening, and we could hear with our own ears that the immensity of this requires a national response. And I'm so grateful that the president, the administration and our colleagues in Congress have responded. It's going to take a long time. Just as our war against terrorism is a long-term effort, what we need to do to help rebuild lives and rebuild our city is also a long-term commitment, and we're grateful for the help.

Sen. SCHUMER: And in fact, we heard to...

BORGER: Senator, s...

Sen. SCHUMER: I--we heard t--I heard today that in Virginia, all the newspapers had pa--full-page ads saying, 'We love New York.' That means so much to New Yorkers, and all of America has just been just wonderful to us.

BORGER: Senator Schumer, as--as New York looks towards the future and towards rebuilding, should New York rebuild the World Trade Center?

Sen. SCHUMER: Well, that's a debate that's going on right now. I think we should. I think that it doesn't have to be exactly the same way, but, you know, Gloria, it's--I look out it--I look out at the skyline from my window of my house in Brooklyn, and I feel violated looking and seeing how it has been changed by a madman on the other side of the globe and his--his henchmen. And to have nothing there, I think, would not be a good idea. So to rebuild in a way and to do it along with a memorial for those who were lost, I think that those who were lost would not want us to see that space lay vacant. And so there'll be a lot of discussion. Again, I think New Yorkers--we're known for having many opinions, but we'll come together on what will be the best thing to do, but my judgment would be we must build something grand there.

SCHIEFFER: You know, both of you, I know, went to see the president after this happened. There have been $20 billion that people were talking about to rebuild and track down the terrorists. It's my understanding the two of you talked to the president, and almost immediately, he said, 'We'll double it.' Senator Clinton, tell us about that.

Sen. CLINTON: Well, Bob, when Chuck and I went to--to the briefing and realized that we needed to get relief immediately, we spoke with the governor and the mayor. They gave us a very rough estimate of about $20 billion that was really needed as a first installment to keep the rescue and rebuilding work and the human consequences of this--we have to rebuild lives. We have people who are without jobs, as well as those who are now orphans and widows. And so the work before us is enormous. And we immediately called our colleagues, spoke with Senator Daschle, spoke with Senator Byrd and others. We know that we've got great support from the mayor and the governor, who let the White House know that this was going to be a united front. And we're very grateful that we received the kind of bipartisan support.

And when we went to see the president, we were sitting in the Oval Office, Chuck and I, the two senators from Virginia, and the president gave us a briefing about where we were in terms of our security issues, and then we asked him for the additional $20 billion, over and above what he needed to conduct the kind of security, military, defense issues efforts.

SCHIEFFER: Senator Clinton.

Sen. CLINTON: Yes.

SCHIEFFER: Hold that thought for just a moment. I have to break in and say some of our viewers are going to be leaving us now, but for many of you around the country, we continue with our expanded coverage of this story on FACE THE NATION. We'll be back with Senator Clinton, Senator Shumer--Schumer after this short break.

(Announcements)

SCHIEFFER: And welcome back now to our expanded coverage on FACE THE NATION this morning. We're going to be on the air for the next hour, as we continue to talk about this story from every angle. I want to bring you up to date on the very latest developments. Just a while ago, Secretary of State Powell said of terrorism, 'We will pull it out by its roots. We will find who is responsible.' President Bush has told the military to get ready for war. The vice president said, 'Osama bin Laden is the target of the moment.'

I want to go back now to Senator Hillary Clinton and Senator Chuck Schumer, who are in New York. Senator Clinton, before we took that break, you were telling us about going back to the White House and talking to the president about the extra aid that was needed for New--from--for New York. Tell us about what happened.

Sen. CLINTON: Well, Bob, as soon as we asked the president for the additional money, he said, 'You've got it.' No hesitation. It was a wonderful affirmation of our commitment to doing whatever is necessary to rebuild lives, as well as structures, on--from this terrible, evil attack. And then we worked very hard with our colleagues. And we were overwhelmingly grateful for the vote that we received in the Senate and the House. This is the kind of commitment that New York needs, and which we're receiving from literally--not the president, colleagues in Congress, but people on the streets all over America. We're getting all kinds of messages. My office is flooded with calls and e-mails from people who say, 'I've never been to New York, but I want to help. I want to know what I can do to help you.' And we are just extraordinarily grateful, and it's going to be a long-term commitment, but we know we're going to have the hearts and...

Sen. SCHUMER: Yeah, let me just...

Sen. CLINTON: ...hands of America behind us.

SCHIEFFER: Senator Schumer.

Sen. SCHUMER: I just wanted to just say another word about the president because he really helped us dramatically. You know, we made the pitch to him, and I said, 'Mr. President, we just need this $20 billion.' And I thought he'd say, 'Well, let's start off with $5 billion. It's a huge sum of money. Let's--let me--give me a list.' And instead, he just uttered three words. He said, 'You've got it.' And I stood up, and I was ready to hug him. I couldn't because he was president. But, you know, just speaking--we're part of the...

Sen. CLINTON: But he was rendered speechless.

Sen. SCHUMER: I was speechless. And he said, 'You're speechless?' And I said, 'For $20 billion, I can be speechless again.' But he didn't have to do this. We're part of the blue states, you know, we're not part of his political...

SCHIEFFER: Yeah.

Sen. SCHUMER: ...sort of coalition. And the fact that he was so generous, and then late that night, when some in the Senate didn't want to do it, he stood them down and said, 'We have to do this.' It speaks for his ability to unify the nation. And Hillary and I are both just really grateful to him for his leadership and his help for New York, as we are to all of America.

SCHIEFFER: All right. Senators, thank you so much. And I would say, Senator Schumer, there were a lot of people who were ready to hug a lot of people last week. At one point at the US Capitol, I saw Trent Lott with his arm around Tom Daschle. You don't see that very often. Thank you both...

Sen. CLINTON: Thank you.

Sen. SCHUMER: Thank you, Bob.

SCHIEFFER: ...so much.

"Larry King Live," CNN, 9/19/2001

LARRY KING, HOST: Tonight, with the military on the move, the economy in trouble, the president prepares for an extraordinary speech. He says he owes Americans an explanation and they are going to get it! Joining us from Washington, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York.

Also in Washington, Her Majesty Queen Noor of Jordan. Plus, Cantor Fitzgerald CEO Howard Lutnick. His firm devastated in the World Trade Center attack.

Those guests and a lot more next on LARRY KING LIVE.

Good evening. Here are the latest headlines and latest developments. The United States deploys dozens U.S. warplanes to forward bases in the Persian Gulf region. Overseas military deployment named "Operation Infinite Justice." American Airlines plans to lay off 20,000 at least. Sources say United Airlines is cutting its workforce by 20 percent.

The president addresses Congress tomorrow night. That address will air right at this time. We will be on with a full edition of LARRY KING LIVE and guests following the address. We begin with Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton from our bureau in Washington. What do you expect tomorrow night?

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Well, Larry, I'm pleased that the president will be coming up to address not just the joint session of Congress, but the entire country. We have been through a terrible week as a nation. We are still evaluating and taking stock of the impact of these horrific attacks on our people, on our land.

And I think it is important for the country to stay united, and for the president to lead us where we are going both abroad and at home. So it is a good decision. I'm looking forward to being there and continuing to support him.

KING: You were the wife of a governor when last we deployed forces going overseas in the Gulf and the MIDDLE EAST and the like. Do you remember your thoughts then and your position now?

CLINTON: You know, Larry, I remember it very clearly because I supported then President Bush. I thought it was the right decision to make for a lot of reasons we don't need to rehash. But I was very strong in my support. Now I'm obviously in a very different position.

I support this President Bush in taking the steps that are necessary to defend our country and to seek out and bring to justice those who have committed these terrorist acts and networks that support and supply them.

KING: Do you know if your husband plus former Presidents Ford, Carter and Bush Senior have been brought into an up to date on all of this?

CLINTON: Well, I can't speak for any other of the former presidents, but I know that my husband has been called, and has been given briefings, which I think is very important because we want not only to have a united front, but to really utilize the talents and the experiences of every single and every single American and obviously that includes our former presidents.

But you know, I have spent most of the last week in New York, at ground zero or as Cardinal Egan memorably said, "ground hero." And what I'm struck by is that we have had tremendous leadership from not only all levels of government, the president, in New York the governor and the mayor who have done a superb job.

We have had leadership from business executives, like the guest you will have later this evening, who has been a real tower of strength and example. And we have also had the kind of leadership that comes in the midst of a crisis, when all hell is breaking loose as it was on Tuesday.

And men and women who are firefighters, and police officers, emergency personnel, you know, instead of running from the disaster, ran toward it. And I think that there is a lot that America and I know New York can be very proud of, right now. And that should give us the kind of courage, and strength to face the future together.

KING: A lot of the nation had opinions about New York. Not many of them often favorable. And you were new to New York, got to live there, got elected as its senator. Did anything about the way New Yorkers responded surprise you?

CLINTON: No. But you know, you are a native. You know the people of New York. You know that spirit, that indomitable "in your face, we are going to do it" spirit. But you also know something that I knew, and I think the world has seen, now, and that is you are not going to find any people anywhere who are more generous of spirit, more giving, more helpful to one another, more compassionate.

We have seen all of that on display in the wake of these tragedies, and I'm so proud, because it is isn't only the people who have been on the front line, and they deserve the thanks of every free person and every one who cares about humanity. But the way New Yorkers in general have conducted themselves. I mean, we have seen this extraordinary drop in crime. It already had been driven down, well it is even lower than it was before the terrible Tuesday occurred.

I know that just today, for example, we are working to pass a commemorative stamp, "9-11 Heroes." It will be a stamp Senator Schumer and in the Senate and my colleagues Congressman Ackerman and Fossella in the House hope to get passed soon because it will give people all over the world a chance to, you know, buy a stamp depicting our heroes, and the money will go to a special fund set up and administered by our emergency agency, FEMA.

And it will be used to help defray the costs and the needs of the thousands of people who have been affected by this tragedy. You know, we have orphans and widows, and bereft people who are going to need our help for a long time to come.

KING: Do you have, Senator, any concerns about General Ashcroft's proposed legislation as it might deal with civil liberties of Americans? We remember back in World War II, and the internment of 150,000 Japanese, which the Supreme Court upheld and now we look at aghast.

CLINTON: Well I spoke with General Ashcroft yesterday. I know that there is a lot of work going on between the Justice Department, other government agencies, members of Congress. Clearly, we want to have the tools to combat terrorism effectively.

I will give you just one example. You know we have changed the way we communicate. We used to only permit the wiretaping of phones that were, we knew, in one place. Well we are mobile now. You pick up your cell phone you move. We need to change the way we try to get the information we need.

But I also believe, and I think everyone believes, that we don't want to lose what is important and essential about who we are as nation. We want to do what we are called upon to do within the Constitution. And I have every reason to believe that, you know, those concerns are being worked out even as we speak.

KING: Finally Senator, our lives will never be the same. Do you think often about the future and the like? Or are you just now solely in the present?

CLINTON: You know, Larry, everything changed a week ago Tuesday. It obviously changed in the most terrible and dramatic way for thousands of people and their families. But it changed for all of us. And I think a lot about the future, even while my days are filled with working to do everything I can to help in the present to try to bring the support and assistance that our city and state and country need.

But as I look to the future, I know there is reason for many Americans to be concerned. But I would hope that we would face this challenge with the same resolve that we have faced every other challenge in our history.

We have nothing to fear but fear itself. Wasn't that what Franklin Roosevelt reminded us, and we'll have to be more vigilant, we'll have to be alert. We have to be prudent in the steps we take, but you know, I am fundamentally a very optimistic and confident American. And I believe we will get through this. And we will be the stronger for it.

KING: One other quick thing: If legislation is proposed that could possibly keep Rudy Giuliani in office, extending that term limits, would you be for it?

CLINTON: You know, everyone -- everyone in the world, I think, agrees that he has done a superb job. And not just where one would have expected it in his determination and courage, but his compassion, his caring and concern have really shown a bright light for a lot of people in this darkness.

But I also think it is important to recognize that in a democracy, no matter how superb a person is, no matter how great a job he is doing, we have to believe in our democracy, in the rule of law. Elections are absolutely essential to how we conduct our affairs, and our country. And I would be concerned that we would upend that respect for the rule of law.

I do hope and anticipate that the mayor will work every minute of the remaining days in his term, and then be given the kind of responsibility that will enable him to keep working for the city he loves and be, frankly, enlisted the war against terrorism.

KING: Not a bad idea. Thank you, Senator. Always good seeing you.

CLINTON: Thank you so much, Larry.

KING: Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York. When we come back, her majesty, Queen Noor of Jordan, the wife of the late King Hussein of Jordan.

I'm Larry King. Don't go away.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

REMARKS BY SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D-NY), 9/19/2001

TOPIC: HELP FOR FAMILIES OF WORLD TRADE CENTER ATTACK VICTIMS

LOCATION: NEW YORK CITY FAMILY CENTER, PIER 94, NEW YORK, NEW YORK

(Note: This event was fed in progress.)

SEN. CLINTON: (In progress) -- the Family Center from the Armory here in just breakneck speed, and it's a really well-equipped facility. It's a place where families can come and get not only information but help.

We're now moving into the stage where, you know, bills are coming due; mortgages, rents have to be paid. A lot of people have lost their incomes, their only breadwinners, their jobs. And I just can't say enough about this woman and the incredible people inside.

And there are people from all over the country. You know, we've got the most extraordinary outpouring of support -- people who dropped their jobs, people who are part of the Red Cross, who answer the call to a terrible disaster like this. And once again, I mean, the city is setting an example. Rosemary was just telling me that we've got folks coming from all over the world just to see how we're running this, because it's an incredible display of know-how and can-do spirit with great leadership, starting with the mayor.

And if you've got any questions, you know -- Rosemary, you want to say something?

ROSEMARY : We're in readiness for reality. We are still a bit numb, but the families are getting ready for the acceptance of what we're facing. They're still coming for services in mental -- with mental health professionals, but our new registration of cases, as you could well imagine, is really down. Yesterday it was only 25. Today we have just a handful coming and registering. Last night we did special outreach in the different communities to remind people how important it is.

But I think the reality and the time for acceptance is here, and we are changing some of the format inside to be prepared for that. The intake area will be reduced, and the mental health professionals, with the Red Cross and the Department of Health and all of those expert in that field, will be stepping up to be prepared for any questions any time, anything that people need to take care of.

Thank you.

Q A lot of people are turning to Mayor Giuliani for support and strength right now. How do you think he's doing?

SEN. CLINTON: Oh, I think the mayor's been superb in every way, and I've said that on every occasion that I could, publicly, privately, because his leadership has summoned the spirit of this city, as well as our nation and literally, I think, the entire world. And the people that he has on the front lines, people like Rosemary, are an extension of that kind of leadership.

The governor has been terrific, giving us everything we possibly could need here in the city. And I want to thank the president, who came through for us when Senator Schumer and I asked for the money that we needed, the extra $20 billion. You know, this -- we have to pay for all of the rescue and recovery and reconstruction and rebuilding, and the president's been a great help to us.

Tomorrow I will be bringing a very large group of bipartisan senators from all over the country to come here, to see for themselves, because one of the points that I've tried to make is that as good a job as all of you have done -- and you've done a superb job, and I want to thank television, radio, newspapers, everyone -- you cannot really grasp the full extent of this devastation and the extraordinary scope of this disaster until you see it.

So everybody has been great, and I think the mayor deserves not only our appreciation and our thanks, but, you know, real gratitude for the courage, the compassion, the concern, the strength that he has given to all of us.

Q Senator, you described for us the logistics here and how it's all working, but what did you say to the family members to offer them comfort?

SEN. CLINTON: You know, we -- my husband, as you know, and daughter are here. We spent a lot of time talking to the people working there, the volunteers and professionals who are assigned there or who have just dropped everything to be here to help. The families that I spoke to are moving, as Rosemary said, to a state of accepting the worst. We looked for a long time at the wall that has been put up. At the Armory there was a wall of messages and photos, and it sprang up overnight -- right here, too. So we still have the wall at the Armory, and we now have a wall of, you know, faces and sayings and messages from mothers and fathers and sisters and brothers and children. You know, words are hardly adequate to what the families are looking for; I know that -- but you know, words of comfort, words of support.

And what is especially important about what's going on inside now is that we're offering the kind of assistance that families need to be able to get on with their lives. You know, the practical, everyday requirements of living have to go on. I mean, one of the strongest messages that we hope everyone has received is, we must go on. We have to demonstrate that our lives -- our way of life continues; that yes, we have suffered grievous losses, and we have to stand with our families, but we have to get about the business of moving forward. And that's true even for these families who have suffered, you know, the worst that anyone could.

Thank you. Thank you. Thank you very much.

U.S. SENATORS WARNER (R-VA) AND CLINTON (D-NY) HOLD MEDIA AVAILABILITY, 9/19/2001

WARNER: Ladies and gentlemen, I have been on the site almost every day since the tragic accident against this building and against America. And today I'm honored to have a very valued colleague with me, my fellow Senator from New York.

Because of the catastrophes in both of our states, she and I have been working together as a team on a broad range of issues. I had the privilege of visiting privately with the president of the United States a day or so after this incident. And today, I'm deeply honored on behalf of all Virginians and all the men and women of the armed forces, and particularly those who are in that building, to have her here today.

So Senator, thank you for coming.

CLINTON: Thank you, Senator.

And Senator Warner just said, he and I have been working closely together since last Tuesday when disaster struck New York and struck the Pentagon here in Virginia. I wanted to come and convey my respects and the respects of the people of New York to those who labor in the Pentagon and in our military and those who lost their lives in this terrible attack on everything we care about.

I also wanted to thank the rescue workers, the volunteers and others who have been on the site. I know from my many visits to the site in New York and to the facilities where we're supporting the families and the rescue workers that this is one of the most challenging tasks any human being could undertake, and everyone does it with such courage and commitment. We almost have to make them leave the site, because they work themselves to exhaustion.

CLINTON: But as many of us have said from the very beginning, when we were attacked in New York and at the Pentagon, this was an attack on America. And it will engender not only a swift and strong American response, but it has also generated the American spirit in ways that every one of us can be proud of, and that has sent a signal to the entire world about what we're made of.

So Senator, thank you for being here. Immediately after the attack, I know you were in the command center. I know you've been working side-by-side with both our military officials, as well as the administration and our colleagues in the Senate. And I appreciate very much what you have done and what your leadership has meant.

WARNER: We thank you, Senator. And as we walked through down there, Senator Clinton took special time to meet and greet the volunteers, the professionals from the Red Cross to the firefighters. And she remarked that here in New York and here in Virginia, we have a band of brothers and sisters who have united with the same one spirit. We're Americans and don't tread on me.

CLINTON: That's exactly right.

QUESTION: Senator Clinton, after visiting both sites, can you tell us how this has affected you personally?

CLINTON: Well, I was stunned and overwhelmed by what I saw when I went to New York on Wednesday afternoon. I had, like so many Americans, stayed up literally all night Tuesday watching the coverage that so many of you have provided to us.

CLINTON: But I wasn't prepared. As good a job as you've done, the television screen contains and shrinks the depth of devastation, the scope of the destruction. And as I was helicoptering over the site preparing to land to go visit it, I saw people running because another building was about to collapse.

I've been to the site three times. Tomorrow we're taking a large group, a bipartisan group of senators up to see what I've seen, to share ideas about what we're going to do.

It's been one of the most emotionally wrenching times of my life. But it's also been an extraordinary celebration of the human spirit. You know, when I was standing there that first Wednesday and everything was just in such a state of chaos and you were at the gates of hell, it seemed, there were men and women who were not walking away from the destruction, but walking toward it.

You know, we lost more than 300 firefighters. We lost close to 100 police and port authority law enforcement officials, emergency rescue workers -- people who were there because they came to serve, and their courage kept them going when human nature would have said turn around and run. Those are the people that I think about.

You know, we call the site ground zero, but it really ought to be called ground hero. And that is the same as what I see here, people who are engaged in the heroic tasks of trying to put us back together, physically and emotionally.

CLINTON: It's an extraordinary experience. And I'm very proud of everybody in New York, and proud of what I see here.

WARNER: We thank you very much, and I would just conclude by saying, having been with the senator and having served 23 years in the Senate, you've become a senior senator very quickly, and you are a tower of strength.

CLINTON: Thank you, Senator.

WARNER: Good luck. You've served American constituents well.

CLINTON: Thank you, Senator. Thank you.

"CNN Live This Morning," CNN, 9/21/2001

PAULA ZAHN, CNN ANCHOR: Now we want to turn our attention to Senator Hillary Clinton, who joins us from Washington D.C. this morning.

Good to see you. I know you got delayed. We appreciate your dropping by after such a busy schedule this morning.

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Thank you. And Paula, thank you for all of your coverage. I've seen a lot of, and I think you've done a great job. And I know you weren't expecting to start so soon, but it's really meant a lot to a lot of people.

ZAHN: Well I appreciate that.

I wanted to get your reaction to a report from Steve Harrigan who just filed a story from northern Afghanistan. And he said that the Northern Alliance leaders he has spoken with have confirmed they were able to gain control of some 200 Taliban fighters along with the help of some U.S. intelligence. Does that suggest to you that the timetable for any sort of military action is being moved up?

CLINTON: Well Paula, I think it suggests to me that the planning and the very careful preparation that the president and his advisers have undertaken since September 11 is beginning to pay off.

I don't know all of the details. Certainly, this sounds like very good news, because we know that in order to be effective against these terrorist networks we're going to have to have allies. Allies who speak the language, who know the terrain and who are able to help guide the kind of response that we heard the president so strongly speak about last night.

ZAHN: One of your former colleagues, former Senator Bob Kerrey, said last night that the United States should hunt down and kill Osama bin Laden. Do you agree with him?

CLINTON: You know, Paula, we have to do what is necessary, and I thought one of the very strongest lines in the president's speech last night is that we would bring our enemies to justice or bring justice to our enemies. I think that's a line that will be memorable and stand alongside so many of the other very important lines of speech and resolve that presidents in the past have given us at times of great need.

I think we have to do what is necessary and what is appropriate. I, certainly, have the greatest regard for my friend Bob Kerrey, who knows of what he speaks. I don't know that it would be possible to capture someone alive with the kind of fanatical beliefs that these people, including bin Laden, seem to possess.

So the important thing is to end the terrorist networks. We heard that very strongly from the president last night. That's what I think we're going to do.

ZAHN: Your husband targeted Osama bin Laden's organization in 1998, with an attack in Afghanistan, and some would say that attack certainly disrupted his operations, but it certainly didn't isolate Osama bin Laden. What lesson should President Bush learn from that?

CLINTON: I think we have all learned. We had some successes. We did capture the '93 World Trade Center bombers. We did hold them accountable. They are serving jail terms. We rolled up some of the networks. We were able to disrupt the operations. But we never had either the sense of absolute urgency, nor the international support that we now find rallying behind the president and our country.

So we've learned a lot. And I think that going forward, we're going to be much more effective in this struggle against terrorism.

ZAHN: But do you think President Bush has learned the lesson just how elusive a man Osama bin Laden is?

CLINTON: Well, I think all of us have. Certainly, the president and many of his advisers have followed this, are aware of how difficult this will be. We heard that from his very strong remarks last night. You know, we know that we're in for a different kind of war. Some people don't even like to use that phrase because it seems somehow not descriptive of what we're up against. We don't know exactly where the target is. We don't know exactly what resources we have to cut off, because it's not a state that is running and has power plans and other kinds of resources.

But I think it's an applicable term because we have to have the same mentality. Clearly, we are fighting in the shadows. We're fighting in ways that America's never been called on before.

But I feel totally confident in the outcome. I thought the president's very strong words made it clear that we will see this through.

ZAHN: How many American lives, though, might be lost in the process?

CLINTON: Paula, no one knows that. We have the best-prepared military, not only in the world, but I think in the history of the world. I know a lot of the men and women who not only lead it, but serve. It is an all-volunteer force, as you know. People join because of patriotism and desire to serve their country in this way. But they know when they sign up that there are risks.

I went into Bosnia after the Dayton Peace Accords. I have been on the DMZ. I have travelled all over the world. I have been privileged to meet the men and women who wear our uniform. There isn't a better prepared group of human beings anywhere.

But they are realistic. They know when they are called upon by their commander-in-chief, they have to respond, and they do so willingly -- and I think we will see the results in the weeks ahead.

ZAHN: Before we move on to the task at hand in New York City, just one last question for you on the political front. To what extent is the former president, your husband, being consulted as military actions as military action is planned?

CLINTON: Well, you would really have to ask him directly.

ZAHN: I would love to. He won't return my phone calls.

CLINTON: Well, I will tell him that you are calling for him.

ZAHN: Is there anything you can tell us about any briefings he might have gotten?

CLINTON: I know that has spoken with people, but I don't feel it is appropriate for me to answer that question.

ZAHN: OK, we will keep on burning those phone lines to the former president.

Let's go to the delegation's trip to New York City yesterday. Clearly, your colleagues had seen the aerials of the zone, some of the closeup pictures of what is now being called the pile. What was their overwhelming reaction to seeing the site in person for the first time?

CLINTON: Well, you know, Paula, it was, as mine has been every time I have been down there, it is so emotionally draining and exhausting. At least, for me. I was down there again in the pouring rain, my colleagues were just dumbstruck. They were overwhelmed by what they saw. Even though they followed it avidly -- they certainly watched the television and read everything they could -- they weren't prepared for this massive destruction that we viewed. And many of them thanked me and my colleague, Senator Schumer, for urging them to come. I made a lot of phone calls, asking people personally to come and see what happened in the heart of our country, in New York City.

And it was a draining, difficult day. I got back on the train after we went to New Jersey, to visit with people who have heroically rallied to help on the site and to provide housing in those first hours after the crisis, sending their own police and fire across the river. I think all of us were just worn out, emotionally drained. And many have come up to me again today, and told me they could not have imagined it, unless they saw it for themselves.

ZAHN: But unfortunately, in New York City, you not only have people dealing with the trauma that has been dealt them and their families, you now this ripple effect in the economy, with hotels, in some cases, being almost empty. I know the mayor, while you were in transit this morning, was encouraging people to come to New York City and spend, spend, spend. What are your concerns about the economy?

CLINTON: I think we all share the concern that, number one, we have suffered some real economic damage. We've lost some of our ability to generate jobs, and people have been rendered without incomes. We have suffered a direct economic impact from this.

But the ripple effect is especially troubling. I just came from a meeting where we discussed what we were going to do to try to encourage people to start flying again. We are going to beef up security. We are going to provide some help to the airlines because that will have a very positive effect on tourism, on rental cars, on so many of the businesses that rely upon our normal everyday travel.

It is going to take us awhile to work our way through this. But, you know, our economy is to big. It is so strong. We just have to do what the president said last night: rebuild New York, tend to the normal everyday business that each of us has to now get back to doing, start living our lives.

We can't let these terrible attacks render us a fearful nation. And fearful people cannot defeat a very resolute enemy. We need that American confidence and optimism, and that includes getting out again; traveling again; being with our family, our friends, our loved ones. If we do that, we are going to get out of this economic difficulty faster than if we basically withdraw from the normal everyday life we should be leading.

ZAHN: As always, Senator Clinton, great to see you, and we really appreciate your dropping by, because we know just about every single minute of your day is micromanaged. Again, thanks for your perspective this morning.

CLINTON: Thank you, Paula.

U.S. SENATOR EDWARD KENNEDY (D-MA) HOLDS HEARING ON PSYCHOLOGICAL TRAUMA OF TERRORIST ATTACKS, 9/26/2001

CLINTON: I want to thank you, Mr. Chairman. I want to thank you for coming to New York last week. I want to thank our colleagues, Senator Frist and Senator Wellstone, and so many others as well for your firsthand, personal concern which has meant a great deal to the people of New York.

And I particularly want to thank our witnesses today, Dr. Kelly and Dr. Pfeffer and Dr. Eth, who are here with us from New York. They've taken time out from their extremely demanding and difficult work to give us some insights and recommendations on what we need to do to help you help the countless grieving survivors and family members that you're dealing with on a daily basis.

I know that the mental health needs are just overwhelming, and we have had an outpouring of professionals and volunteers. But I think it's important for us to hear today about what lies ahead.

CLINTON: In the immediate aftermath -- we've never had anything like this -- but in the immediate aftermath of many of the tragedies we've suffered as a nation, we provide the help that we can muster. But this is a long-term commitment that we have to make, and we don't have the numbers of trained people available and ready that we need.

I know that Dr. Kelly, who comes from a family of firefighters, has experienced the full impact of this disaster. And I appreciate greatly your being here, Dr. Kelly, and for your service and for your family's service.

Dr. Pfeffer has taken up the heart-wrenching challenge of addressing the needs of children, particularly those who have lost a loved one, and especially those who have been orphaned. We don't have a final count, but we have many orphans, the children of single parents who were lost and even two-parent families where both were lost.

Dr. Eth, who's been working on the front lines at Saint Vincent's, has been seeing -- the best numbers I have -- something like 7,000 patients with mental health needs at Saint Vincent's alone since this disaster occurred. So we are especially grateful that you would come and share your experience and your insights and your recommendations with us.

And I thank the chairman for holding this hearing and giving us a chance to know what we need to do immediately and over the long term to try to address the extraordinary toll of human suffering out of this disaster here, the attack on the Pentagon, the loss of the plane in Pennsylvania, and to be better prepared to take care of people in the future.

Thank you.

[GAP -- FROM LATER IN HEARING]

CLINTON: No, go ahead.

WELLSTONE: ... you've been here patiently waiting, and you've done such, I think, heroic work on this. I mean, I really believe that, both you and Senator Schumer.

I was saying to Senator Kennedy that one of the -- I don't know if irony is the right word, but one of the challenges here is the more we start to talk about bio-terrorist attacks, the more the anxiety is created, and how you then deal with that, as I heard Dr. Eth respond to the senator from Tennessee.

Dr. Eth, I'm going to start out with three quick questions to all of you, and I'll do it quickly. I wrote this down. You said something like, you know, never before have the gaps between, I suppose, what we know and what we do (OFF-MIKE).

And I wanted to ask you and others, as we try to figure out how to best respond, whether you could just comment on the adequacy or inadequacy of both the private health insurance and the public mental health care systems in being able to respond to September 11th, and for that matter, in being able to respond to people who have trouble with these problems in general. I mean, it's a big question, but it might give us some sense of really what we're faced with now.

ETH: If I can, Senator Wellstone, try to respond to the first part of your question with regard to gaps, there are gaps in our scientific knowledge. There are also gaps in the training of clinicians, because, thankfully, we are not -- most therapists don't often deal with disaster situations. It's not part of their skill set, and so we need to implement a training program to bring all of the therapists up to speed in those specific techniques that are most useful for this kind of situation.

There's also gaps in our capability to respond to post traumatic stress disorder. There was a SAMPSA (ph) initiative to fund child PTSD centers, and that initiative has gone forward. This would be a wonderful time to expand that program so that we can develop an infrastructure in the United States of trained people and centers to deliver the specialized care and move the field forward in post traumatic stress disorder and especially in childhood PTSD.

PFEFFER: I also would like to add to what Dr. Eth said -- and I wholeheartedly agree -- but to add also an area that has not been well looked at and studied and understood, and that's the area of traumatic grief and grief, especially in children. This will have a major impact on thousands of children, and it has a major impact on thousands and thousands of children worldwide. And, truly, there are meager amounts of information about that, and I think that it's a very critical issue, especially with this event.

KELLY: The gaps in the system are very large. Not only do we have a system whose resources are strained for existing mental health, but people with serious mental illness may have themselves greater need for services, and then we have more people with mental illness who will need services. But in order for us to make the best interventions, I think we need more research to help us better understand how to do those interventions, and this research is directly applicable to what we can do.

WELLSTONE: You know, as you look at the people that are, you know -- have been right there...

KELLY: Again, I think the good news is that the pre-morbid resilience of our members is very high, and, again, these are a special group of people, and their families are very special. And I think if we can intervene and provide a support system now, we can prevent some of the long-term consequences which, you know, the others have mentioned on the panel, and then also identify the people who need additional help so that we can get them into the proper psychiatric or support system that they need so that their needs will be taken into account.

WELLSTONE: I'll finish with this. Listening to you, Dr. Kelly, it just occurs to me, Senator Kennedy and Senator Clinton -- and I'm just thinking out loud -- but in some kind of way, it's really a (OFF- MIKE) and some people get really -- if you label everything mental health, people kind of feel like that's not me and I want to stay away from that.

In some ways, what you're saying is there are a lot of people that are going to get through this, but they're going to need some help, just like anybody would. And we don't need to, like, identify it as an illness, but we're just saying, look, people have had to struggle with this. They've lost their loved ones. They've been there. We ought to figure out a way to have some support for those, however we put it, which is, I think, part of what we're talking about.

On the other hand, having done a heck of a lot of work, especially with a lot of Vietnam vets who struggle with PTSD, I know what that's about. I've learned about that, and that's for real, and so is depression, and so is a lot of other things that you all have talked about. So there's a continuum there, and that's where I think we've got to figure out how to plug these gaps, and I think we can do a lot better in the private sector, and, obviously, we're going to have to have the public sector.

Can I just say one thing, and then I'll let you get the final word, Dr. Eth. One thing that occurs to me -- I don't say this to all my colleagues, but I really -- I guess today at this hearing, to the extent that we got a chance to communicate this, Senator Frist was talking about the secretary of health and human services, and I really want to urge him -- this is such a big challenge, and I know he's up to it.

And I also want to -- I think that the surgeon general can play a really critical role here. David Satcher has done some marvelous work in this area, and I would just like to encourage the surgeon general and the head of NIH to be willing to speak out on this. I mean, (OFF- MIKE) is true, but I also think we don't want to get back into the problem of sort of saying, well, all these mental health services -- that's not really the case, that's not really that important, because it is really important, and I think having the surgeon general out there could be terribly important right now along with the head of NIH.

ETH: Senator Wellstone, you mentioned Vietnam vets, and I worked at a VA medical center for 12 years, and it was the only place I know of where there was true parity, where Vietnam vets with PTSD were treated with as much care as they needed alongside of physically injured Vietnam vets. Nowhere else in our country and in no other system can somebody who has developed a psychiatric problem after this disaster be treated comparably to somebody who's been physically injured. I don't know of any insurance program that would allow that, and that, too, is a tragedy.

WELLSTONE: I believe we're going to make that happen.

ETH: Thank you.

KENNEDY: Senator Clinton?

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and I would certainly offer any help in following up on Senator Warner's very wise and generous offer that we try to move quickly with the needs that we're hearing about this morning, do whatever we can to catalog those, and include them in the defense authorization bill as it's going forward, and then look for the sufficient appropriations to deal with them.

I appreciate greatly the witnesses helping us think through the gaps, and I hope as you reflect back on these hearings and as you go forward with your own particular responsibilities, you'll let us know as soon as you can of additional gaps that you see. One particular gap that I'm concerned about is the fact that we have many uninsured disaster victims.

We have people who were working at the site who never had insurance, a lot of the low income workers that we're now hearing about who didn't have insurance connected with their jobs or very limited insurance, if any. We have others who are insured, but whose limits for mental health coverage are insignificant to the task that they and their families face.

So I know that New York State and New York City have asked the administration for the flexibility to enroll disaster victims and families into Medicaid and CHIP without the usual burdens or income regulations. And I think, Mr. Chairman, that the state and city's request to be able to open up Medicaid and CHIP at this time is something we also ought to look at and move whatever waivers are necessary as quickly as possible with Secretary Thompson.

I also am hoping that we have a specific response for our firefighters and our emergency workers. And, Dr. Kelly, I've spoken with Commission Van Essen (ph) about the needs that you're going to be facing, and one of the hallmarks of the firefighter family is that in the past, much of the work, the counseling, and support has come from within that family, and the resources are clearly not there, given the magnitude of the disaster.

So one of the ways that I hope we can be helpful is to provide you and the leadership of the department with resources that you can integrate into your already existing services so that there is that, as much as possible, continuity of caring and concern that has been a real characteristic of what you've done in the past. But we'll need your guidance on that, and whatever resources that you need, if you can help us identify them, then we can try through FEMA and other agencies to get those to you as soon as possible.

I also am concerned about the impact on our hospitals, Dr. Eth. I know that Saint Vincent's and others were ready and on the front lines, and we need to know specifically what additional resources you will require going forward, because one of the points that has been made this morning is how providing that counseling and support in the proximity, where people are, where they're used to coming, is a benefit that has psychological implications. And so what we need to do to back up Saint Vincent's is something that I hope you'll let us know. We're asking the other hospitals, and, clearly, everyone is trying to identify those needs.

With respect to the schools, I want to thank Dr. Pfeiffer and her colleagues for really being there for the teachers and the students and the parents. I visited PS3, and they've taken in PS150 and 89, and on the surface, they're really performing magnificently. The work that was done with respect to the evacuations was nearly miraculous with not a child lost or injured.

But I spent some time talking to the children, the elementary school children, and they just need to talk, and they need people to listen to them. And, you know, one little girl said she was so glad that her mother was home, because her mother was a flight attendant. Another little boy talked about how their family had a really good friend who was a firefighter who had been lost.

And the teachers need more help so that these kids can just talk, and I think that's something we have to look at very closely. Chancellor (ph) Levy (ph) has been working with Secretary Paige, and the Department of Education has been tremendous in providing us additional funding.

So I think, Mr. Chairman, that we should, on kind of a crash basis, in a way, try to come up with a list of needs that we've heard about -- and Senator Warner certainly mentioned those in Virginia as well -- so that we can try to come up with whatever amendment, authorization, appropriation language that we need as soon as possible. And, certainly, I know the city and the state stand ready to help get that done.

I want to again thank the witnesses very much for sharing their personal experiences as well as their professional recommendations.

KENNEDY: Thank you very much. We will follow up that excellent recommendation.

The hearing, I believe, has clarified a number of the issues and laid out a very clear responsibility for Congress and the administration. There's a consensus among our experts that large numbers of people, particularly children, are at risk for serious disabling psychiatric illness as the result of the terrorist attacks. And it's clear that treatments can be effective, but providing the victims of the silent scourge with help they need and deserve will strain the nation's mental health system to the limit.

Preparation for future attacks is also a critical need. A significant part of the disaster relief funds that will be provided to states and localities should be allocated to both short-term and long-term mental health services. These services should include not only the treatment, but assuring that people who need treatment are able to obtain it. Private insurers can do their part by assuring appropriate services without artificial limits.

Training funds are also needed to see that mental health professionals have the special knowledge to treat disaster victims, and those likely to have contact with people suffering serious symptoms will encourage them to seek treatment. Schools and parents, in particular, need to understand what symptoms they should watch for. State and local mental health authorities outside the areas most immediately affected also need assistance to plan and coordinate for the future.

Preparation for possible future disasters is especially important. Every state and locality should have a specific plan to deal with mental health needs after future attacks. Every school system needs a plan as well, and we need programs to inform parents and the general public promptly about responses to psychological impacts of future disasters.

Parents, teachers, and day care workers need information on how to talk to the children about these terrible events. As Senator Clinton has pointed out, we need a substantial increase in the number of people trained to provide necessary services.

So these services can only be provided at the local level, but this is a national struggle and demands national leadership. The federal government has a critical role in supporting and developing appropriate responses, and I intend to work with my colleagues in Congress to make sure that we do our part.

We will be calling on this panel for the recommendations to help us develop the proposal for next week and also for your recommendations in terms of the programs to deal with this problem in the time ahead. And this will be a continuing and ongoing involvement, and we hope that you'll feel free to contact our committee with any additional recommendations or suggestions that you've had from this morning that we haven't been able to reach.

We have just been notified by the Senate floor that there's a vote in progress, so we will recess the hearing with our gratitude and thanks to all of our panelists.

Thank you very much.

U.S. SENATOR KENT CONRAD (D-ND) HOLDS HEARING ON THE ECONOMY IN THE AFTERMATH OF THE SEPTEMBER 11TH ATTACKS, 10/2/2001

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. One of the challenges that I think we face is the new required assessment that we're undergoing that is, I guess, loosely referred to as homeland defense or homeland security. I don't believe we yet know what the costs will be. We've never faced anything quite like this. There's a very long list of concerns that need to be addressed, whether it's protecting our water and food supplies, protecting our pipelines, protecting our energy infrastructure, protecting our transportation infrastructure.

There's a very long list that I think rightly will demand our attention. And in some respects it's going to be a -- it will be a long-term commitment, but I believe infrastructure spending will have to go up. I don't see any way around it if we're going to be able to protect the American public to the extent we all want.

And this is probably an unfair question to ask you, because I'm reminded by Senator Domenici's comment -- you're on that side of the table and we're on this side of the table. But what is the impact of infrastructure spending in terms of its stimulative effects and the speed at which it can be delivered compared to simply tax-cutting stimulus? Is there any research or opinion that you could share with us on that?

BAILY: Well, I think you can get a tax cut out there more quickly. I guess the simple wisdom is that spending has a slightly bigger effect, because as each dollar gets out there right away, that's GDP right away and then it has some multiplier effect after that. Whereas, a tax cut, not all of it gets spent.

So I think that was behind Chairman Conrad's view that maybe some of the stimulus should be geared towards the spending side. But as I said, the offsetting there is to make sure that the money's well spent and you can spend it quickly. And I think that's a little bit harder. Now, in this particular case, there may be a lot of things that we know that we have to do, that we have to go out and do to improve our security, and so that may again affect the decision we make.

KRUEGER: Well, I would also just say I would draw the distinction between security and infrastructure spending designed to try to improve economic growth in the future. For example, I do think that we have a big need in this country to spend more on schools. As much as I feel that need, I don't think that that is the answer to the current crisis. And especially when one thinks about construction. I think there is going to be a lot of construction, especially in the Northeast, and I think one concern I would have about certain types of infrastructure projects would be that they might lead to imbalances. It might delay construction in some areas, for example. So I would just add that.

CLINTON: One thing that would be helpful, because we're reading a lot in the press today about the Japanese experience with deflation, and I know we don't have the time left to really go into this in any depth, but could you briefly describe, first of all, what are the structural problems that they have been coping with for a decade without any real success, best we can tell? And what is it that's different about our experience and their experience so that the fear that some economists are expressing that we may be going into an entirely different economic situation, closer to deflation, closer to the Japanese experience, which would require different kinds of responses than what we're talking about if we think we're in a short-term slowdown or recession, that we can work our way out of and get back into positive growth? I mean how should we think about that?

BAILY: I believe we're in a very different situation than Japan. There is a similarity in that there is a wealth effect and so the decline in the stock market and to the extent that that affects housing wealth too, that is going to affect people's wealth and going to make them a bit more reluctant to spend. So we are seeing that in the U.S. economy, and that certainly was part of the Japanese experience. And the loss of stock market wealth in Japan is much greater than anything we've seen here and I hope we don't see that value. And they also had a collapse of the real estate market.

Now beyond there, I think there are huge differences. First of all, they've never really tackled their financial institutions, and they continue to have problems with their financial institutions. I think many of their financial institutions are sort of on the verge of collapse, and they've never been able to face up to the bad loan problems, to deal with it, to try to close down some of the banks that needed to be closed down and to restore confidence in the financial sector.

Secondly, their labor market is much less flexible than the U.S., so there's -- Americans are used to changing jobs, and it's not great to lose your job, but in the U.S. people, in some sense -- the institutions are there, people move, people find new jobs. There's much more rigidity in the Japanese labor market.

Their investment decisions traditionally were not made on the basis of profitability. They sort of expanded capacity without looking adequately at profitability. Their industries -- we know their sort of strong competitive industries, the ones that we compete with, like autos and machine tools. But much of their economy was not very competitive and, again, rather rigid. They have a rigid. They have a rigid set of regulations, local regulations .

So I would be reassuring in the sense of saying I think our economy is much better able to handle this kind of shock than is Japan's. There's a little bit of similarity but not that much.

KRUEGER: I would concur completely. I would also add to what Martin said. I think a number of the Japanese problems are microeconomic in nature. They just have a very different setup to their economy, and I think that makes it much less dynamic, much less able to adjust to new circumstances.

And another big difference, I believe, is that the age structure is different. The Japanese population is older than the American population. They don't have very much of a pension system. And when interest rates drop people there seem to save quite a bit more. It doesn't seem to stimulate spending. So I think we're in a different situation.

Japan serves as a reminder that capitalist economies don't always grow and grow, but I wouldn't go very far with the parallel.

CLINTON: So you would not agree with those who suggest that the drop-off in consumer confidence and the underlying drop-off in demand that we've started seeing a year or so ago and in an accelerated way recently is not any structural problem or it doesn't reflect a structural problem in the economy?

KRUEGER: I would say, actually, what's quite remarkable is that consumer demand didn't drop off more in the U.S. in the last year. And I do think that consumer demand is a major concern, the major concern now, and I would think about elements of the stimulus package as addressing -- trying to address consumer jitters -- how do we restore confidence? But I don't think that we have a structural problem in terms of consumer demand.

CLINTON: Is there any economic theory or experience which suggests, and I know this kind of runs counter to all of the economic theory that I'm aware of, but that at some point there's a saturation that demand just hits a wall, that people just can't keep buying, they can't keep going out there, because for whatever reasons, on a personal or social level, it's just not attractive to them anymore? Is there any...

BAILY: I don't think so, in general, but I think the thing that we did see, we had such a strong boom that both on the investment side as well as on the consumer side there was a sense in which we were kind of overspent. And so some of this downturn that we've seen was a reaction to the fact that we had bought as many computers as we could possibly use and that we bought as many SUVs as we could drive, and we were in for a correction.

I don't actually think there's a saturation point. I think Americans know how to spend. That's one thing we know how to do. And I think once we've sort of worked our way out of this downturn, we'll get back. So I don't see it as a long-term structural problem

Can I also clarify, if you'll give me 10 seconds, I made a comment earlier about sometimes I think the consumer confidence is overrated as an indicator. And what I meant by that it's not that I don't think consumer confidence is important; it's very important. But we measure it through a couple of surveys -- the Conference Board and the Michigan Survey -- and those give us a window into consumer confidence. I don't think they're 100 percent reliable as to what consumers are actually going to do.

CONRAD: Very well. I'd like to, just before we end, ask you about something that Secretary Benson told me when he was secretary of the Treasury in the Clinton administration. He told me that -- we had lunch one day down at the Treasury, and he told me that they had done a calculation at the time, and he indicated that for every 1 percent reduction in interest rates, that took a debt load off the economy of roughly $20 billion. Have you ever made a calculation like that or been aware of a calculation done like that?

The point that he was making to me is that the importance of fiscal responsibility to the functioning of the economy. And to the extent that you maintain fiscal responsibility and lower interest rates, you actually give more lift to the economy than almost any tax cut than anybody is talking about, because in effect that is a tax cut -- has the stimulative effect of a tax cut. Have any of you ever done a calculation like that or does it sound reasonable to you that a 1 percent difference in interest rates would mean that much in terms of less of a debt load on the economy?

BAILY: I think it is reasonable. I mean I -- we would talk -- when I was in the administration, we certainly would talk about those calculations. And if you basically look at the size of the debt and how much interest is paid and then you see how much a reduction in interest rate would do for you in terms of lowering the debt burden, that's the kind of number you come out with. So I think that's right.

Now, just honesty compels me to point out that I'm a big believer in fiscal discipline, but lower interest rates do cut two ways. There are people in our economy that receive interest.

CONRAD: Right.

BAILY: A lot of older people who are living on...

CONRAD: So there's a cross-cutting effect there.

BAILY: There is a cross-cutting effect there.

CONRAD: But on balance, that lifting of debt burden...

BAILY: On balance, I think it's a positive, yes.

CONRAD: Dr. Krueger?

KRUEGER: I would just add there's certainly mechanical help that the budget has because of lower interest payments in the future. I suspect, however, that the big boost that we got from lower interest rates in the early '90s would not be the same today. Some of that came from consumer refinancing of mortgages. A lot of that's taken place already. We were also starting from higher interest rates than where we are currently, so I would suspect that the number is probably smaller today.

CLINTON: Mr. Chairman, could I just ask one other sort of speculative question? I support the chairman's continuing concern about fiscal responsibility and discipline for the long run, and we're in a position now where this additional stimulus, whatever it is, $50 billion to $100 billion, is certainly going to push us back into deficit. There's no -- I mean, let's -- there's no, I don't think, any way around it, is there? Am I mistaken? So this time next year we're going to be -- we're running a deficit, OK. What then?

Assume that we go forward with this stimulus. I have less confidence, frankly, that this stimulus at this time, given the mood of the country, is going to do what people hope it will do. And so we put it out there holiday season, whatever it is we decide to do and see what happens. But we know one thing that will happen: We'll be back in deficit. Then what? How do you see us recovering back to the extent of moving towards fiscal responsibility again, trying to deal with our long-term problems? Do you have any final thoughts on that?

KRUEGER: Yes. I think your diagnosis is right. I have two responses to it, and it's a lot easier for me to respond from this table.

KRUEGER: One is to revisit the tax cuts that have already been enacted, especially the big cuts in the our-years. The second, which is even easier to say from this side than the other side, is to look at some of the entitlement programs and to look at Medicare. And looking at the long-term budget, Medicare, I think, is a much bigger concern than social security. How do we restrain the growth in costs of Medicare yet provide sufficient protection for the elderly for health care risks?

BAILY: Well, I think as long as the economy recovers, and I'm optimistic that it will, not in the very short run but over the next year I think it will recover because I think the fundamentals of the economy are strong, then I think we have choices again. But I said that what Alan said, I agree with what Alan said. We should revisit those tax cuts and see if we can still afford them, because the budget arithmetic has changed.

CONRAD: Maybe I can just go to that question as we end here. We've been working, actually, since the morning after the attack on reassessing our situation and where we're headed. And in many ways, this chart sums up where I think we are. And what this chart does is it looks at our trust funds, it looks at the revisions that have been made to defense spending and to the rebuilding effort. It looks at the airline assistance package, other disaster aid that we have done in previous years. It extends the expiring tax provision. It looks at the other budget resolution policies that have not yet been enacted but were in the budget that was passed earlier this year by both house of Congress. It looks at a possible $60 billion tax and spending stimulus for 2002. It looks at the economic adjustment, because we have a sharper downturn than was earlier forecast. So it looks at all of those changes.

And then it looks at not only the effect on 2001 but 2002 out to 2011. And the conclusion is very sobering. Not only do we see we've got substantial red ink in this year and next year and in fact that we'd be in deficit next year, on a unified basis we'd be in deficit, but also it shows that we would be using over this 10-year period $373 billion of payroll taxes from Medicare to fund other government programs and almost a trillion dollars of social security payroll taxes to fund other government operations, for a total of $1.3 trillion being used of payroll taxes to fund other government operations.

This is much more than a short-term dip. This is a very fundamental change in policy, taking money from people on the basis that it's used to pay benefits and secure the future of those programs and then taking substantial amounts of it and using it to fund tax cuts and other government programs. To me, this is something that requires our very serious attention as we move forward.

Clearly, we've got to do whatever it takes now in the short term to defend this nation. Obviously, that's a long-term concern as well. But the immediate urgent need is for these additional defense dollars to do whatever it takes to defend ourselves, to take the attack to those who have perpetrated criminal acts on this country, to rebuild. But we have also got to keep our eye on the ball on the long-term fiscal condition of the country.

These are my calculations, and I'm happy to stand by them, have my credibility attached to them. I believe we've got a very serious long-term problem here. I believe it's totally inappropriate to be taking -- in the long-term, to be taking payroll tax money and using it for other purposes, especially in the light of the fact the baby boomers start to retire in 10 years.

I don't know if you'd want to react to that, and, again, I'm not attributing these numbers to anybody else. These are numbers that I believe are in the ball park of what we face, but I'd just be interested in your observations.

BAILY: Well, I basically agree with you. I think that we do have a long-run fiscal problem, which is the baby boom generation, Medicare and social security. So the long-run fiscal situation of the U.S. is not good. I think even now we are borrowing from overseas substantially, so that's another sign that we're spending or consuming more than we're producing. So for all those reasons, I think it's important to increase national saving and not to decrease it. And that's why saving those social security surpluses or even running additional surpluses is helpful for our economy and will stand us in better stead going forward. If we can pay down the debt, we'll be in a much better position to deal with the baby boom generation. So I agree with you.

CONRAD: Dr. Krueger?

KRUEGER: Well, I agree also. I think one thing which your chart demonstrates is how variable and unpredictable our budget forecasts are. And I think it's important to bear that in mind when we do budgeting.

One small point I would make, though, which would make...

CONRAD: Can I just stop you on that point and say, you know, I don't know how many times I tried to warn our colleagues, how many times I've put up that fan chart from the Congressional Budget Office about the uncertainty of the forecast that we were using when we were writing the previous budget. I must have used that chart 50 times here in this committee and the floor of the Senate, in the Finance Committee. Because I used to be responsible for forecasting the revenue of my state, and I used to have to forecast for 30 months, and I knew how uncertain those forecasts are. You're talking about 10 years. It is so uncertain, and just very small changes now make huge differences over time. That's what we're seeing now. So, unfortunately, I believe the budget policy we put in place earlier this year was fatally flawed when it was done. I thought the tax cut -- while I supported a significant tax cut, I thought the one that we put in place was simply unaffordable. It was too large, it was too risky. And I think that's all proven to be the case, unfortunately.

None of that helps us now. I mean we've got to go back to the drawing boards and reconsider previous actions in every part of the budget and think very carefully about their implications for the economy now. This is not just a matter of some green eye shade concept of, "Gee, it's important to maintain integrity of trust funds." Absolutely, that's important, but it has a much bigger significance, and that is the effect on the economy.

And, Dr. Krueger, you had additional thoughts you wanted to...

KRUEGER: Well, I had trouble seeing the exact numbers, although I could tell that some of them were red. One small comment I was going to recommend is to try to scale them by GDP, which might make the situation look a little bit less dire.

But I wanted to conclude by saying I was on CNN last week, and they asked, "Well, what do you see as the bright -- what's on the positive side?" And I think there are some things on the positive side. One of the things on the positive side is that we entered this year with a surplus, and the fiscal discipline in the past has put us in a much better position to handle this kind of crisis than where we were before. And then...

CONRAD: Hopefully there's a lesson in that...

KRUEGER: For the future, I agree with that.

CONRAD: ... going forward, that fiscal discipline in the past really paid enormous dividends now. My God, can you imagine the situation we would have been in if we hadn't gotten our fiscal house in order by the actions we took in '93 and '97, if we hadn't taken those actions, what kind of circumstance we'd be in today?

KRUEGER: We would certainly be looking at a lot more red.

Then the second issue I would raise on the positive side is that the Federal Reserve Board had already started lowering rates. And the effect of interest rates on the economy take place with a lag, so that was already in motion, which is positive.

And I think another thing that's positive is that Congress is acting quite quickly to respond to the current economic downturn. In the past, the problem with stimulus packages has been that they're enacted after the economy has already begun to recover. And I think that the Congress should be commended for taking such quick action in this case.

CONRAD: Thank you very much. Thank you again for being here. Thank you for your patience. Thank you for all of the effort and energy you've put into your remarks here today. We appreciate it very much.

"Larry King Live," CNN, 10/5/2001

LARRY KING, HOST: Tonight: Can tragedy transform a city, a nation, a world? We'll talk about loss and recovery, hurt and hope.

Joining us, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York. With her, New York's senior senator, Democrat Chuck Schumer. And her majesty Queen Noor of Jordan.

We'll also talk with World Trade Center survivor Manu Dhingra; he walked down more than 80 flights after being badly burned. John Sherry didn't make it home on September 11; his brother Robert shares his story and some remarkable photos from ground zero. And Lisa Beamer, her husband Todd one of the heroes of United Flight 93; her strength has inspired everybody. Another inspiration: Michael Hingson, blind since birth, climbed down more than 70 World Trade Center floors with his guide dog Roselle.

And later, Liza Minnelli with a musical tribute to New York, New York.

All next on LARRY KING LIVE.

We were in Washington the first two nights of this week, and the past three in New York. And tonight, a very special show. Three distinguished guests who'll be with us all the way, and then victims, survivors and others will be coming by, and we'll be talking to all of them.

Senator Clinton, we'll start with you. Have we come to grips with it? Has it settled in?

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Oh, Larry, I don't think it ever can settle in. I don't think that this incomprehensible tragedy will ever be something that will settle in, and that we can settle ourselves with.

But, there has been so much done to try to help the survivors and the families, and to begin the rebuilding effort that there's a lot of work to do. And I think in some way that's helping all of us keep going forward.

KING: But a piece missing, right Senator Schumer?

SEN. CHARLES SCHUMER (D), NEW YORK: No question. We're never going to be the same; we're never going to be whole again -- New Yorkers, Americans too.

This is -- I think every one of us in a certain way feels violated. Our country felt safe and impregnable, and now we don't anymore.

KING: And how does Queen Noor feel? Queen of another country, but an American by birth.

HER MAJESTY QUEEN NOOR OF JORDAN: Well, I was in Brooklyn today, where my family emigrated over 100 years ago, and I went to see the Arab-American community there, who have not only suffered the grief and loss of the World Trade Center disaster, and rescue workers and policemen and others of Arab-American origin who passed away, but who also had stories of hope and faith to share. Jewish, Christian, Muslim Americans coming together to help one another through this very difficult time.

So I was agonized by their fear and insecurity -- the backlash. On the other hand, I think some of what we're talking about today -- some of that hope, and what will take us forward is evident in the way people have come together.

KING: Senator Clinton, are people -- are all people aware of help they can get?

CLINTON: No.

KING: New York is always -- I grew up here, I know New York helps.

CLINTON: New York does help. But we're finding that a lot of people still don't know where to go for help, or what help is available. I met today with a group of small business owners downtown in Tribeca who have opened up for business again, but no one is coming. They don't know whether they'll be able to keep their doors open. They need help right away.

We got them together with the SBA and the FEMA. You know, Chuck and I have been working very hard to make sure that the federal government and the city and the state are all coordinated so that whatever help is needed, we're going to try to provide it either through existing programs, or making programs to fit this particular situation, which is unprecedented in our country's history.

KING: Are you satisfied with what the United States government is doing?

SCHUMER: Oh, yes. The response that we have gotten from our colleagues, from one end to the other of this country has been amazing. The president has just been incredible.

I will never forget the moment -- never -- when we were in Oval Office, Hillary and I, and I made the pitch to him. I told him why New York needed an additional $20 billion, a huge sum. It was the day after the tragedy, we were all still emotional about it. And I said, Mr. President, we need an extra $20 billion. He said, New York needs an extra $20 billion? I was certain he'd say, well, let's study it, or let's start off with two or three. But he rose right to the occasion. He said New York needs an extra $20 billion, you got it.

I was so overwhelmed, I think there were tears in both of our eyes. I got up, and I was about -- we were both seated -- we were all seated -- I was about to hug him. Then I realize he was president, so I patted him on the shoulder. Don't hug a president.

CLINTON: But you know the president calls Chuck Ellis, because that's his middle name, which -- he was named for Ellis Island.

KING: He calls everybody by a different. What does he call you? Aha?

CLINTON: Aha, senator.

KING: You lived for a long time in a country where -- in an area of the world where terrorism was kind of commonplace. Any advice you can give to people who are now living with that?

NOOR: Yes, I have lived for a long time in a region that has been afflicted by -- and I think that is why the people of the region feel so strongly about what happened here, and share, and are also trying to reach out, and hoping and praying that this coming period will be one in which we can work together based on lessons learned from tragic experiences that highlight the importance of our working together, of our building coalitions of all sorts across the spectrum of cultures and faiths and all backgrounds.

KING: The purpose tonight is to bring together people who have been victims who survived, who have lost and have our three distinguished guests mingle and talk with them as millions of Americans do.

And we have one bit of news just in; I'd like you to comment. We have learned -- CNN has learned that known and suspected members of terrorist cells have been monitored in recent days in activities that mirror those taken by suspected hijackers preceding September 11. The sources stress there's no evidence of a specific threat, but in the words of one, the intelligence data adds to a sense of unease that something else might be going on.

What do you make of this?

SCHUMER: Well, you know, as we all know that bin Laden and al Qaeda and other terrorist groups didn't just have these 19 people, or even the 30 or 40 who supported them, but there are many more.

The one bit of good news which this sort of shows is, since September 11, the intelligence organizations around the world, even from countries that didn't cooperate with us at all before, who weren't friendly to us before, have really opened up. And if you talk to our top intelligence officials the amount of information that they are getting now compared to before September 11 is enormous.

And that may well help us thwart future attempts to do such dastardly things.

KING: So this information is a plus, in a sense?

CLINTON: Well, I think we have to recognize the reality of potential future attacks. And we're taking every action that we can possibly take to protect ourselves and to be vigilant.

I'm very supportive of the president and the administration seeking additional authority to conduct the surveillance that's needed in order to keep track of anyone who might possibly be connected to a terrorist network.

Having said that, I think that we all have to recognize, we can't live in fear. We cannot let the terrorists terrorize us; that is their objective. But we have to be vigilant, we have to look out for one another, we have to be much more aware of our surroundings than Americans have ever had to be before.

SCHUMER: But still on the -- you know, we had this horrible incident -- we are still a safe place in this country. And Hillary is exactly right. If we just hide under our desks or our tables, if people who were going to buy that car on September 10 and need that car, should go buy it. We have to move on with our lives. We'll never be the same, as we talked about earlier, but we can't sit in fear. Then they'll win.

KING: Tragically, your majesty, though, it often works, doesn't it -- terror. It does create fear; it does create unease; it does create what it intends to.

NOOR: Well, I wanted to add -- and this will answer that question, as well -- to the previous points, that one of the great opportunities provided is this cooperation, this international, now, coalition of sharing of information, of planning, looking ahead and trying to identify strategies for dealing with this kind of extremism and these kinds of incidents, and to do it together.

So I think that, in fact, instead of dividing, these actions have, in fact, begun to bring people together across national boundaries, across cultural boundaries. And the opposite of what was intended is going to be achieved if we continue to work in that direction.

KING: But if you don't, it does achieve, right?

NOOR: That's why we must sustain the effort of working together throughout the globe, not just to address what happened in the United States, but to see that as an attack against humanity, against all of us in the world.

KING: We're going to begin our series of dramatic guests, and have our panel question them as well. And we'll be right back; don't go away.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

KING: Do you feel a sense of pride as a New Yorker as to how all the people here have handled this?

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: Well, we all already knew that. Everybody in New York knew that we would pull together. We always pull together. You see snowstorms, hurricanes, it doesn't matter, you know. People will just jump out in the street and help you push your car out of a snowdrift. It's always been like that. And I was very happy to be a New Yorker every day of this, because everybody pulled together even more.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

KING: Welcome back to LARRY KING LIVE, with Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Senator Chuck Schumer, and Queen Noor of Jordan. Joining us now is Manu Dhingra, 27-year-old security trader, first of the surviving World Trade Center burn victims to come home from the Weill Cornell burn center. Thank you for coming, Manu. How are you, by the way?

MANU DHINGRA, WTC BURN VICTIM: (UNINTELLIGIBLE) spirits up, so everything is getting back to normal a little bit. Trying to...

KING: What happened to you? How did this happen?

DHINGRA: Luckily or unluckily, I was a little late to work that day. Going up to my office, just got even off the elevator and made a right turn in the tower one.

KING: What floor?

DHINGRA: On the 83rd floor. And that's when the first plane actually hit. And I guess, the fire found its way down the shafts and the elevator doors just exploded, and I was just caught in a ball of fire.

KING: You were in a ball of fire?

DHINGRA: Yes.

KING: So you were burning?

DHINGRA: I was -- I mean, I thought I was dead. But it lasted a few seconds. I guess if I was on the elevator door, it would have been pretty much over. But it lasted a few seconds, and after it was over, I just noticed my arms were peeling, my face, my back, legs. I just found some energy to run into my office and ask for help, but nobody was going to come up that high. And everybody started evacuating by that time, so my coworkers kind of forced me to walk down with them all the stairs.

KING: And you put the fire out?

DHINGRA: The fire had kind of like gone by itself. I was wearing like cotton clothes -- it was -- all my clothes were ripped all they way.

KING: Were you in pain?

DHINGRA: Oh, I was in so much pain.

KING: How did you get down 83 floors?

DHINGRA: I wanted to sit down a lot. I was very dehydrated at the time, but everybody was very calm on the stairwell, because nobody knew at that time the buildings were going to collapse. So they let all the injured people through, and somebody was nice enough to give me water to get down the stairs. And I finally made it down, I got an ambulance, and didn't walk for two and a half weeks after that.

SCHUMER: Did most of the people up that high get down in your building?

DHINGRA: Everybody up until I guess where the plane hit, I think it was in the '90s, early '90s, got OK. Everybody after that didn't make it, I don't think.

KING: Where did you suffer the worst burns?

DHINGRA: My arms and my back. Back, they waited out to see if I needed surgery on, but they decided that it was healing on its own. The arms, they had to graft, they took skin from my legs to kind of graft the arms.

KING: People are amazing, aren't they, Hillary in times of...

CLINTON: Well, it is amazing, and it's a real tribute to your spirit and courage to keep going. And the people around you, who I understand kind of helped keep you going, and kept urging you on.

DHINGRA: I think -- I think at a time when you realize that, you know, you should be dead, and you are not dead, then I think anybody in that situation would be in -- do the same thing and try to find a way to survive.

CLINTON: When did your family find out? How were you able to reach people?

DHINGRA: I was able to like give my phone number to my friends and made sure that they contacted my parents, because that was the most important thing to me, that even more than being OK, is that they know that I got out at that time.

KING: Before the queen might have a question, let me -- earlier this week, we went to New York's Weill Cornell burn center, a division of New York hospital. It's the biggest and busiest facility of its kind in the United States. It's treating some of the victims of the world tragedy as we speak.

One of them we met with was Persar Nandan (ph). He just stepped into an elevator when a plane hit his building. Listen to his story.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

PERSAR NANDAN, WTC BURN VICTIM: So everything (UNINTELLIGIBLE) normal (UNINTELLIGIBLE). Before (UNINTELLIGIBLE) moved, I heard a boom, and then, debris started falling on us, (UNINTELLIGIBLE) started to fall us on, and sparks. We were all on fire.

KING: How did you get out?

NANDAN: Well, that's the point I'm coming to. So we were, all the ladies were screaming and everything, and I came to a point, like this is it. But I saw a lady, a tall, big (UNINTELLIGIBLE) lady, and I don't know how she got her fingers between the doors, and she pries open it like that.

KING: Elevator doors?

NANDAN: Yeah, the elevator doors. (UNINTELLIGIBLE), but I was all on fire. As soon as I got out of the elevator, I tried to get the fire out of my head and my hands, my shirt was ablaze too. But I couldn't get it out. So I rolled on the mats (UNINTELLIGIBLE). But I finally got the fire out of me, and I looked and I saw nobody.

KING: You were all alone.

NANDAN: They were all gone, and there was smoke, smoke. So I took some time to come to my senses. Then, when I looked, I saw a hand in a door. And (UNINTELLIGIBLE) and the person went down, so I said there is the best way. I headed toward it, I opened the door and I saw a stairway, and I started to get down.

KING: How was he treated, doctor?

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: Well, when he first got here, he was actually having trouble with breathing and he was on the respirator. And he was -- so he was treated to maintain the function of his lungs, and then we took him into what we call the tank room, and cleaned up his wounds, took off the dead tissue and so forth, and put him in a white cream that we use, an antibiotic cream.

KING: Were you in a lot of pain?

NANDAN: Yes, I was. My whole skin was ablaze, blazing fire. A lot of pain, a lot of pain.

KING: You were conscious?

NANDAN: I was, I was conscious.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

KING: Queen Noor, you were going to have something to say to Manu or ask him?

NOOR: I understand you are going to the hospital on a daily basis now. Has this experience motivated you to reach out perhaps more than usual to help others?

DHINGRA: Well, I thank God, Larry. You went to the hospital, you saw -- I mean, a lot of those people, some of them are a lot worse off than me, but they are fighting, and they are going to be OK. And I just want to like, I got out before them, I just want to make sure to see them get out and get on with their lives also.

KING: I think all of us, one of our big fears is burning, don't you think?

SCHUMER: Sure.

KING: The thought of horror.

CLINTON: And you were saying, we were watching the video, that people on the first floor were burned so badly. That's something that I hadn't ever read reported from the tragedy, because the fireball went down the elevator shaft.

DHINGRA: It found any kind of shaft it could to get through.

(CROSSTALK)

SCHUMER: The evacuation was orderly?

DHINGRA: It was because nobody had any idea that the building was going to collapse. So everybody was very nice. I mean, they helped me.

KING: You didn't think it was going to implode, so you...

DHINGRA: Right. I mean, nobody knew.

KING: Did you know a plane had hit?

DHINGRA: No, I thought it was just -- I mean, I thought it was a bomb. I mean, honestly, those were my first instincts about this.

NOOR: How do you look at the rest of your life?

DHINGRA: In a different way, of course. You know, nothing ever will ever be the same.

But I just would like to make one comment, if I could. I'm in an individual of Indian descent, and a lot of the people I worked with in my office were Middle Eastern and Asian descent, and these people who committed this terrible crime did not discriminate. And recently in this country, there have been some crimes committed against certain groups, and I just wanted to comment, that if we have one thing in common, and that is that we are all American first, and we shouldn't just rush to judgment about certain things.

SCHUMER: And you know, that is so important for people to understand, the overwhelming majority of Arab-Americans, Muslim Americans, hated this crime, just as everybody else did.

DHINGRA: And if it wasn't for some of my friends who are of Middle Eastern descent I wouldn't be here, because they helped me down the stairs.

SCHUMER: And you know, it is un-American to discriminate against someone because of their religion. That's what the terrorists do, that's not what we do.

NOOR: Thank you so much for contributing that, it's terribly important.

KING: What saved you? Getting to the hospital fast enough?

DHINGRA: Yeah, that was, that was -- I mean, once I knew that I was like alive, I just wanted to get help as much as quickly as possible, and just to feel safe. You know, and luckily I found an ambulance, and took me to the Cornell medical center. And the doctors there are amazing.

KING: You still have pain?

DHINGRA: A lot of discomfort, but, you know, medication helps to sleep at night.

NOOR: And you think you were in the same ambulance as the gentleman we just saw on television?

DHINGRA: I think so, I think I was.

(CROSSTALK)

KING: Let me get a break...

DHINGRA: About a year, about a year I should be like fully healed. Yes, hopefully.

KING: Manu, you stay, and when we come back we will be joined by Robert Sherry. He lost his brother John. He has got quite a story to tell and amazing pictures, too. We will be right back.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

KING: How has this changed you?

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: In every conceivable way. I can't express the depression I have been in since then, along with everybody else. I mean, it has been a very difficult time. And how do you solve it? How do you find somebody who's done something like this?

(END VIDEO CLIP)

KING: Joining us now at our bureau in New York is Robert Sherry. Robert lost his brother John at the World Trade Center. John worked on the 84th floor of the Number 2 building.

What were the circumstances -- how did you know -- find out about this?

ROBERT SHERRY, LOST BROTHER AT WTC: The morning of the tragedy I had stayed home, was going to get into work a little late. And I was on the phone with a customer. A customer had informed me that the -- one of the towers had been hit. At that point I dropped the phone, and I said, my brother is in that building. I called his office and got no answer.

KING: You turn on the TV?

SHERRY: Yeah, I turned on the TV. Called his office, got no answer. Called my mom, and I forgot which building it was in. I knew he was on the 84th floor, he worked for Euro Brokers.

I started to panic. I didn't know where to go, who to call, obviously, with this happening. I just kept calling his phone. At this time I had seen the most horrific act of terrorism that anyone could ever imagine, with the second plane coming in and hitting the building.

KING: You watched that live?

SHERRY: I watched it live. It's like, you know, seeing somebody hurt your family, kill your family; and it really hurt.

My brother was planning a vacation with his wife, and he sent her off the night before to Scotland with the two boys, James and John. She never felt right about it. And they had never been apart for any length of time. And Missy (ph), John's wife, had also been watching CNN in Scotland and called my brother.

My brother's a very relaxed person. They call him all-star on his desk.

KING: There you see his picture.

SHERRY: Five years ago.

They called him an all-star at his desk, all people from Euro Brokers.

KING: Liked him.

SHERRY: He never panicked, and his job was extremely stressful, as all bond brokers, screaming all day on the phone, get the job done, feed their families, go home.

KING: Were you close?

SHERRY: Extremely close.

KING: Are your parents living?

SHERRY: My parents are.

KING: How are they handling this?

SHERRY: Today was a tough day. I think the toughest part for everybody is closure.

KING: You went to ground zero.

SHERRY: I went to ground zero yesterday.

KING: What was that like for you?

SHERRY: It was a war zone. Two months ago, sitting in the house watching TV, terrorist acts can happen anywhere in the world and it never affected us. My 8-year-old son said to me, dad, where is that? And I just was oblivious to it -- didn't pay attention to it. And I said thank God we're Americans, we live here, that will never happen here.

KING: You took pictures of that, right? We're going to show some of the pictures you took.

SHERRY: I did. You know, my nephews need something to remember my brother by, and this may not be it but...

KING: You haven't been there, have you?

DHINGRA: No, I haven't.

KING: With all the rest -- have you been there?

NOOR: I have not been there.

KING: Of course, Chuck and I was (sic) there the other day, and the sense was loss tremendous. But you -- did you feel -- you were standing where your brother was.

SHERRY: I was with my -- two of my four sisters, and it was complete silence for a good hour and a half. We just stood there.

NOOR: How is your brother's wife, and how are his children doing?

SHERRY: My sister-in-law is an extremely strong person. She's got a shell of armor. And she's given me a tremendous amount of hope at first. The strength for her children, the support from the town we live in -- Rockville Centre, small town on Long Island -- got hit pretty hard.

KING: Twenty people in that town were killed. The town has raised money. Also some 300 businesses and individuals are pledging to give victims' families free services, right?

SHERRY: That's correct; from plumbers, electricians, gardeners.

KING: You're on a program called Friends of Rockville Centre, right?

SHERRY: Yes. A close friend of mine, my brother's and family, Bill Hogan (ph), Greg Diverna (ph), quite a few other people in Rockville Centre -- Mayor Murray had decided, let's do something for the families. And they raised over -- $100,000 dollars was committed to...

KING: This is for both, and the panel can jump in: Are you angry?

DHINGRA: I'm not angry at all, I'm just -- it does not help me anyway, because I'm just trying to get better. And it just will get in the way of anything.

SHERRY: I feel the same exact way. I'm not angry; I want peace. People tell me you're at different stages; I know where I'm at. Maybe that stage will come. Just the outpouring of support from people, making me feel good.

KING: Senators, what...

CLINTON: I was in Rockville and went to the high school, South Side,

SHERRY: Where I graduated from.

CLINTON: Did you graduate...

SHERRY: Yes.

CLINTON: And I met with a couple of the students who had lost their parents, and one of the teachers -- a young teacher who had just gotten married and lost her husband. And I met with about 100 of the students.

I was so impressed with those young people. You know, the thoughtfulness and concerned questions that they posed to me, it was something that, you know, just impressed me and made me very proud, because I know how hard-hit the community was. But the way that people are supporting each other and handling it, and using their energy to be positive, not to be filled with, you know, the kind of anger that could eat away at your insides and turn you against each other, is very important to see.

(CROSSTALK)

SCHUMER: ... that is -- Rockville Centre is a great place. I always march every year in the St. Patrick's Day parade there. And it is a place where people come together naturally.

But what this incident -- this horrible, horrible thing has done, is it's brought us all together in communities. Our neighborhood -- we lost 11 firefighters in the Brooklyn neighborhood I live in. Every night there are still people there and bringing food and consoling the firefighters who are left.

You know, some -- out of this awful tragedy, some good has happened. And the good is...

(CROSSTALK)

KING: ... about New York?

NOOR: Well, there's that, and I was going to say, also, do your communities now feel a little more connected to the rest of the world? Tragically, in this way to, as you put it earlier, what is affecting other people's lives...

KING: You have a bond, right?

(CROSSTALK)

SHERRY: Absolutely. I would never look...

(CROSSTALK)

NOOR: ... perhaps a little more interested in understanding more about what's going on in the rest of the world?

SHERRY: Absolutely.

KING: Robert, good luck.

SHERRY: Thank you very much.

KING: And Manu, good luck.

(CROSSTALK)

KING: When we come back, two people who have been on this show quite a bit, Lisa Beamer whose husband helped send a plane down in Pennsylvania, and helped save lives in Washington, and Michael Hingson, blind since birth. He'll be here with his dog. Don't go away.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

KING: What's business been like?

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: Oh, it took a huge nose dive at first. At first, it was like -- but, and then, when people started petering in, it was like group therapy, everybody wants to tell their story, everybody wants to say where they were and wants to tell you how decimated things are. And it really, you know, I did the best I could with that, I asked them how they felt and all that, but...

KING: Bartenders have to do that.

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: Oh, yeah, that's pretty good.

KING: Psychology.

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: Oh, but yeah. There was a guy who came in once and he said he had 19 funerals to go to. And I -- I know. I -- I was just shocked.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

KING: Tomorrow night, scenes from around New York, from ground zero, from the burn center, from just ordinary people on a special edition of "LARRY KING WEEKEND." Sunday night, Shimon Peres, foreign minister of Israel will be with us, Bob Woodward of the "Washington Post."

Tonight, we are spending the evening with Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton and Senator Chuck Schumer, Democrats of New York, and Her Majesty Queen Noor of Jordan, and victims. We are now joined by Lisa Beamer, the husband of Todd Beamer, one of the heroes of United flight 93. You have all seen Lisa on this program many times, and you saw her in a special box the night the president delivered his speech in Congress. She is expecting their third child in January.

And Michael Hingson, blind since birth, he was guided down from the 78th floor of the World Trade Tower by his dog Roselle and a colleague, and Michael, like Lisa, has also been on this program before.

How do you hold up, Lisa? I mean, every time I see you, you look like -- how do you do this? You look radiant.

LISA BEAMER, HUSBAND WAS FLIGHT 93 HERO: Well, I have said before, there is a lot of times when I don't look radiant throughout the day. You know, I'm an emotional person like everybody else, and I'm suffering, grieving, like every human being, but I do have that bigger picture perspective that my faith in God gives me that lets me know that God knew that Todd was going to get on that plane that day, and he let him get on it anyway, knowing what that was going to mean for Todd and knowing what it was going to mean for our family.

And he has a plan -- he had a plan for Todd that resulted in good, and has a plan for me that's going to result in good.

KING: The fact that he was a hero, does that surprise you?

BEAMER: No. I actually didn't know what his role in that plane was for three days. And a lot of people asked me what I thought he did, and I said I thought that he acted, and I said I thought he remained calm, and I thought he maintained his faith, and I thought he had his family in his mind. And when I heard the results of that telephone call with the GT operator, all of those things were confirmed.

KING: The operator called -- you didn't speak to him, but the operator -- he reached the GT operator and told her everything that happened, right?

KING: Almost blow-by-blow, right?

BEAMER: Yes, she gave me a 15-minute phone call, that things that she talked to in about for the last 15 minutes of the flight before he got up and took action, so I have a really detailed account of what happened.

KING: Before our guests have questions, Michael, those who don't know or may not have seen you, you walked down 78 floors. What kind of work did you do?

MICHAEL HINGSON, BLIND SURVIVOR OF WTC: I worked for -- and I still work for a company called Quantum ATL. I have managed the sales organization for channel sales in New York and New Jersey.

KING: Do you work with Braille?

HINGSON: Some. And talking computers.

KING: And...

HINGSON: And a lot of customers

KING: And you have been blind since birth, right?

HINGSON: Yes.

KING: OK. And Roselle and you went down 78 floors.

HINGSON: Yes.

KING: What did you hear, what did you think was happening? You can't see, what did you think and feel?

HINGSON: You didn't need to see. There was a pretty loud sort of explosion, we felt as much as heard, the building swayed a significant amount. So we knew that something was wrong. We smelled smoke fairly quickly, and then once we left the office we started to smelling jet fumes, so we knew there was an airplane involved. We didn't know it was a terrorist situation. We never knew about the second airplane hitting until we were down and out, and actually after the building collapsed.

KING: Was Roselle calm?

HINGSON: Roselle was calm. It's a team effort, and so as long as I stayed calm, that helped Roselle, and as long as Roselle wasn't panicking that because something was coming at us and about to run us over or crush us, then I was able to stay calm. So we fed off each other.

KING: What do you make of Lisa and her husband?

HINGSON: Oh. There is no words that can describe it. Lisa is very incredible, and her husband certainly did a very brave thing, that I'm not sure that all of us would be able to do. But we all have choices, and he made what certainly is a very heroic choice.

KING: And Lisa what do you think of Michael and Roselle?

BEAMER: Well, I have been impressed with them. I met them a couple of times in person now, and I am not a huge dog person, but I'm impressed by this dog.

KING: Anybody want to ask of either person, Hillary?

CLINTON: You know, one of the things that has struck me throughout this whole terrible time that we have all gone through is that those of you who were directly affected have really inspired so many other people. You know, Lisa's faith and her love and her, you know, absolute conviction that her husband was meant to be where he was and he did what he was called to do, I think has helped so many people.

And Michael's courage, which, you know, it takes -- it takes courage to lead an active life and to pursue your interests and to, you know, work in the World Trade Center being blind from birth, and that in itself is a real statement, and then to, you know, being led to safety along with Roselle. And I would be really interested in hearing from each of you how you would say to someone who came to you with just the kind of grief that so many are suffering, saying, you know, how could this happen, why did this happen? What can be done about it?

Because what I worry about, Larry, is I have studied a lot of these other tragedies and disasters, and we have a lot of people who are just beginning to feel what happened. They have been running on adrenaline and willpower. Do you have any words, Lisa, as to how we can help each other?

BEAMER: The why question is a big one. And ultimately, my faith tells me why is because evil exists in this world, and things like this unfortunately will happen again, but the reason that God allows them to happen in my mind is because good will come out of them, and we have certainly seen just in the stories here tonight good results, we have seen it in our country, how we have pulled together, renewed patriotism, renewed love for each other, which we, you know, have not had in many years. So, you know, there is a lot of good that has already come out of this.

KING: But you never doubted your faith?

BEAMER: Never.

KING: And show people that -- Michael, what about you? Do you believe?

HINGSOON: Absolutely. I think, even to carry what Lisa said further, God gave us all choices, gave us all the ability to choice, he gave us free will. And we have the right to choose how we act and how we behave. The people that did this made their choice, and they will have to live with the consequences, as we all do.

But I think that by choosing to react and tell our stories and to continue to be positive, because that's the kind of people that we are, is the most important thing that we can do.

KING: Our panel are of three different faiths. You're Jewish, and...

NOOR: Muslim.

KING: In the Muslim faith, feel exactly the same?

NOOR: I was going to say that, again, one of the important aspects of this tragedy as we go forward is the fact that it has focused attention on our faith, and because of the immediate initial media reaction and assumptions, the stereotypical assumptions that were made about those responsible, it has caused a lot of examination, a lot of discussion, and it has brought Jews, Christians, Muslims and other faiths together, because they are all bound by the same values and principles.

And among the children of Abraham, we are worshiping one God, we value the sanctity of life, tolerance, compassion, and most importantly, accountability before God, and perhaps more important than that, peace. It is the central tenet and responsibility of every child of Abraham.

KING: And the Jewish viewpoint?

SCHUMER: I think it's the same. I mean, as Queen Noor said, we are Abrahamic faiths, all descended from Abraham, and you know, I think Lisa said it right, God works in ways that many of us can't understand.

But ultimately, there has to be a reason, and what I'm impressed with as I meet people who have been through what you have both been through, people who have been much closer to it than all of us is in a certain sense, there is -- peace might not be the right word, but there is sort of an understanding and a calmness that many of us who were a little further away it from it...

KING: Don't have.

SCHUMER: Don't have, and I think we could learn a lot from all of you, and the other people that I have talked to. In the fire houses, where they have lost so many, there is a certain sanctity and a certain calmness that you don't have in other places, despite the sadness.

KING: Let me get a break, and we'll include some of your phone calls for the senators, for her majesty and for Lisa and Michael. We'll be right back.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

KING: How long you been with the fire department?

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: Thirty-one years. (UNINTELLIGIBLE) 1970, you know, I figured only three months to go, I never dreamed. It's funny, when I first came on, an old-timer said to me, "kid, the worst thing you will ever have is a plane crash." I didn't know in the last three months I would have a plane crash in the World Trade Center.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

KING: We're back. Michael, do you consider yourself lucky or blessed, or what?

HINGSOON: Blessed. I guess I don't regard luck as having a lot to do with it, I certainly think blessed. But I think everybody was blessed who was there, no matter what happened to them or no matter what they are doing now. My faith, and I believe the faiths of all of us here, as Lisa said, and as Her Majesty Queen Noor said, we all have jobs to do, no matter what it is going forward, no matter where we are.

And I'm here and I'm telling the story, because I believe that I'm being led to do that, clearly, by the focus of attention, but just because it happened.

KING: Lisa, how are you going to handle raising children? Your father is a hero they are never going to know.

BEAMER: Yeah. That's the a hard piece, the baby coming is a hard piece. But I have -- I have taken some positive steps already and just trying to get them some normalcy in their lives.

KING: How old are the other two?

BEAMER: David is 3 1/2 and Andrew is 1 1/2, and this baby is due in January.

KING: Three and a half, asks for his daddy?

BEAMER: He knows what happened, he knows his daddy won't be back. My little guy does still call for him and looks at pictures and wants to talk about him, but I have a lot of people who will be able to tell him a lot of great stories, and certainly all the events surrounding this will be a great legacy for him to look to.

KING: Let me get a call. Memphis, Tennessee, hello.

CALLER: Hi. My question is for Hillary. I'm wondering what is the government doing and what can you help maybe to get them to do to improve the intelligence gathering in the country so that we can all go on with our lives and not live in fear?

CLINTON: That's a really good question, and you know, we are working on a bill right now in the Congress, the anti-terrorism bill that the president has put forth. We think that will add to the kind of tools that our intelligence gathering and our law enforcement authorities need. We are doing a lot to reach out and gather intelligence from around the world.

That's one of the really important parts of the coalition that the president is putting together, is so for the first time we can get the intelligence that some of the other countries have.

KING: Sent up a satellite today, right? Military satellite, not announcing what orbit it's in.

SCHUMER: Right. We are -- I mean, we have had to learn from our mistakes. And the one thing I guess I would say to the nice lady from Memphis is, we know a lot more today than we did before September 11, we are a lot better, I think, even though it has only been three weeks in collecting and gathering intelligence. And it's still going to be a long road. We ignored this problem, terrorism, too long.

(CROSSTALK)

SCHUMER: Yes, yes, I helped work and bring some of the compromises together, so that we can still keep our basic freedoms but give law enforcement the tools they need.

KING: Do we -- we all think of this -- your husband was so beloved, what he would be saying now?

NOOR: His faith was indestructible, and in spite of everything that he faced in his life, and he would be grieving as much as any over those who lost their lives and those whose lives have been affected forever but he would also be looking to see where we could go from here, how we learn from this experience.

KING: Always looking ahead.

NOOR: How we can pull together -- for him, that was absolutely -- absolutely necessary to the resolution of any problem. And he would have celebrated the birth of your baby in January, as we all will as a new beginning, a new life.

KING: Tampa, Florida, hello.

CALLER: Hi, how are you? The question I would like to ask is, how can we as Americans ask the young men and women of this country to fight for us, and at the same time for us to be so afraid to fly? If we are asking people to give their lives for us, how can we possibly not get on a plane and show our resolve? Because we cannot show the terrorists that we are afraid, and this is what's happening. And if these young men and women are willing to give up their lives for us, we have to stand strong for them.

KING: Never heard it put that way. Senator Schumer.

SCHUMER: Yeah, you know, people are afraid of flying, of course, when a horrible thing like this happens, they are. To be honest with you, the first two weeks after the incident when I had to commute between New York City and Brooklyn where I live and Washington, D.C., I took the train. And then, the president said, let's go back to life as normal, let's not be afraid.

So I took the plane. And I was a little scared. But I will tell you, I tell this to everyone who is listening, the security is so much tighter. At the gate were U.S. marshals, were U.S. customs, police officers, with the dogs who sniff for anything dangerous. And after I flew the first time, and everything, thank God, worked out OK, I wasn't afraid and I have flown two or three more times. I hope other people do that.

KING: Have you flown?

CLINTON: I have flown quite a bit. In fact, you and I were on the same plane from Washington. We sat together, and had a chance to catch up early this morning.

KING: Was it crowded or not?

NOOR: No, it wasn't terribly crowded, the airport wasn't, but it is resuming. It's only the second day of operation at Reagan National.

(CROSSTALK)

KING: Have you flown, Lisa?

BEAMER: Not on a commercial airliner yet, but I will.

KING: You will? You are not afraid?

BEAMER: I'm not afraid. It's more getting on the plane and kind of reliving what Todd went through, that would be difficult for me.

KING: Did you fly, Michael?

HINGSON: I would, and I will be very soon. I have reservations and I have got some trips planned that I need to make. Absolutely. I agree with what the gentleman said, we can't give into what has occurred and we can't allow them to dictate to us how we behave.

SCHUMER: Then they win.

HINGSON: Then they win, absolutely.

SCHUMER: Their goal is to terrorize us. Their goal is to make us afraid. It wasn't just the 6,000 people they killed, they want us to change our way of life, they want us to cower, they want us to fight with each other. And by both being much more united, by being strong, and by resuming our lives, we beat them.

HINGSON: Terrorism never wins in a long run, and it's not only us, it's the countries, I'm sure of their own faith that they are trying to intimidate, and it just doesn't work in the long run.

KING: Elmira, New York, hello.

CALLER: Hello. I'm concerned about the railroads, the freight trains and stuff, the safety because of they go by major stay in, and stuff, and they carry hazardous waste and gasoline.

CLINTON: Well, I'm glad you raised the railroads, because Chuck and I have been working very hard to increase security on our railroads, and that is both for passengers as well as for freight.

KING: I didn't see any on Amtrak the other day.

CLINTON: Well, we've got a lot of work to do, you know. We have never invested in rail transportation the way we need to in this country, and now I think many of us understand that we've got to have a comprehensive system of transportation, which has to include rail.

But our rail transportation has to be safer. We need more security, we need to take a hard look at, you know, where they -- where our train tracks are, and protect against any possible problems.

SCHUMER: We don't have to change our whole way of life, but we are and we can keep our freedoms and our basic lifestyle, we're going to have to make adjustments. The trains so far are wide open; and we're probably going to have to go through security gates before you get on a train, the way we do with airplanes now, and make certain changes.

But we can all do that. All we have to do is keep our resolve. And at first it's a little onerous. You know, when they first put up those gates at the planes people didn't like it, now nobody minds.

KING: Don't think about it.

Before -- in a while, before all say good night Liza Minnelli is going to be joining us and we're going to hear her sing "New York, New York," a song every American worships now.

And you were telling me that an Arab-American wrote that song.

NOOR: Yes, that's something that I've been pointing out lately because, as mentioned at the outset, Arab-Americans and Muslim Americans have been double victims of these tragedies; first in losing so many of their loved ones, and second in being targeted.

And the Arab-Americans that have served this country have served at every state -- level of government, and in the armed forces. And since my family came over in late 1800s, and so many others with them, the contribution of Arab-Americans and Muslim Americans to this country has been as profound as any group.

And for New York, one of the most wonderful stories is that Paul Anka, an Arab-American, wrote the lyrics to "New York, New York." And I think that, perhaps...

SCHUMER: And a lot of other good songs, too.

NOOR: But that speaks, I think, not only to New Yorkers, but to people in this country, and outside -- that people of different cultures, different faiths, different ethnic backgrounds are one family.

KING: Is government going on, by the way?

CLINTON: Oh, absolutely.

(CROSSTALK)

SCHUMER: Less partisanship, more unity. you know, we consult with each other much more. The idea of waking up in the morning and going to the floor of the Senate or House to beat up on the other party, that seems to be gone.

It's much more fulfilling to be in government now, with the unity of purpose that we have, and the compromises we're all making, meeting each other halfway, than it was before.

KING: Lisa, when your baby is born, what are you going to name him?

BEAMER: I don't know if it's a boy or girl yet, so I'll have to wait to find out.

KING: But you'll let us know?

BEAMER: I will.

KING: We're going to put him or her on this show.

BEAMER: OK.

KING: Michael, you continue to have good health and good faith.

HINGSON: I'll do it.

KING: And Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton and Chuck Schumer, thank you so much. And Queen Noor, your majesty, what can we say? I hope this program helped.

NOOR: I think it has probably helped a lot of people.

But I would like to just add one final thing, which I think is what everyone has said: Instead of living with fear, which is so easy after a tragedy like this, each of us must spend every moment thinking of what responsibility we have to contribute; what we can do, what we can accomplish together.

KING: Thank you all so much.

Liza Minnelli will close things out for us, and she'll be right back with me after this.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

KING: We close it out with the great Liza Minnelli who, did want to correct on the writers of "New York, New York."

LIZA MINNELLI: Yes, all I wanted to say is the princess is so lovely, and I think she's thinking of the song "My Way." "New York, New York" was written by Canternebb (ph).

KING: But "My Way" is a great American song.

MINNELLI: Oh, it's a great American song, too.

KING: Written by Paul Anka, an Arab American.

Where were you on September 11?

MINNELLI: I was at home.

KING: Here?

MINNELLI: Yes, here in New York; I'm a New Yorker. And Sam Harris called me and he said, quickly turn on the television, they've bombed the city. And I said what? He didn't know what part yet because it was still so confusing. And I turned on the television and I thought, OK, the world's gone mad, you know.

And I immediately tried to call my sister in California, like everybody did, they tried to check on people. And then you just get up and go and do whatever you can do, whether it's go down there and pick up rubble or it's sing "New York, New York."

KING: You know, you've always been one of our favorites. And of course your song has now become symbolic of all of this. You sang it at Shea Stadium that historic Friday night; there will never be a night to capture that again...

MINNELLI: Thank you, Larry.

KING: ... let's resume play. And all I can do is thank you for bringing us a song that all America now takes to heart.

MINNELLI: You're welcome.

KING: You're a special lady.

MINNELLI: Thank you very much. Thank you.

KING: We'll be back, but before we do that, let's hear Liza Minnelli at Shea Stadium with "New York, New York."

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

KING: The saga goes on with new stories every day, and memorable stories that don't go away. Tomorrow: stories from ground zero, when we were there the other day, and from the burn unit at New York Hospital, and everyday New Yorkers at work.

And Sunday night, Shimon Peres and Bob Woodward, a live edition.

"The Early Show," CBS, 10/11/2001

Later this morning, Senator Hillary Clinton plans to introduce legislation calling for a national task force to look at the needs of children in the event of another terrorist attack. She's on Capitol Hill.

Senator Clinton, good morning.

Senator HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (Democrat, New York): Good morning, Bryant.

GUMBEL: Well, this legislation, as I understand it, is called the Protecting Americans' Children Against Terrorism Act. What would the act entail?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, Bryant, one of the terrible lessons that we learned a month ago today is that all of us have to be better protected, but I'm particularly concerned about our children because of their vulnerability, their--you know, their size and their immune system, their respiratory system. So what this legislation will do is to create a special commission on a very fast track to make sure that every infor--bit of information we need for our doctors and our teachers and our parents can be made available, and that the actions we should take, like making sure we know what the proper dosage of an antidote is, or a vaccine.

GUMBEL: Were--well, were the needs of children not addressed following this tragedy?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, what happened, Bryant, is that all of us learned a lot on September 11th--a terrible series of lessons--and we hadn't really focused on what the specific impacts and vulnerabilities would be. And I've worked for a long time with the president of the Montefiore Children's Hospital in the Bronx, Irwin Redlener, and Irwin brought it to my attention that even in all the meetings he was attending with pediatricians and others who are focused on the well-being of children, they knew that there were some gaps in their knowledge, and so we're gonna try to fill those and replace fears with facts.

GUMBEL: Well, I--I don't mean to sound callous here, but when the entire country is rather ill-prepared for attacks of this sort, certainly for bioterror attacks, why--why single children out for help if the need is far greater than that?

Sen. CLINTON: Oh, well, everyone's addressing the larger need. There are many pieces of legislation building on the good work that Senator Kennedy and Senator Frist did a couple of years ago to begin closing the gaps in our public health system, to begin to get the vaccines and the antidotes once again manufactured. But in the discussions about all of this, the special needs of children, which are being brought to my attention with the kinds of questions that I'm asked by mothers and fathers every day, I believe need a particular focus because--for example, it's terrible to even think about these things, but we have to. Certain kinds of nerve gases are denser, they cluster around the floor, and that's where children's breathing takes place. We know that if we're going to be prescribing antibiotics or any other kind of medicine, we don't test for children. We don't test for what the proper dosage is. We need to start doing more of that when it comes to a lot of these medicines, and there's just a lot of unanswered questions that we should address.

GUMBEL: Let me move on to a couple of other issues, if I might. As you know, city officials are talking of a need for in excess of $50 billion to rebuild New York City, reinvigorate the city's economy. Is Washington prepared to come up with that kind of money?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I think we've had tremendous support from the president and the members of Congress, and Senator Schumer and I are working to put together the details so that we can continue to obtain the assistance that the city and the state need. It's a--it's a--it's a big undertaking, it's a difficult challenge, but everybody's been so understanding and cooperative, and we're gonna do the best job we can in explaining specifically the needs that the city and state have expressed.

GUMBEL: Do you think Washington can--can--can come up with the $50 billion?

Sen. CLINTON: We don't know yet, Bryant, because a lot of the work that has to be done is just beginning. I was pleased that the governor and the mayor came out with their request, but now they have to be, you know, scrubbed and analyzed. Everybody knows that. In fact, I'm meeting with the governor and Senator Schumer and the director of the Office of Management and Budget today so that we can begin the hard work of trying to figure out exactly how much we need, and--and how soon it needs to be conveyed.

GUMBEL: Fin--final quick note on this one-month anniversary. Most people allow that our national character has been forever changed. For the better or for the worse?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, certainly in New York I feel, you know, we showed the resilience and the courage that has marked New Yorkers and brought people together. I sense a real commitment to working together here in Washington. I feel very positive about what we're doing and about the outcome of our struggle against terrorism.

GUMBEL: Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, thank you very much. Good luck.

Sen. CLINTON: Thank you, Bryant.

GUMBEL: All right.

Coming up on quarter past the hour. We're back in a moment right after this.

(Announcements)

U.S. SENATOR THOMAS DASCHLE (D-SD) AND OTHERS HOLD MEMORIAL SERVICE, 10/11/2001

CLINTON: I want to thank the chaplain, especially, for being here and for starting this event. And I particularly noted the way that you described this as a day of remembrance and resolve, and that made a very big impression on me.

I also want to thank our leaders, Senator Daschle and Senator Lott, for their leadership and unity. I want to thank Senator Nichols for his support, our colleagues from Virginia, whom we've already heard from, Senator Warner and Senator Allen. And I also want to thank Senator Voinovich for being here, and Senator Mikulski, and Senator Sarbanes was here, as well.

You know, we are trying as best as human beings can to put what happened a month ago into words.

CLINTON: It's a very difficult challenge. You've heard some eloquent words here today from the hearts, souls of people who are leaders and understand the challenge that confronts us as a nation.

But as my colleague, Senator Schumer just said, a month has passed, but in some cases, the days of those months have seemed like years -- wrenching, painful years. Particularly for those who have lost a loved one, for those who were near the sights of this destruction, who experienced, who smelled it, who felt it.

And in a very real sense every American was there. We were there at the Pentagon, we were there at the World Trade Center, and we were there in Pennsylvania. And what we attempt to do today is to carry on, to keep going, and to make absolutely clear that for those who were directly impacted by these evil attacks, we will be there far into the future. We will be there with the support and assistance that families need to get back on their feet, that businesses require to keep their doors open, and customers coming, to rebuild -- and I was delighted today at the Pentagon when I heard the president make that very strong statement about rebuilding the Pentagon just as he had said in his address to Congress that we would rebuild New York. That American spirit survives intact. And what it calls on each of us to do is summon our resolve while we remember.

I'm personally very grateful to all who have supported New York, and for the kind of continuing concern and prayers that have been sent our way.

New Yorkers, like Americans everywhere, are resilient people. That's what we're demonstrating every single day as we go forward. But we know we're also human beings. And we need to have the kind of outreached hand and hug and prayer that says, "We see you, we know you, we care about you."

On the streets of New York, you can chance upon a garden in front of nearly every firehouse that just spontaneously grew up as people brought flowers and pictures and tokens of their esteem and caring.

CLINTON: And so on a busy day, as people are getting about their daily lives, all of a sudden we're stopped short by a memorial. And there are hundreds and thousands of them. We will memorialize the losses that we suffered, but we will also, as we remember and resolve to go forward, make clear that what really counts in the long run is the human spirit. And nowhere has it been given fuller flower than in our country.

That is what they hate about us. That is what they look at and cringe, because of our freedom, our spirituality, our efforts to translate one out of many. And we will continue to do that against this cult of evil.

But we have to remember, as well as resolve, that as we go forward we will not lose our humanity and our concern for those who lost a loved one just a month ago.

Thank you all very much.

(APPLAUSE)

U.S. SENATOR JAMES JEFFORS (I-VT) HOLDS HEARING ON FEMA RESPONSE TO TERRORIST ATTACKS, 10/16/2001

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Hello, Mr. Director. Thank you so much for the extraordinary work that you and your team are doing. We are very grateful for your leadership and your personal concern, which I have witnessed firsthand and am very grateful for.

There are many issues that we're really breaking new ground down here on. All of the experience that FEMA has had -- and you and I have talked about this -- our own personal experiences with natural disasters and Oklahoma City, I think, put us in a good position to respond. But I think there's a lot more for us to learn and to disseminate those lessons so that we all can be better prepared.

The questions that I have -- and some of these are ones that are really based on our particular experience in New York, both in the aftermath of September 11th and in the difficulties that we are facing with the bioterrorism issue. How do we improve public education and provide a good basis of information to separate the fears from the facts so that people can get what reassurance they need and take what precautions they should?

For example, I believe that we should have kind of a public education town hall meeting. I've spoken to Secretary Thompson and encouraged the television networks to cooperate to have maybe a two-hour time that the entire country can watch with you and Secretary Thompson and other government leaders, as well as experts, so that everybody can get the same information at the same time. I'm very worried that there's a lot of information being disseminated that is either inaccurate or unnecessarily panicking to people.

Secondly, I know that we've got to do a better job taking the special health needs of our children into account. The incident in New York with the seven-month-old baby, I think, raises a lot of questions for us.

Children are more vulnerable than adults. They don't need as much exposure to certain elements in order to have a reaction. We don't know enough about what we should be doing to protect our children.

Last week, I introduced legislation with Senator Dodd that would try to begin addressing that and to work with FEMA so that, once again, FEMA can help us all be ready to deal with the challenges facing our children.

I'm also continuing to be concerned about a lot of the health needs. There was an article in the Washington Post today about the health needs of our workers who are on the cleanup crews, and I hope that we will fund a study to follow those workers, so that we can acquire good information, treat them where necessary. We're working to try to get that into, I think, the Labor/HHS appropriation.

And I think it's an appropriate issue for our committee to address, also, Mr. Chairman, because we don't know all of the long-term hazards and the effects that those who have been digging in the rubble for 24 hours a day, literally, around the clock might face. We need to learn that, so that we can better protect our men and women in uniform who are on the front line, and that if there are precautions they should take, we'll be ready for that.

I have just a few quick questions that really deal with the issues in New York. I know that people have said -- and I am proud that they do -- that no city would have been better prepared to deal with this terrible disaster than New York because of the response that they had in place and ready to go.

Are there lessons, Director Allbaugh, that we can learn from what New York did, and are there additional steps that FEMA can take to disseminate that broadly so that everybody in the country is as well prepared as possible?

ALLBAUGH: I'd make two particular observations regarding your question. If there's a single item that we could do, it is to make sure that police, fire, emergency responders can communicate with one another.

Oftentimes, I go into a community, and there are all types of bands and frequencies used, and folks, literally, who are responding to an incident can't talk to one another. So that is one single item I could put my finger on that we need to address immediately.

Secondly, what I've initiated -- and I had a conversation with Governor Ridge two days ago and then again this morning about this. We are going to institute a study that we've done in previous years, a capability assessment for readiness of all states to make sure that we know exactly what each state's capabilities are, as well as local entities, and where they need assistance -- well, let me back up. Once we complete that, we will design a template so everyone knows exactly what the bar is, what is going to be the measurement, where do they need to be.

I just don't want to be in a position of throwing a lot of money out there on the table. The American public deserves to actually get something in exchange for their tax dollars.

We are looking at right now improving that study. I'm going to try and get it conducted here in the next month of all 50 states and the territories so we can move expeditiously. I think that's a time when we would be in a position to come back to the committee and make some hard recommendations.

But I'll be honest with you. I'm not exactly sure that we have a good handle on what our states' capabilities are. And I think it's important that we know and we offer assistance where we can.

As I mentioned a minute ago, we spend an inordinate amount of money, properly so, training first responders and emergency managers at Emmitsburg, a fabulous facility. One of the things I need to look at is how do we expand that so we can meet the demand. Our demand far outstrips our capability at Emmitsburg.

Coupled with this, I just don't want to be the 300 pound gorilla, you know, forcing something upon states that they may or may not need. We have to have an honest, active dialog with those individuals, and we do. I can't think of a better agency that has more dialog with state individuals other than FEMA.

I'm very proud of our relationship, and it is a proper relationship. But we can improve upon what resources we can afford the states so they can be better prepared.

As you know, I'm not the one receiving the 911 phone call. These folks are the ones receiving the 911 call, and we need to make sure that they're best prepared with trucks, personal equipment, safety devices to do the best job that they possibly can, and I appreciate your question.

CLINTON: Well, I appreciate your answer, and I appreciate the gentlemen sitting in the front row and all the other first responders who are on the other end of those calls. We do need your guidance and advice as soon as it's humanly possible to provide it to us, because I think every one of us on this committee wants to provide whatever additional resources and support -- perhaps looking at some regional training facilities like Emmitsburg -- so that you could deal with the need that is out there, and people will be able to come forth -- is something we should consider, maybe in conjunction with some of our military bases or even some of our no longer active bases.

I think there are some real opportunities here if we get the kind of planning and recommendations that I know that you'll come forward with.

Another issue that is of particular concern in lower Manhattan is our small business community. We have discovered there is a potential area that needs some additional help. We have a terrible dilemma confronting our small businesses in the immediate vicinity of ground zero. Certainly, within the area itself, there's obviously no basis or ability to go back into business. That's a problem for down the road.

But within blocks of it, we have people who are literally going out of business because of the fact that this is not only a disaster scene, but it's also a crime scene, so we have many streets blocked off. And the police are doing their collection -- it's not only -- one of our colleagues said, you know, nobody's going to be tried for this. Well, that's true, but there is information and things that are being found blocks from the site. So we're trying to be very careful about that.

But the net result is that all these small businesses are basically cut off from their customers. They're not really receiving any help, and many of them are not in a position right now to sign for small business loans, because until we get the traffic flowing again and the barriers down, there is no way they can know whether they'll be in business. They desperately want to be in business.

I talked to a bar owner a week ago, and he said, "I'm stocked, I'm ready to go, but nobody knows I'm here, and they can't get to me even if they want to come." So one of my hopes is that we could look at a single office within FEMA to address property, business, and financial losses, and that we could look at having the Small Business Administration raise the cap on its loan amounts, change its eligibility criteria, defer loan payments for two years or more, and maybe even look at some grants that were reasonably likely to keep a business open to get it on its feet.

And I would love to work with you as well on that, Director, to see what we can do more on the small business front, because it's desperately needed.

ALLBAUGH: I appreciate that. I'm concerned about individuals, as you say, who we don't even know exist. They need to really call that 800 number, and let me give it out publicly please -- 800-462- 9029. I think for the next disaster, I'm going to get an easier number that everyone can remember.

But we do try our best to track these individuals and make sure they're put together with the right federal agency so they get the assistance that they properly need. I do think it's going to take a little bit of extra effort in lower Manhattan. We have the office at Worth and Center Street. It is small, so I've asked folks to find another location so we can focus solely on the small businesses that are affected. But it is a problem that we're going to deal with.

CLINTON: I know my time is up, but I would like to also raise the possibility of a more vigorous public education campaign. I think a lot of people have been in such a state of shock until recently that they really haven't paid attention to our PSAs, our 800 numbers, our invitations to seek help. They're beginning to, so I think we have to almost start from...

ALLBAUGH: Scratch.

CLINTON: Yes, start from scratch...

ALLBAUGH: I agree.

CLINTON: ... and get out there and really get the information out so that people know where to go to get the help that is waiting for them.

ALLBAUGH: Thank you.

CLINTON: Thank you very much.

[GAP - FROM LATER IN THE HEARING]

CLINTON: Mr. Chairman, could I follow up on a point that the director just made with respect to Y2K?

JEFFORDS: Yes.

CLINTON: I believe that we had the kind of interagency information operation that you have so rightly said we should put into place for our current situation. I think it would be helpful to take a look at how that was done.

There was some legislative involvement and oversight. There was, obviously, interagency involvement. But there was a center, and there was also an individual who was tasked with being the spokesman so that all information could be double checked before somebody had to get out there and make a statement.

So I think that your suggestion is an excellent one in looking to the Y2K experience. And, frankly, I think we averted a lot of problems because we got on it, and people paid attention to it, and they were held accountable, and what we feared didn't come to pass.

If there is any legislation or changes in the Stafford Act or anything that you believe, Director, that would help you respond on that basis, I would certainly like to know about it, and I know my colleagues would as well.

ALLBAUGH: I'll make sure everyone knows about it.

JEFFORDS: I have one final question for you, and it's kind of a tough one, I know. Looking forward with all the knowledge you have now, when do you anticipate that you will be able to consider the job done?

ALLBAUGH: I'm not sure that the job will ever be done. Our lives have changed as a country forever as of September 11th. We are more vigilant now. We are aware of our surroundings. I know the things that I used to take for granted, I don't take for granted.

I have to commend the American public with high praise at the way that they've responded to this. It is absolutely remarkable. No one's really panicking. We have our incidents that you're talking about, and my heart goes out to those individuals who were directly affected. But I'm not sure, Senator, that our job will ever be done.

JEFFORDS: More specifically, relief efforts, people involved in relief efforts -- when do you anticipate that might be complete?

ALLBAUGH: I fully expect to be having an office in New York City for years to come. If you think back to the Northridge earthquake in the early '90s, we still have an office dealing with the multitude of problems in California.

This is a situation where we'll be lucky to have the site maybe cleaned up in seven or eight or nine months, maybe a year from now. We have lives that we have to help put back together, years and years of counseling, small businesses that need to be rebuilt. New York City is doing its best to guard against the loss of jobs that would affect lower Manhattan as well as the rest of the city.

And we're willing partners. We're going to be there until the bitter end, and I'm not the one to decide when the bitter end is. I think we'll all know it as a country.

JEFFORDS: Thank you.

Senator Warner?

WARNER: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Most local fire departments aren't familiar with urban search and rescue team capabilities until they are faced with the situation. Our chief here, who's with us today, suggests that the urban search and rescue resources and procedures be included in the curriculum at FEMA's National Emergency Training Center and the National Fire Academy.

Can you elaborate on that a bit?

ALLBAUGH: I think that's one of the first things that I have passed along to the folks at the Fire Administration, that we need to, when we bring in individuals from fire departments all across the country, explain to them what resources are available, should they need to call upon them. I'm not sure that there is a need, Senator, to expand the number of urban search and rescue teams nationwide. I do believe we need to expand their capabilities.

But at a bare minimum, men and women who put their lives on the line, whether they're with the police department or the fire department or emergency managers, ought to have the benefit of knowing exactly what resources are at their disposal, and we're going to make sure that everyone is educated from here on out.

WARNER: As a follow-up, during the Pentagon response -- and, of course, our local fire and rescue and Red Cross and others performed brilliantly, I think.

ALLBAUGH: They did, indeed.

WARNER: I visited that scene only four hours after the plane struck with the Secretary of Defense. He had the highest praise for those teams that reacted.

But during that response, it was learned that there is an equipment shortage for urban search and rescue teams that allows for only one equipped team to be deployed at any given time from any one of the 28 bases. If there are multiple incidents in one area, how would FEMA respond on a timely basis?

ALLBAUGH: I'm not aware of that, Senator. We activated eight teams the first day to New York alone, four to the Pentagon, and I'm not aware of any particular shortage. I do know that we will be briefing and debriefing all of the teams, and we'll have after action reports so we make sure that we don't make any mistakes that may have been committed during this travesty.

WARNER: Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

JEFFORDS: Thank you.

Well, thank you, Mr. Director. It's been a pleasure having you with us, and you're (OFF-MIKE), and we thank you for what you're doing. We reserve the right, as you know, to ask you further questions which you can respond to in writing.

Thank you.

ALLBAUGH: Thank you, members. I appreciate it.

JEFFORDS: Our next panel is made up of Edward Plaughner, Jeff Metzinger, and Robert Hessinger.

Chief Plaughner, welcome. It's a pleasure to have you here. We know of your efforts and want to praise what you have done, and we'd like to hear from you on your thoughts about what we can do to improve for the future.

PLAUGHER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, members of the committee...

WARNER: Mr. Chairman, could I intervene? I want you to know that this kind gentleman was the on-scene commander for, I think, 10 days. His unit was the first to respond. I've communicated now with our chairman of the Appropriations Committee a list of items which you feel your team needs to have either replaced or as new equipment. So I recognize all those present that have done this, but this is one man who has been there from the moment it started.

Thank you again.

PLAUGHER: Thank you very much. It is, indeed, a pleasure to be here this morning. It's also a great deal of pleasure and an honor to represent the men and women, not only from the Arlington County Fire Department, but also of the nation. And, hopefully, my remarks will assist the cause of improving our capability to respond to any type of incident.

Again, I want to thank you for allowing me to be here today, and I understand that you, as a committee, are deeply concerned, as are all of us, with the tragic events of September the 11th. These events had a profound impact on the men and women of my fire department and on the nation's fire service as a whole.

I have prepared remarks, which, hopefully, will be entered into the record, and I'll just highlight a couple of the key points in order to be brief here this morning, to allow my colleagues also ample time to testify.

It is an opportunity for me, however, to talk about the incident at the Pentagon. First of all, you need to know, I think, that our response to the Pentagon began when one of my engine companies who was responding to another routine call noticed the plane in its route to the Pentagon and was actually a witness to the incident.

Immediately, the Northern Virginia Automatic Mutual Aid Program was activated. Units from Fort Meyer, Alexandria, Fairfax County, and National Airport Fire Departments responded on the initial alarm. The second alarm units included units from the District of Columbia, as well as from Montgomery County and Prince George County, Maryland.

These first responding fire units fought a fire that was triggered by 6,000 gallons of jet fuel in the world's largest office building. The Federal Emergency Management Agency and their response to the attack at the Pentagon and its aftermath was superb.

FEMA and their front line urban search and rescue teams, which I'm sure we're going to hear more about here in a few moments, were mobilized from Fairfax County; Virginia Beach; Montgomery County, Maryland; Memphis, Tennessee; and then later on, we received assistance from New Mexico to provide relief for the exhausted rescue personnel.

I must tell you, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, that the FEMA urban search and rescue teams made an outstanding contribution to our effort.

PLAUGHER: These teams are comprised of dedicated professionals whose hard work and unyielding efforts should not be overlooked.

Two resources that were brought to bear to the incident scene by FEMA come to mind and stand out in my mind. First was the search dog capability. It's a unique and absolutely critical and necessary component of a structural collapse search. It allows for a swift and thorough search for victims that could not otherwise have been possible.

Secondly, the urban search and rescue team brings them specially trained urban search and rescue structural engineers that allow us to then proceed into the building with safety being paramount to all the personnel on the scene.

However, there's a couple of areas where I think we can improve our business, and that is the business of response to our community, particularly in these types of incidents, and that is what the senator was just talking about to the director, which is the ability to have a clear understanding by the local first responders of what the urban search and rescue team brings to an incident, and also the capability of this being taught at the National Fire Academy.

I also think that we need to have a clear understanding of the capability that is being developed for these urban search and rescue teams. In other words, what I mean is there needs to be a standardized list of equipment that is well understood and that we can count on when this is deployed. It also occurs to me that this complement of equipment and response capability should be developed with a panel of experts that seeks out local advice, so that those of us who have been there would allow them to be able to adjust their response capability based upon our now new experiences.

We also just heard again about the need for additional equipment. Most urban search and rescue teams -- in my earlier career in Fairfax County, I was fortunate enough to be one of the founding members of the team and participated in its early structure -- we realize are multiple deep in personnel but not multiple deep in equipment, and we think that now is the time that we could fix that.

We are, in fact, very lucky and very privileged in the Washington metropolitan area to have two urban search and rescue teams in our midst, both Montgomery County, Maryland, and Fairfax County, Virginia. This is a unique situation in our community.

However, one of the things that we also focused on and realized early on in this particular incident at the Pentagon was that there was a need for some command overhead teams. These command overhead teams would be chief officers who are experienced in dealing with these incidents and who would bring to bear that extra chief level officer capability, and we think that maybe there is an opportunity for this to come out in the future.

The level of cooperation and mutual assistance between FEMA and the Arlington County Fire Department was excellent. There are many moving parts to an effective response to a terrorist incident. Each of us must have a good expectation of our own capabilities and a clear understanding of the roles and responsibilities of the different agencies.

In the final analysis, what transpired at the Pentagon under the circumstances was dealt with professionally and with the best of each of our abilities. We at the Arlington County Fire Department learned valuable lessons with regard to our own abilities and our limits. It is my hope that we can use those lessons to further a more effective preparedness approach.

In concluding my remarks, Mr. Chairman, in speaking with the overall federal terrorism preparedness effort, there is said to be over 40 different offices and bureaus involved in terrorism preparedness across the federal agencies. Though we have made great strides in our operational interaction with federal agencies, there is an urgent need for better coordination of pre-incident support and training programs.

I, personally, testified last spring before the House Transportation Committee on a piece of legislation designed to address this issue. A Senate companion bill, Senate Bill 1453, the Preparedness Against Terrorism Act of 2001, was recently introduced by Senator Bob Smith and referred to this committee.

This bill codifies the Office of National Preparedness at FEMA that President Bush created earlier this year. It creates a president's council that will be charged with the development of a single national strategy on terrorism preparedness that will include measurable preparedness goals.

We applaud President Bush's designation of Governor Tom Ridge of Pennsylvania as our new homeland security coordinator. However, it seems to us that Senate Bill 1453 could and would bring focus and legal authority to this new effort.

It is my understanding that the Bush administration had significant input into this bill, and I urge you to make whatever modifications are necessary to address Governor Ridge's role and to act favorably on the bill in sending it to the full Senate for consideration as quickly as possible. We owe it to our country to have the best coordinated comprehensive terrorism preparedness strategy that is possible.

Again, thank you for having me here today, and I will be happy to answer any questions.

JEFFORDS: Thank you, Chief. I'm going to ask all of the witnesses to testify, and then we'll have questions. And I assure you we have taken notice of your remarks with respect to what we should do, especially with the new role for Governor Ridge.

Captain Metzinger?

METZINGER: Good morning, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee. I'm Captain Jeff Metzinger. I'm with the Sacramento Metropolitan Fire District in northern California. I'm also a member of California's urban search and rescue team, California Task Force 7.

Like the others here, I'm also honored and very humble to be talking to you this morning representing the thousands of firefighters throughout this country who put their lives on the line every day.

We were dispatched to the World Trade Center on the morning of September 11th, as so many other teams were. I keep a journal with me wherever I go, and I brought it with me today, and I'm going to read some excerpts for you. It's a habit I've had for a long time, and I think there's some value in there.

I'll start out on Wednesday, September 12th. "We're finally leaving for New York City, and everyone is anxious to get to work. As we approach the Hudson River from New Jersey, you can see a large column of smoke coming up from the site where the World Trade Center used to stand.

"This is my first trip to New York City, and I feel sad by what I see. The traffic is incredible, even with a full police escort. The corners are filled with people, and we're just now a few blocks away from the large smoke column I had seen earlier.

"We arrived at the Javits Convention Center by 7 p.m. and set up our base of operations. There's other teams coming in as well, including teams from Los Angeles; Missouri; Indianapolis; Riverside, California; Pennsylvania; Massachusetts; and Ohio.

"Our 62-person teams divided into two teams, where we alternate 12-hour shifts, working 24 hours around the clock. I'm assigned to the Blue Team working the night shift.

"The first night on September the 13th, we loaded into the bus and headed into our sector to go to work. We met up with the Gray Team and did a pass-on of information and began to take a brief tour of the collapse zone along Church Street.

"The scene was surreal. There were people everywhere. Smoke continued to drift from the massive piles of rubble. The expanse of the disaster is difficult to comprehend.

"Several searches are conducted by our search dogs in the vicinity of Tower 7. The technical search cameras were also used, but we had no luck finding any victims.

"The following night, our team was working again looking for an assignment, and the dogs alerted in an area, but at a very dangerous location. It was too unstable to enter.

"That night, there was thunder, lightning, wind, and heavy rains pounding down upon us. Frequently, debris and large pieces of metal were blowing off the roof of adjacent buildings, and our task force leader determined it wasn't safe for us to go any further and lose any further lives.

"The next afternoon, we had a briefing from our task force leader at our base and were told that President Bush would be visiting our facility that day. I was privileged to meet and shake hands with President Bush, with Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, and the governor and the mayor were also present. It was quite an experience, and their visit was very much appreciated by all.

"That night on the bus, we were headed back to work and saw hundreds of people lining the streets of New York City, cheering us as we go by. The traffic was so congested that we finally stopped the bus, got off and walked the last few blocks to the Church and Day command post.

"Tonight, our search team is finally getting to do some work, setting up a rope system to lower one of our members down into the debris crater near Church Street. An objective here is to place a cellular phone antenna down lower that might assist with victim location.

"The following night, we are headed back to work, and again people are lining the streets, cheering, waving flags, holding signs, and lighting candles. It was a sight that warmed us every night as we went in.

"This particular night, our search and rescue teams were assigned to search the buildings around the outer perimeter of the plaza area. There are several 30-plus story buildings around the World Trade Center plaza, and we conducted searches from basement to roof. Every door was opened. Every space was checked. We climbed the stairwells taking on one building at a time.

"We didn't find any victims. Every floor of every building we searched was marked and completed. The assignment took a large toll on our legs that night.

"On Sunday, during our briefing, we're told that three top New York fire chiefs were laid to rest that day. Firefighter chaplain Ward Cocraton (ph) said a prayer for the victims and for the safety of the team members that are still working here.

"Tonight, we're going to work between Buildings 5 and 6, possibly going underground. We hear that there's up to six levels below the street grade.

"We reported to the Church and Day command post that night, and I personally got assigned my first job as heavy rigger, which was my assignment with the team. Steve of Massachusetts Task Force 1 was there, and he and I worked with four New York City iron workers through the night, using a 90-ton crane, removing tons of debris all night long.

"The following day, we are back to work with the same crane and a new group of iron workers. We made a connection with some guys by the names of Mike, Rich, and Kevin. They're all great people. I found that the New York iron workers and construction workers were just incredibly great folks.

"We cut and moved tons of steel again tonight. In the middle of the night, I found a child's doll in the rubble, and I realize suddenly how much I miss my family.

"I heard our response team found a victim this morning, a police officer. Our hopes for a live rescue are starting to dim.

"The next day, we're back on the bus to the work site again, and I'm already tired. We've averaged about three hours of sleep per night. Even though we get time to rest, you can't sleep.

"Heading back to the crane, we worked all night again moving steel, looking for bodies. And I've noticed on several nights that there's very little debris that's recognizable. There's no desks, there's no chairs, carpet or sheet rock, or anything else you'd associate with an office building, just the steel structure. And there's still no victims in the area we're working in.

"On the 18th, we're back in the pile again moving steel and searching for victims. And, today, the smell of death is more evident. I found a business card of a man with an office on the 83rd floor of one of the towers, and I wondered what his state was at that moment. I said a prayer for him in hopes that he's alive and well, and I'm still not sure what his fate is.

"Around midnight that night, the crane operation was halted while they were moving in a larger crane. And while the crane was shut down, I joined forces with some New York firefighters. Two of the battalion chiefs were out there with their sleeves rolled up, working right alongside of us. We were moving debris by hand, and that was a very solemn night. I went home tired that day.

"The following day, Thursday, the 20th, we started heading home, packing our equipment. It's been a long 10 days, and everyone's exhausted. The team's physician has just diagnosed me with bronchitis. The dust we've been breathing all week finally caught up to us. Many others on the team have the same complaints of headache, sore throat, sinus congestion, and sometimes fever. But most of all, everybody's troubled that we didn't find any live victims.

"Finally, on Friday, we land back in northern California at Travis Air Force Base, and we get a full police escort all the way back to Sacramento. And every freeway overpass for 40 miles was covered with fire engines, police cars, and citizens cheering us on. It was a warm reception.

"We arrived in Sacramento to a similar greeting of family, friends, co-workers, and media. And I realized then for the people of Sacramento that we were their connection to this tragedy on the East Coast.

"It felt good to be home. I felt like a part of me was still in New York, and when I go to sleep, I still dream that I'm there. It doesn't leave us."

I just want to close and say that the firefighters and law enforcement and EMS people are going to continue to be the first responders arriving at these incidents, and the toll is tremendous. The toll is tremendous on what I saw in the New York City firefighters, and for those of us who just came there and left, it took a toll as well, physically and mentally.

We owe it to ourselves to be prepared for future incidents and to take care of our responders to make sure that we are afforded everything that we can possibly do to be ready for the next one.

I appreciate the opportunity to share these thoughts with you, and I'm available for your questions.

Thank you.

JEFFORDS: Thank you, Jeff.

VOINOVICH: Mr. Chairman, do you mind if I just introduce Mr. Hessinger. He's from Ohio.

JEFFORDS: You may do that, yes, certainly.

VOINOVICH: Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, Ohio Task Force 1 is a designated FEMA emergency response team, and it's made up of volunteers from the fire departments across Ohio, and it's coordinated out at Wright-Patterson Air Force Base.

Mr. Hessinger is a logistics chief for the Ohio Task Force 1, and I think I'd like to underscore that in his regular job, he's a firefighter paramedic with the Kettering, Ohio, Fire Department.

VOINOVICH: He's also accompanied today by Mike Kinney (ph), who's a captain in the Dayton, Ohio, Fire Department, and he's also a member of Ohio Task Force 1, and we're very happy that you're here with us today.

Seventy-two members of that Ohio Task Force were mobilized just after the attack at the World Trade Center and were among the first out of state FEMA teams to respond to ground zero.

Robert, we're really happy to have you here with us today. Thank you for your service.

JEFFORDS: You have your friend with you, I guess?

Would you come up? Why don't you come up?

Mr. Hessinger, please proceed.

HESSINGER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Committee members, distinguished guests, as Senator Voinovich pointed out, my name is Robert Hessinger. I'm logistics chief. And Mike Kinney (ph) here today with me is a rescue squad officer with Ohio Task Force 1. We were deployed to the New York City terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center September 11th, 2001.

I'd like to start by saying thank you for allowing us to share our experiences with you, and I hope you'll take what we say and continue to support the teams here.

Ohio Task Force 1 was established as a FEMA urban search and rescue team in the spring of 1997 and is located on Wright-Patterson Air Force Base in Dayton, Ohio. Ohio Task Force 1 was officially activated as one of the first three FEMA task force groups. It was our first national deployment, and we were activated at 1100 hours on September 11, 2001, to respond to New York City by ground mobilization.

The Ohio Task Force deployment was multifaceted due to our members' activity within the FEMA system. Our task force leader, James Gruenberg (ph), was deployed as a part of FEMA's Red Incident Support Team, which is the overhead team the chief spoke about, and our task force leader, Robert McKey (ph), was also deployed as a part of the Blue Incident Support Team.

Operationally, Ohio Task Force 1 arrived at the Jacob Javits Center in Manhattan, New York, approximately 6 a.m. on September 12, 2001, making the third FEMA urban search and rescue team behind Massachusetts and Pennsylvania. The primary mission of Ohio Task Force 1 upon arrival was to establish the rear base of operations we refer to as a BOO (ph). The task force also created two operational teams by splitting the members into daytime and nighttime operations, running a seven to seven shift, 12-hour operational periods.

At approximately noon on the 12th, Task Force Leader Moll (ph) became the daytime operation leader and proceeded to ground zero. The first operation was to set up a forward BOO (ph), and afterwards came a few missions confirming victims using canine teams and searching void spaces down on the rubble pile.

The first full operational period for the task force came on the day shift, Thursday, September 13th. None of the team members were ready for the magnitude of destruction and the size of the collapse.

Ohio Task Force 1 was given many missions dealing with technical search of void areas with search cameras, and the team's canine handlers could not keep up with the multitude of requests from division commanders and the workers on the pile alike. Task Force Leader Moll (ph) worked closely with the FDNY sector commander to coordinate sublevel void searches, technical rigging decisions, and structural evaluations by Ohio's structural specialists.

One of the missions included rigging a rope lowering system to penetrate a small opening in a collapsed stairwell to search a mechanical room four levels below grade. Mike Kinney (ph) was on that team to do that.

At this point, optimism within the team ran high due to the size and structural stability of those void spaces. The rescue team also attempted to rig another rope system to lower searchers into a void where previously a Fire Department of New York Ladder 6 personnel had survived the collapse.

The anchoring points were found to be inadequate in order to appropriately rig a lowering system. This was the first let-down the team had suffered and found it difficult to convey this to fellow FDNY firefighters. Continued missions to search void spaces turned up parking levels with thigh-deep contaminated waters and more void spaces without live signs.

Our mission to secure and remove impaled steel of the World Financial Building was changed by the Ohio Task Force structural specialists to securing the piece of steel directly to the main structure due to increased risk to rescue workers. This decision proved to be the correct one, and the piece of steel remained stable.

Day operations were also tasked with reconnaissance of the surrounding buildings. Teams climbed and searched multiple buildings, breached locked doors, and systematically marked cleared areas for a thorough search. A couple of searchers turned up citizens either not able to traverse the lengthy trip down the stairs or unwilling to leave their personal possessions after being so violently violated.

As FEMA use of our task force, we were given the task to support local jurisdictions in the mitigation of an overwhelming situation. The Fire Department of New York was placed in such a situation.

The FEMA urban search and rescue concept was alien to the workers we encountered due to the loss of the majority of the special rescue personnel within their fire department. As fellow firefighters, we offered special equipment, a fresh and educated set of hands, and a confidence the rescue was being accomplished to the best of our abilities.

Upon the last operational period, Ohio Task Force 1 stopped by Fire Department of New York's Rescue 5 to pay their respects and donate equipment that would aid in the rebuilding of this distinguished company. We hope this will somehow leave a lasting impression of the FEMA system and the first class teams that adorn (ph) it.

Ohio Task Force 1 was given demobilization orders on Tuesday, September 18th, with a departure date of Thursday, September 20th. The citizens and leaders in Ohio made the return trip a memorable one with police escorts, fire department apparatus lining the highways, citizens with banners on overpasses, and our families at Wright- Patterson Air Force Base.

The support Ohio Task Force 1 was given by the incident support teams of FEMA and the experts and guidance of those placed in charge of this tragedy were professional, no matter what the situation. Given this event, we commend all the men and women in those positions for an exemplary job.

Ohio Task Force 1 would like to thank FEMA, the state of Ohio, our families for all the support given to us over the years. We would also like to thank the Environment and Public Works Committee for your time today and continued support in protecting our nation.

May God bless all of us.

JEFFORDS: Thank you, and we all know how difficult it is for all of you to be here today to relive those very, very difficult days. I want to commend you all.

I also want to know what we can learn from your experiences. We have already had a discussion today about the communications systems and the need perhaps for more uniformity and the ability to make sure that you can move from one area of the country to another, as all of you did, and to be able to communicate.

Do you have suggestions or comments on any difficulties that you had or would have in the communications systems?

Chief Plaugher?

PLAUGHER: Yes, Senator. I had the privilege last week to testify in another Senate committee on this very same issue, the Commerce and Technology Subcommittee. And it is absolutely critical that this nation set aside a set of frequencies, a set of spectrum, for public safety use. It's just beyond me that it hasn't been done.

We are told, anyway, from the professional associations that, oftentimes, there's a debate between selling these frequencies on the open market to private industry or reserving them for public safety. And, for me, there is no debate.

JEFFORDS: Any other comments?

METZINGER: I'd like to say, too -- it's been addressed earlier -- at the federal level with FEMA, the current 28 teams that you now have in this country -- I think more and more now, we're finding that we're working together on incidents such as this tragedy in New York City and the Pentagon, and we could use more national training together. We frequently do our training locally, but we don't have the opportunity to train as a nation, as teams coming together. That would be really beneficial to us.

We've got equipment. We've got people. The one thing we need most is the opportunity to train and prepare for these incidents. It's where the big expense comes from -- is personnel cost. If you can continue to support -- to use our concept through FEMA and training dollars and helping us be prepared is probably as important as anything.

Along with that, there isn't a city or community in this country that probably couldn't use additional support for their own fire departments at home. We constantly struggle each year with budget cuts and competing with other entities in the city, the libraries, the parks, the school districts, and all are very important.

But this is one where people can lose their lives, and these people on the front lines are important to every community. And I think that the more support you can give to local resources, the better off we're all going to be.

JEFFORDS: I used to be a volunteer fireman, and I was alarmed to travel around my state a couple of years ago and to find out the cost to individuals to be able to volunteer, essentially, with respect to necessary equipment. Is that a national problem, and how do the small local governments provide the equipment for entering burning buildings and things like that?

METZINGER: It is a national problem. It's a problem that everyone faces. It's a matter of dollars, and if the money's there, there's no limit to what they can purchase or the training that they can do. We're often limited by how much we can afford to do, and that's a sad thing.

I live in a large community. Sacramento is the capital state of California, and in Sacramento, we basically have two haz-mat teams for a million people. We've got a community with over 50 fire stations, and we're stretching our resources to the limit, and I think we can improve on that.

Obviously, we're doing things now that we never thought we would do. When I entered the fire service 20 years ago, we fought fires and we helped people. And now, we're doing technical rescue, we're doing water rescue, we're doing hazardous materials, and we're doing advanced life support. We're dealing with natural disasters, like hurricanes and earthquakes, the run of the mill wild land fires, and now we're asked to deal with domestic terrorism as well, and it's just another thing on our plate, and we can only stretch what we're doing so far.

But we'll continue to do it. We're happy to do it. That's what we want to do. If you'll support us, we'll continue to do as good as we can.

JEFFORDS: Any other comments?

Mr. Hessinger?

HESSINGER: Mr. Chairman, I'd like to actually thank Senator Clinton and Director Allbaugh for their comments on the communications issue. We felt there were a couple of places where the deployment would have gone smoother -- although the Ohio Task Force -- this was our first deployment, and we had a -- operationally, with FEMA, we had a very good, positive outcome with the way things went through the FEMA systems and how immediately they dispatched the teams and responded.

But the communication is definitely an area that needs to be addressed, with better communications and ground transportation, convoys. When you get into some of the areas of West Virginia and Pennsylvania that we drove through, communications becomes difficult. It's a safety issue at night, in the middle of West Virginia, if you lose a truck behind you full of people who can't keep up with your convoy or breaks down.

The other issue that I was very glad to hear Senator Clinton bring up was the health concerns of workers onsite and after the activities. The Ohio Task Force has been in contact with many of the other task forces with concerns of respiratory problems being faced by the workers returning home from New York City.

We have personally had five members with pneumonia. One has been hospitalized. I know the Sacramento task force was the other one hit hard with upper respiratory infections and pneumonia. And hearing that there is concern on this committee with acute and long-term health effects from this is very satisfying and makes us feel comfortable that this committee will see that the proper thing is being done for the workers after the fact.

JEFFORDS: Mr. Kinney (ph), do you have anything you would like to say in that regard?

KINNEY (ph): I'd like to reiterate what Mr. Hessinger said about the communications issue. I was charged with driving one of the vehicles, and it is an issue, the communication issue, between vehicles while you're in route.

Also, it was an issue being able to communicate back and forth from midtown Manhattan to ground zero. We were really unable to communicate back and forth. So if we needed something from our rear base of operations, we had to send somebody back, actually.

SMITH: Mr. Chairman?

JEFFORDS: Mr. Smith.

SMITH: Mr. Chairman, Senator Warner has to leave, and I'm going to yield part of my time to him for a question.

WARNER: I'll just take a piece. I have the Chief of Naval Operations up on the matters he's faced with waiting in my office.

I'm just going to go quickly to you, Chief Plaugher.

WARNER: You're the first responder in Arlington County. My estimate is there's about 40 different government agencies and cadres of employees scattered in 40 different locations.

We had here, most unfortunately, yesterday an anthrax situation. I'll just call it a situation. It's been fully publicized. You would be the first to respond, in all probability, to some of these outlying federal government offices.

Fortunately, here, we had in place expertise. I doubt if that expertise is five, 10, 15, 20 miles out beyond the Capitol.

What sort of equipment and expertise do you have to do on-scene ascertainment of the presence or absence, say, of an anthrax or a chemical or biological attack?

PLAUGHER: Thank you, Senator, for the question. The Arlington County Fire Department does, in fact, have a large federal presence in our jurisdiction. We've been working on terrorism preparedness for many years, and there are some equipment shortfalls that we have recently requested through some channels for support from Congress on.

But it is a complex issue, and as we are dealing with these anthrax issues or situations -- I think that's an excellent way to describe it, Senator -- it is the whole ability to maintain continuity, the whole ability to not let our way of life be disrupted, and that is all about confidence. That is all about us, as first responders, having the necessary equipment to go out and deal with the package, the letter, the document, the box, or whatever, and exude confidence that we have the ability to analyze it properly and then make the right decision for the general wellbeing of the public.

So we do need that capability. We do need a specialized...

WARNER: You have some capability now...

PLAUGHER: Yes, sir, we do have some capability.

WARNER: ... but you are indicating it has to be enhanced with other equipment.

PLAUGHER: Right. We do have some capability now, and we have requested...

WARNER: And I have your request here, and I will, together with other colleagues from Virginia, put that into the appropriate appropriations channel here.

I thank the chair. I thank Mr. Smith.

PLAUGHER: Before the senator leaves -- he was a major player in the fire act of last year, and I know that goes without saying.

But, Mr. Chairman, you asked a question about needs for volunteer fire departments or fire departments nationwide, and that $100 million that was recently awarded to the fire services in the nation was a great start, but it does not meet our needs. We only funded six program areas this year, and there were 19,000 grant requests for those six program areas, totaling $3 billion, and there was only $100 million.

I know in my department, I submitted -- because you were allowed to submit for two -- I submitted for two grants, one of which was a cancer prevention grant for my department that would have allowed me to put my firefighters with a second set of turnout clothing so that they would not have to wear contaminated clothing in a situation like the Pentagon, because they would have had a set to be out to be decontaminated while they were working in the incident. And the second grant was for community public education in our wonderfully diverse community that we have in Arlington County, because we just simply don't have the resources to be effective with our diversity that we have.

Neither one of them were funded. Why? Because there's a huge need, because there are other volunteer fire departments out there that don't have one set of turnout clothing. We have simply got to fix what our first responders need in this nation.

Thank you, Senator. Thank you for your leadership last year.

JEFFORDS: Thank you very much, Chief, for sharing that information.

Senator Clinton?

CLINTON: Thank you.

I want to thank each of you for being here. I cannot tell you how much we appreciate your willingness to share your experiences and give us the benefit of your experience and your insight.

There are many specific issues that we need your help on. We've touched on some of those, the communications, the health follow-up, the additional funding into the fire act, a lot of very good ideas.

But I want to just ask, in addition to your being on the front lines, which you all have been -- and I remember meeting the Sacramento team and the Ohio team when I was there with the president, and I remember a number of you telling me you'd never been to New York before, and we were so grateful to see you then. In addition to your service, I know this is hard on your families. I know that it is a very big sacrifice when you go off to do the mission you're trained to do.

How are they doing? Is there more that we should do to try to support those who support you on the front lines?

Chief?

PLAUGHER: I think the families are part of the behind the scenes component that makes all of us successful. I know we're working real hard in our department to express our appreciation to the families.

We just had a simple gesture -- a picnic, where we invited all the firefighters and their families for a day, for an afternoon, to come and to share stories and to talk to our health care professionals and to talk to other members of the department so they know that they're not in this by themselves. They know that there are other family members who went through the same thing, which is their husband or wife being gone for long periods of time, staffing fire stations, because while we were engaged at the Pentagon, we still had to provide services to the community of Arlington and its businesses.

So there was a great burden -- days. Husbands and wives didn't see each other for simply a couple of weeks at a time. So we wanted to thank them, and I think that's what this nation needs to do. It also needs to thank the families of the first responders.

CLINTON: Captain?

METZINGER: One of the things that they set up for us at the convention center was a phone bank. That was the first time I'd seen something like that. I've been at a lot of campaign fires with wild land incidents in California where I'm using my cell phone on a mountain top someplace trying to reach my family.

But we were able to call from that site there at any time day or night, and it was a great thing for us to have. I could call home.

One of the first things my wife asked me when I got back was how much longer was I going to do this. I said, "Well, as long as I'm a firefighter, probably."

And I remember while I was working at this particular scene on the picture here, working with those New York firefighters, one day we were working -- one night, actually -- and I looked down, and I could see 60 or 70 feet down through there. And I said, "Oh, my gosh. Come here and look at this, you guys." And two of them said, "No, I don't want to look. Don't even talk to me about it." I said, "Come here, look. This is interesting." And he said, "No." And the guy looked at me and said, "Why are you doing this? Why are you here?" I said, "Well, I'm here to help. I'm a firefighter."

He didn't know I was a firefighter, actually. He thought FEMA was some kind of a federal unit that came out of someplace. I'm not sure where. But it was interesting. In his perspective, he wondered why we were there, and I said just to help.

But our families were worried, of course, at home. Our particular department set up a hotline that they could call 24 hours a day and get an update on what we were doing.

And if other teams aren't doing that, I'd really suggest it. It was very helpful, and if they had a need, they could call someone locally. One of our chiefs came to our house and changed the smoke detector, and somebody else came and mowed my lawn, and our neighbors brought over food. It was really a nice thing.

Our communities came together across this country. The fire service usually takes care of itself. We're a family, unlike any other, I think, and it's pretty nice to see that that happened with this event as well.

CLINTON: Mr. Hessinger?

HESSINGER: Mr. Chairman, Senator, I think I would echo the thoughts of the captain here. The critical incident stress system that they've put in place for firefighters now has come leap years ahead now in the last probably five or 10 years, especially since Oklahoma City. I think, as he said, firefighters take care of their own while they're in situations like this, and we also had hotlines set up.

But just continued support of the critical incident stress system and the debriefings and continued debriefings for families who need it would be all I could see.

CLINTON: Thank you.

HESSINGER (?): I have a personal note. My wife and I -- I have a two-way pager, and every morning on the bus ride to work, I'd page her and talk to her on the Internet and (OFF-MIKE). So this was -- you know, it bonded me with her, you know, even being that far away.

Also, she attended last night a stress debriefing for the spouses for Ohio Task Force 1 members. I called her -- it was supposed to start at 7 p.m., and I called at 8:30 and 9:00, and she wasn't home until 10:00. And it was really kind of amazing to me that -- there were only three of them there -- they spent that much time with them. So it really meant a lot to her.

CLINTON: I really thank you. I thank you for your service, and I thank you for your commitment. I think that we have to pay more attention to the support systems that our firefighters and our first response teams need, both for themselves and their families in order to be able to address all of the demands that they're now facing.

Thank you.

KOPPEL: For a few hours today, the Senate was in session voting on a routine spending bill. And for part of that time, the junior senator from New York, Hillary Clinton, presided over a chamber determined to project an image of business as usual. It's an image that didn't bear close scrutiny. Senate offices were shut down forcing senators and those aides who reported for work to operate from cell phones and brief cases. Over the course of these last few weeks, Senator Clinton has made several visits to ground zero back in lower Manhattan. But these days, she, too, has been displaced from her office by the anthrax scare. We talked on a stretch of lawn between the Capitol Building and the Supreme Court.

Senator HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (Democrat, New York): I think that we are engaged in a new kind of struggle with a very determined adversary who has studied us, who has taken advantage of our freedom, our openness, the kind of lives that we lead, who knows enough to target our media as well as our elected leadership. And we have to think in a very effective way, outside the box, about what we need to do to protect ourselves and to seek this network out and try to do everything we can to prevent it from disrupting and harming us. You know, there are a lot of fears that are legitimate concerns people have. We have to do a good job, number one, of providing information that is accurate and timely, so people can, you know, know what there is to be afraid of and what shouldn't bother them.

KOPPEL: Let me pursue that one with you for a moment because that's clearly one of the problems that we are facing in the media. Do we tell people everything that we know? We have to worry about telling people more than we know sometimes. In your position, you are going to learn some things which can frighten the public. Do you share that? In the knowledge that then we sort of draw on all the resources that we have around the country, or are there things the American public just cannot and should not know about what's happening?

Sen. CLINTON: I think you have to make a distinction between our military plans, our law enforcement activities to try to track down and arrest or end the terrorists' activities, from the kind of self-protective information that people should know about. You know, take this anthrax example. We know that anthrax is a dangerous substance, but that the more we find out about it, at least so far, the kinds of anthrax that have been used in these attacks are the treatable kind. So that people should not worry as much as I know that they currently are. And they should be realistic about their actual exposure. We have people, for example, who are really, you know, self-diagnosing and giving themselves antibiotics who have no known exposure, whatsoever. Now that could turn out to be a problem for them if they take antibiotics and build up some kind of immunity or resistance in the event that they were to need them. So there's information out there that I think has to be shared with the American public.

KOPPEL: The public really has not been particularly well informed. I mean, the secretary of Health and Human Services went on "60 Minutes" just a couple of weeks ago and said, in effect, we are prepared for any contingency. Truth of the matter is, that is not so. We are not prepared for any contingency. Do you share that with the American public? Do you go into the details of some of the great dangers that face our infrastructure? In New York City, you face in your state, some extraordinary dangers that I know some of the officials of New York are reluctant to talk about.

Sen. CLINTON: Well, again, I would draw the line at information that the public can do nothing about. You know, it really doesn't help to sit around worrying about a contingency that, if we were to discuss it, might give ideas, not just to terrorists, but unfortunately, the copycat kinds of people who are out there with their own grievances and grudges. So I think that any time there is a piece of information, I try to evaluate it to the extent that if it's at all possible, my presumption is share it. Let people know about it. Give them that information.

KOPPEL: Do you have any sense of--of what kind of a war we are confronting here, of how long it's going to be, of how drastic it's going to be? Of how many more of these kinds of incidents, not necessarily anthrax, but possibly something we haven't anticipated yet? In all the conversations you've had, all the briefings you've had, is there anything that gives you a sense of the shape of this yet?

Sen. CLINTON: I think that what we've been hearing about the need for patience and a resolute commitment to action over probably a number of years is accurate. Very few countries have totally eradicated terrorism. We have been extremely fortunate that we have not had to live with it the way others have.

KOPPEL: We have crossed kind of a line, haven't we?

Sen. CLINTON: Yes, we have.

KOPPEL: I mean in terms of our vulnerability.

Sen. CLINTON: Yes, and I think that September 11th was a terrible abrupt dividing point. But we have to recognize that there are very clever, committed adversaries out there who are going to try to take advantage of any vulnerability they see. We are going to be plugging those one by one, over the next weeks and months. Will that give us 100 percent safety? No. But, you know, we didn't have 100 percent safety against Timothy McVeigh.

KOPPEL: Some of the local officials here in Washington were very upset, not with you folks on the Senate side, but with the folks over on the House side because they, in effect, withdrew in the beginning of next week. Symbolic acts are important at times like these. Talk about that for a moment and why--why these differing decision from the two sides of the Congress.

Sen. CLINTON: You know, I don't have any information about the House's decisions. I know in our caucus and really in the entire Senate, we had a bipartisan discussion of this. Our feelings, I think you could say, were 100 percent against shutting down. And there were many reasons for it. Some of it was the symbolic message that we--would be sent. Some of it was the work we have still to do. We have a lot of work ahead of us. But the unanimous decision that our leadership and all of us agreed upon was to keep going, to have, you know, business and to be on the floor, voting and introducing even new legislation. I just presided over the Senate for an hour where new bills were introduced and debated. I think that's so important.

You know, a lot of us have been going back and looking for examples. A lot of people have been quoting, you know, the battle of Britain. And I look at the terrorist attack on the Torrey convention in Brighton some years ago where, you know, there were--there were deaths and injuries and great damage. You know, Margaret Thatcher, who you know, was noted for her understanding of the symbolic as well as the substantive, you know, put on her earrings and did a better job with her hair than I usually do, and marched out to give her speech.

KOPPEL: Senator Clinton, good of you to take the time and which tree are you setting up shop in here in...

Sen. CLINTON: I'm going back inside the Capitol, actually.

KOPPEL: Good for you.

Sen. CLINTON: Yeah.

KOPPEL: All right.

Sen. CLINTON: Thank you, Ted.

KOPPEL: Nice to see you.

U.S. SENATOR JAMES JEFFORDS (I-VT) HOLDS HEARING ON INFRA-STRUCTURE SECURITY, 11/1/2001

CLINTON: The hearing will be begun. And I turn first to our ranking member, Senator Smith.

SMITH: Thank you very much, Madam Chairman. I appreciate that.

Again, I did speak privately to the witnesses, but I want to apologize for having to make a brief statement and then leave. I'm going to try to get back. But we have -- I think at this point, 2 o'clock, I have three things going on at the same time. And one thing none of us have been able to learn to do around here is to be at the same place at the same time.

But I want to thank Senator Jeffords for conducting the hearing. The attacks that we all endured on September 11, and basically continue to endure ever since, have left this nation with a number of questions dealing with preparedness and security measures. But I think I have talked to almost each and every one of you personally, and I want to compliment all of you for the job that you're doing and will have to continue to do. It's not going to be easy.

As we read the papers, we hear more and more anthrax turning up in different locations in the country. And we did hear from Director Allbaugh a couple of weeks ago about the emergency responders and about the response in New York and the Pentagon and what lessons were learned.

And today, we take the next step. We want to consider whatever we can do to help you do your jobs better in legislative proposals. I think, obviously you can't sit around and wait for every legislative proposal. You have a job to do, and we understand that. But we want to try to help you in every way that we can to be better prepared should the unthinkable happen. And that's the spirit, I know that Senator Jeffords would agree, the spirit of this hearing.

There's a number of agencies within our jurisdiction that do play vital roles, in addition to your own. And I'm pleased that all of you could be here this afternoon. Assistant Secretary Sampson -- Dr. Sampson joined me about a month ago, I guess it's been, in New Hampshire. It's actually more than that because it was before -- yes, it was -- before September 11 -- to discuss economic development options in some of the northern communities in New Hampshire.

It's amazing how your priorities have changed as a result of -- we thought we had some terrible problems up there with the mill closing, and they are bad. But little did we know that very soon after that how serious we were going to have -- what problems we were going to have.

A couple of weeks ago I did meet with Mike Brown of FEMA to discuss some of the terrorism legislation and various pieces of legislation. And I want to thank all of you for working so closely with me on issues of importance not only to New Hampshire but the nation.

Look forward to hearing your thoughts. And I'll read them even if I'm not here to hear them. And -- at what needs to be done. There are a lot of bills out there to try to help. I don't -- I have some. I don't claim to be the authority on all of them. But we want to get the dialog started and the debate started. And I hope you will all, at some point in the future, offer your views on these bills regarding such things as coherent national strategy, federal coordinating and planning.

We heard Director Allbaugh talk about the fact that we need to -- what's the word I want? -- the band of communications. That this is a big issue on how we communicate in a time of emergency. Everybody's on a separate radio band. And we had a meeting in New Hampshire with the governor about this issue. And that came up that that was -- they were very concerned about that. And so, I think that's one that we're going to have to address.

So, I know Senator Clinton, as well, has been working hard on legislation dealing with small businesses and others that were right there in the eye of the storm.

So I thank you again, Mr. Chairman, for conducting the hearing. I apologize to you and the witnesses and my colleagues for having to leave.

JEFFORDS: Well, I'm sorry, but I didn't get here either. So you don't have to apologize. I'm apologizing to you.

SMITH: Well, you know, I really was inclined to grab that gavel, but Senator Clinton got it before me.

(LAUGHTER)

JEFFORDS: Well, I should have known I shouldn't have been concerned about not being here. But anyway...

(LAUGHTER)

Actually, I got caught up in the -- we had for the luncheon speaker the head of NIH who was telling us all about anthrax and who ought to be in charge. So I got a little carried away. I was listening, and suddenly I was reminded that I wasn't where I was supposed to be. So I apologize for that. But here I am, and I'll make my opening statement now, and we'll get on. OK.

I want to -- especially want to thank the witnesses from the various federal agencies for appearing here today and look forward to hearing from all of you.

Tuesday night I watched game three of the World Series. I watched the game, I was hastened by the pictures of -- heartened by the pictures of faithful fans cheering their beloved teams. And a tattered flag flapped in the breeze in the outfield, the same flag that had been pulled from the rubble of Tower Two three days after the World Trade Center disaster.

During the seventh-inning stretch, the anthem, "God Bless America" replaced the familiar refrain of "Take Me Out to the Ball Game." And on the field in storied Yankee Stadium at the grand old city, two teams competed in the fall classic.

And as I marveled at the sights and the sounds, I was overcome with the feeling that our collective efforts as a nation, we will overcome this very sad chapter in our history.

But the healing journey will not be an easy one. Many additional responsibilities have been thrust upon each of us by this change. A successful journey to recover will require citizens and communities across America to come together to lend a helping hand and to strengthen the feeble knees.

Where we take our journey together as a nation, we must not forget the horrible events of September 11 or the people directly affected by those attacks. It is in this spirit that we gather here today to discuss various legislative proposals to aid the victims of these very tragic events.

I would like to acknowledge Senator Clinton's tireless efforts to address and to anticipate the needs of citizens affected by this tragedy.

You've done a great job, and I'd like to let everybody know.

The senator has listened to her constituents. She has worked with the city and the state officials, and she has put forward credible proposals worthy of our serious and expedited attention. I trust that we will have a candid and forthright discussion of these proposals.

A successful journey to recovery will also require improved critical infrastructure security. Just yesterday, I heard about a recent event at the Florida medical -- chemical storage facility which underscores this point.

I was alarmed and, quite frankly, a bit incredulous to learn that only a few days ago, a significant quantity of lethal pesticide, methyl bromide, was stolen from a Florida chemical storage facility. Apparently, the thieves absconded with the poison through a hole cut in the facility's fence while security personnel stood guard. How could this happen? This is unacceptable. We must act.

I applaud Senator Corzine for recognizing the need for improved chemical site security and for introducing legislation to attempt to remedy the problem.

You arrived right on cue. Thank you.

(LAUGHTER)

I look forward to an open and honest debate on the subject. And I look forward to a meaningful discussion on how we can improve the security of our nation's water supply, nuclear facilities and federal buildings.

And I also want to thank my good friend, Senator Smith, and his staff for the help and cooperation over the last several weeks. We have traveled together to the World Trade Center. We have seen the devastation. And we share a commitment to help this nation heal.

Speaking to a group of young Americans just after the turn of the 20th century, Mark Twain advised, "Always do the right thing. This will gratify some and astonish the rest."

As this legislative session draws to a close, let this committee do the right thing. Let us work in a bipartisan and timely fashion to aid victims of the recent terrorist attacks on our soil and to take the necessary steps within the committee's jurisdiction to improve the nation's critical infrastructure security.

Our national journey to recovery may be a long one. But if we join together as an American family, I am confident we can make it.

Thank you very much. And we will now proceed.

Senator Clinton?

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And I thank you and your ranking member and your staffs for the extraordinary support, both personally and officially, that you have provided to New York and to me.

And I'd like to thank all of the agencies represented here who have done a very, you know, commendable job in working to ensure that we recover and rebuild after the horrific attacks on our nation.

I have to say that we in New York -- and there is a delegation of business and labor and elected officials who have been making the rounds, talking to senators and House members on both sides of the aisle -- are in an awkward and somewhat challenging position.

On the one hand, we are resilient. The Yankees are going to win the Series again.

(LAUGHTER)

And everyone is doing their very best to have the stiffest possible upper lip in the face of the extraordinary damage that we have suffered.

But if you go back to ground zero, you know that the fires are still burning. The impact of the devastation is beyond our understanding and very difficult for us to fully calculate even at this time. We have almost 1 million tons of rubble still awaiting removal, despite the extraordinary efforts that have already been undertaken to remove tens and hundreds of thousands of tons. And we know we're in for quite a long recovery period.

CLINTON: In speaking with many of my constituents, there are a number of issues that I have raised, and I appreciate very much the work that some of you have done in a short period of time to respond to these ideas, because there are gaps that are difficult for us to fill under existing legislative authority. And I have no pride of authorship, I'm just looking for solutions.

And if we can enhance discretionary authority, if we can create new vehicles by amending the Stafford Act or looking at EDA or CDBG more creatively, we can solve these problems. That's what we're looking for.

I just want to quickly run through four that I have seen.

One is that, now that people are coming out of their shock and denial, we're faced with a lot of very serious issues concerning the children who have been directly affected.

I have proposed creating a children's coordinating office within FEMA to pay particular attention to the needs of children who have lost one or both parents. We are only now beginning to assess what that would include, whether there would be need for mental health services, guardianships, temporary care services. But clearly, we need more of a focus so that we particularly pay attention to children who don't have adult representatives or advocates that can really speak for them.

The second issue is to track the health of the victims, volunteers and workers who have been exposed to harmful substances. This would amend the Stafford Act to allow for this kind of health protection assessment and monitoring.

We have been monitoring the air, and I'm very confident that the results that we're getting, which demonstrate that there are not broad-scale problems with the air, are absolutely accurate. But no one argues that right there on the site there are problems, and those problems are intense.

And we've had some people working in that rubble now for nearly two months. And they have worked, they've worked day and night. Many of them have been exposed to the air. We're not hearing colloquially referred to something as the "World Trade Center cough," because it's been reported that 11,000 firefighters have worked at ground zero. Almost 4,000 are being treated with steroid inhalers for severe cough.

Under the amendment I have proposed for the Stafford Act, FEMA would carry an outreach, education protection and monitoring program based upon a determination by the president that harmful substances have been released into a disaster area.

We need to track these workers. We need to get the best possible baseline, and then we need to act to help them with their health issues.

The third is an unemployment assistance bill, which would extend unemployment assistance under the disaster as provided by the Stafford Act for an additional 26 weeks, for a total of 52 weeks, for any individual to receive DUA as a result of the attacks.

Thousands of individuals have become unemployed because their businesses no longer exist or, frankly, their businesses, even if they're up and going, are not only in a disaster zone but in a crime-scene zone and people can't get to them because of the police barricades and the difficulty of knowing what streets are open, when.

Currently, nearly 25,000 individuals have applied for disaster unemployment. The applicants are expected to grow. We have to really take care of these people. That's something that I feel very strongly about, to help them go through this transition, hopefully by some other means, get these businesses up and going, and they can return to work.

And that brings me to my final proposal. I believe we should establish an office of World Trade Center attack claims. We did lose nearly 25 million square of office space. We've displaced 850 businesses. We've displaced over 125,000 people. And access has been denied to 9,000 other businesses partly because of the crime-scene designation and the debris removal effort.

Senator Schumer and I are introducing this bill to help address the needs of businesses that frankly can't apply for the existing SBA loans. They don't know they're going to be in business in six months. Even if it's a zero-percent-interest-rate loan, they don't feel that they can sign for it.

And this proposed office of World Trade Center attack claims is modeled after, though much more narrower, than the Office of Cerro Grande Fire Claims that was created in response to the New Mexico fires last year.

The Cerro Grande model has been proven to work. As of this past August, the Office of Cerro Grande Fire Claims has processed and awarded more than 13,700 claims, totaling over $207 million.

Based on the lessons we've learned, we've worked significantly to limit the scope of this proposed office both in terms of eligible claimants and eligible injuries for reimbursement. This obviously would come if we were to authorize it out of the $20 billion that has already been set aside and supported by the president for disaster recovery and assistance efforts.

We'd be seeking to use between $1 and $2 billion of that $20 billion for this office. By comparison, $450 million was appropriated for the Cerro Grande Fire Claims Office.

I believe that these steps are very important and help to bridge some of the authorized authority and plug some of the gaps that we have found now that we're on the ground trying to help people exist.

And I very much appreciate the extraordinary help we've received from the staff of this committee, Mr. Chairman. They've really helped us work through this. And I look forward to hearing from our witnesses any way that we can either, within the existing legislation or through the ideas I'm proposing, help create some solutions for the problems that we still find.

Thank you very much.

JEFFORDS: Thank you for a very excellent statement.

Senator Corzine?

CORZINE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I, too, want to congratulate you on holding this hearing on economic recovery and infrastructure security. There is hardly anything that captures the public's imagination, save anthrax, I think, more than making sure that we put in proper position the everyday lives that we are now operating with.

And, you know, this has obviously taken a huge toll, as Senator Clinton has talked about, at the epicenter of this in New York City. And I support wholeheartedly all of the efforts that are now working their way through our processes here to make sure that they're appropriately addressed.

But I do want to make sure that people also understand that there is a metropolitan community surrounding New York City, and a number of the communities in northern New Jersey, in particular, are deeply impacted with regard to human loss. And certainly some of the economic issues that Senator Clinton outlined have major impact on small business, in particular, in our communities.

The federal government has a large role to play here. FEMA has done an outstanding job in spearheading this, but some of the rules that surround FEMA don't bite necessarily effectively with regard to a number of the problems that have come up, whether it's in New York City or small businesses on the west side of the Holland or Lincoln tunnel that are impacted almost as seriously by the lack of attention that comes out of the way that the Stafford Act is structured.

And I think there is real need for us to go back and parse through that to make sure that necessary changes are put in place to deal with a different kind of attack, just as we're dealing with a different kind of war.

And I certainly intend to support Senator Clinton's and the chairman's proposals in this regard. And I look forward to working with them and staff to make sure that they truly meet the needs of post-September 11.

With regard to infrastructure, as I said, I think this is one of those things that the public is looking to all of us as public officials to bring greater elements of security to potential targets. And whether that's our water systems, nuclear power plants, chemical facilities, natural gas pipelines, whatever the issues that could be specific vehicles for terrorist attack, I think we are remiss if we don't make sure that we have in place the kinds of quality checks and balances to make sure that these are secure.

In that vein, yesterday, along with partnership of the chairman and Senator Clinton, I had introduced legislation that addresses one of these problems, which is a serious issue before we contemplated terrorism, and that is threats to our chemical processing and distribution infrastructure, which is a serious issue.

We've had a number of tragic accidents in New Jersey itself through history that have cost life. And there -- a very recent example in France, which cost almost 180 lives, I think make very clear that this is something that needs to be addressed.

I think our legislation, working with staff, has been able to come up with an act that I think will be not too heavy-handed but definitely proactive in moving us forward. And I look forward to working with the chairman and the committee to make sure that we get this in ship shape and forward.

Again, I think what you are doing here and the kinds of suggestions that are here in the committee are terrific steps forward and do a lot to bring both public confidence and also deal with the enormity of the tragedy that occurred September 11 in New York City.

So thank you for having this, and I look forward to hearing from the witnesses and appreciate their efforts in preparation.

Thank you.

JEFFORDS: Thank you for your excellent statements.

And I also want to thank my staff who have put together the hearings today and are moving us into this very important and essential area.

I also want to thank Mr. Brown just especially. I had the opportunity to work with you and all of the FEMA staff both at the Pentagon and back in New York City. And the amazing cooperation I found, which is so much due to your leadership of the coordination of the local communities as well as the federal, it was just a wonderful experience to watch you all operate. Appreciate that.

BROWN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

JEFFORDS: Mr. Brown, please proceed.

BROWN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Senator Corzine, Senator Clinton. I am very pleased to be here this afternoon on behalf of Director Albaugh.

Today I want to reiterate a couple of points that the director made during his testimony last month. And the first one is probably most important, that you just alluded to just now, Mr. Chairman, and that is the incredible cooperation that we're getting from all of our federal partners, the other agencies.

And I want to take just a moment away from my prepared text and just say a short comment about the extraordinary cooperation that I think that we're getting from the members of the legislative branch also.

I know I have met with Senator Clinton and the New York delegation, and I would like to extend that invitation. We ought to do that more often I think, Senator. It helps us figure out what the problems are that maybe we're not getting addressed, and gives us time to go back and figure out ways to get those addressed. So to the extent that we can continue to do that, I think we ought to do that.

Senator Corzine, I would add that I've had conversations just today with Governor Ridge about some issues that have arisen in New Jersey. And again, I think it would be helpful if we just got together and talked some time about some of those issues and how we might address those.

BROWN: Because I think they're really issues that we can resolve just by getting together and talking face to face and saying, "What are you hearing out there that maybe we're not hearing in terms of the disaster field office?" And if we can do that, I think it can resolve a lot of problems.

But the second point that I want to make, just to return to my prepared remarks, and that is that I think oftentimes we take for granted one main point, and that is the Stafford Act actually does work. The legislative framework that this committee has provided to us really provides us the necessary tools to carry out both the response and recovery mission of the agency and, in particular, in response to the attacks of September 11.

Just briefly, some of those authorities give us the support for the urban search and rescue task forces, which I think we all agree have done an incredible response in New York and at the Pentagon.

It allows us to mission-assign other departments and agencies to take care of activities that need to be taken care of that perhaps the other departments and agencies aren't entirely focused on, allows us to coordinate those quickly and efficiently.

It allows us to provide temporary housing assistance. It allows us to rebuild the public infrastructure.

It allows us something that we often take for granted, we don't think about often enough: It allows us to provide crisis counseling for those who have suffered, and it allows us to assist those state and local governments who have given everything they can and yet are losing so much.

Those particular authorities, I think, absolutely empower FEMA to do the job that it needs to do in responding to all types of disasters, whether or not they're manmade or natural disasters.

As we look at particular changes, I want to thank Senator Smith, who has now left but I'll pass it on to the staff, for all of their effort to help us with the Office of National Preparedness and actually taking some of those authorities and putting them into law. We appreciate both the intent and the spirit of that legislation, and we thank the ranking member for his help in that regard and look forward to working with him in the future on that.

FEMA is uniquely suited to work closely with state, local and tribal (ph) governments to ensure their consequence-management planning, their training and their equipment needs are met. FEMA and its Office of National Preparedness will continue to support the Office of Homeland Security and Governor Ridge in those efforts.

I want to call the committee's attention to the technical amendments we transmitted to the committee on September 21. We believe those are modest changes that will improve our ability to carry out our job in responding to all types of attacks.

Over the past several days, we have looked very quickly, I might add, very quickly at a lot of legislative ideas that have been drafted. We do understand and we appreciate both the good will and the sound purpose of the authors of those amendments and the intent of those amendments. To the extent that we can, we should use current federal authorities and programs before creating new or duplicative efforts.

I don't want any of my comments, though, to be taken in the wrong context. I think we all agree we're here for really three purposes: How can we help? How can we do more? And what can we do better? And to that extent we want to work as closely as we can with you in resolving any problems that are outstanding.

One bill would require FEMA, in coordination with the FCC and the Department of Defense, to conduct a study to determine the resources that are needed to develop an effective communication system for the use of emergency response personnel during disasters.

Clearly, we have no objection to this concept. Director Albaugh has testified, and we've spoken to many members of the Senate about the need to get a coordinated response system that allows us to communicate across all types of systems.

The only thing I would ask the committee is to consider the time frame in which we do that study and, of course, the resources needed to conduct that type of study.

Another bill under consideration would establish within FEMA the Office of World Trade Center Attack Claims to reimburse individuals and businesses that were injured by the Trade Center attacks on September 11. The draft legislation would establish the center and would require the director or an individual claims manager appointed by the director to reimburse claimants for losses suffered as a result of the World Trade Center attacks.

We believe the Stafford Act already contains a broad range of authorities that were triggered by President Bush's declaration of a major emergency. Nevertheless, it is clear that the draft legislation would cover a substantially broader range of injuries and losses than FEMA is currently authorized to address under the Stafford Act.

As you are aware, Congress recently enacted the Air Transportation Safety and System Stabilization Act. Title IV of that particular act authorizes the Justice Department to provide compensation to any person or relatives of a deceased person who was either injured or killed in the September 11 attacks.

Although the draft legislation creates a claims office within FEMA to provide assistance to a broader range of claimants than is currently provided by the Air Transportation Safety and System Stabilization Act, we are concerned about creating a separate claims office within FEMA.

We might recommend that before this legislation proceeds further, we consider the idea of placing some of that claims processing within the Justice Department rather than FEMA because of some of the programs they're currently administering.

In addition to our concern about potentially duplicative claims processing authorities, we believe it may be preferable to consider legislation in this situation to authorize additional flexibility within the Stafford Act as opposed to a different claims office. Again, the intent is, we agree, we ought to make certain we're taking care of all those victims, let's just figure out the best track to do that.

Another of the bills that I would like to address would amend the Stafford Act to authorize the president to appoint a children's coordinating officer whenever an emergency or major disaster has caused children to lose or more custodial parents.

In every disaster, FEMA is concerned about the effects that these events have on children. FEMA is already authorized to provide crisis counseling assistance to disaster victims. We administer this authority by funding the states' cost of administering counseling services.

New York's application addresses the need to provide counseling services to children who have been suffered and affected by the attack. According to the New York Office of Mental Health, these activities are being provided through outreach programs, through education and other existing children's services to those children who have suffered tragically by this attack.

In addition, and a point I don't want to gloss over too quickly, but FEMA's Disaster Legal Services Program can provide direct assistance to children who have lost parents in a disaster.

I just met with that group during the ABA convention in Chicago a few months ago, and I'm pleased to say that I think they're an incredible group of young people from the Young Lawyers Division who are concerned about providing guardianship advice, providing any sorts of advice that these children may need in terms of providing legal services that they might need to get the services provided by other agencies or departments.

The proposed amendment to Section 410 of the Stafford Act would extend the availability of disaster unemployment assistance an additional 26 weeks, up to a full year, for individuals who are already eligible for such assistance. FEMA routinely tasks the Labor Department to administer this authority on our behalf, and Labor does so in conjunction with its administration of its generic unemployment assistance authority.

Most individuals who become unemployed as a result of a presidentially declared disaster qualify for the unemployment assistance that the Labor Department administers under its own authorities. The unemployment claims that have been filed in the aftermath of the attacks are being paid by the Labor Department under the general unemployment assistance authorities and under the disaster unemployment assistance provision of the Stafford Act.

Because of the uniqueness of this situation, the administration does support a 13-week extension of the availability of unemployment assistance benefits for qualifying individuals as a result of the attack, both under the Labor authority and the DUA provisions of the Stafford Act itself.

The final draft bill that I would ask to address in this hearing would amend the Stafford Act to authorize the president to implement a program to protect the health and safety of emergency-response personnel in the aftermath of the disasters which have caused harmful substances to be released.

FEMA routinely calls on the Environmental Protection Agency and the Department of HHS for expertise in accessing these types of concerns in the aftermath of disasters. This system has worked efficiently, and we therefore, are not aware of any need to amend the Stafford Act to address this issue.

But to the extent that there are issues on the ground at ground zero that need to be addressed, we want to address those promptly and efficiently.

Finally, the committee letter mentioned a need to amend the Stafford Act's temporary housing authority to increase the amount of funding that may be provided to repair ownership-occupied housing that is damaged in a major disaster.

There is a new provision in the Stafford Act to take effect in May 2002 that would impose a $5,000 cap on this form of temporary housing assistance.

In previous correspondence, we have asked the committee to amend this provision because of the unintended severe hardship on disaster victims with the lowest incomes and the most significant disaster impacts. While the cap does not effect the response in New York, we continue to urge the committee to make this technical amendment before the cap takes effect in May.

BROWN: In closing, I just want to add, despite any differences that might exist about technical amendments, that might exist about some of the legislation that's now before this committee, FEMA is absolutely committed to sitting down with each and every one of you to find out where those needs are not being addressed and how can we address those under the existing authorities. And if we can't, then let's work on some existing -- or work on some new legislation.

But to that extent, I'll be happy to answer any questions that the committee may have down the road.

JEFFORDS: Well, thank you very much.

BROWN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

JEFFORDS: Mr. Moravec, I enjoyed meeting with you last week. And we had an interesting discussion. And I'm sure you're going to cover some of those issues in your discussion today. And so, please proceed.

MORAVEC: Good afternoon, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee. I am Joe Moravec, commissioner of the Public Building Service. Thank you for the opportunity to discuss improving security in GSA-owned and -leased facilities.

We have had an ongoing effort to improve our security measures. In addition to our own initiatives, H.R. 307 was introduced in January of this year to provide for the reform of the Federal Protective Service and to enhance the safety of federal employees, the public and children enrolled in child care facilities located in facilities under GSA's control.

A significant proposal in H.R. 307, the establishment of the Federal Protective Service as a separate service from PBS, did not have support from GSA nor the Senate. The principle reason we oppose making the Federal Protective Service a separate service within our agency is that it would divorce security from other federal facility functions when the opposite needs to be done.

Security needs to be tightly integrated into decisions about the location, design and operation of federal facilities. Divorcing FPS would create an organizational barrier between protection experts and the Public Building Service asset managers, planners, project managers and facilities managers who oversee the daily operations in our facilities.

A separate GSA security service would lead to confusion about who was responsible for what in GSA's security efforts. It is also contrary to agency efforts to present our customers with a seamless GSA capable of offering more integrated workplace solutions.

Last year, the Senate Transportation and Infrastructure Subcommittee recommended the establishment of direct line authority within PBS. The administrator subsequently reorganized the Federal Protective Service and reassigned the reporting authority to the Federal Protective Service assistant commissioner in the central office.

Under direct line authority, PBS has made substantial strides in fulfilling our mission to reduce the threat to federal facilities under GSA control nationwide.

The Federal Protective Service budget, personnel actions and operational focus have been centralized to yield results better than that which could be obtained by establishing a separate competing service.

Leading the Federal Protective Service is acting Assistant Commissioner Richard Yamamoto, who is here with me today. Mr. Yamamoto is a graduate of the FBI National Academy with over 20 years of law enforcement experience in the U.S. Army. He also spent seven years coordinating joint federal, state and local law enforcement activities through the High-Intensity Drug Trafficking Areas Program at the Office of National Drug Control Policy.

Not only does Mr. Yamamoto possess extensive law enforcement and security skills, he also has been designated as a certified protection professional, which is one of the premier accomplishments in the field of security.

Within Federal Protective Service, we are developing and requiring both law enforcement and security core competencies for all of our operational managers. While most of our current managers have federal, military or local police training and experience, those who do not have law enforcement training will be sent to the Leadership Academy law enforcement course at the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center in Glynco, Georgia, to attain these necessary skills.

Specifically, addressing the proposal in H.R. 307 that there should be at least 730 full-time equivalent FPS police officers, we believe that FTE levels should not be based on an arbitrary number set forth in legislation, but rather on the threat that may vary from time to time. FPS regularly conducts individual facility security surveys and regional threat assessments to determine the threat to federal facilities. FTE requirements are based upon these threat assessments.

Specifically, we are increasing the number of our criminal investigators and uniformed law enforcement security officers who have both law enforcement and security competencies.

That concludes my prepared testimony. I am, of course, available to answer whatever questions you may have.

JEFFORDS: Thank you very much.

Dr. Sampson?

SAMPSON: Chairman Jeffords, members of the committee, it's a pleasure to be with you today.

The administration and the Department of Commerce and the Economic Development Administration are committed to the economic revitalization of the New York economy. As you're aware, the administration is providing considerable funding for efforts that are under way to promote the city's recovery and economic revitalization.

And in this context, this means that we are developing a multi-prong approach at getting people back to work and businesses, both large and small, back on their feet as quickly as possible.

The Economic Development Administration has contributed to previous disaster response efforts and has the statutory authority to assist communities in long-term economic recovery efforts. We participated in those recovery efforts dating back to 1969 and Hurricane Camille. We play a supplemental role to the lead role played by FEMA, SBA and other agencies, including the Department of Transportation and Housing and Urban Development.

Let me speak just a little bit about the redevelopment strategy as I see it.

While it is important the federal, state and city governments move as quickly as possible to address the economic impacts in New York City, it's also critically important that economic revitalization efforts be based on a sound understanding of the New York City economic landscape, both prior to September 11 and post-September 11 to ensure that federal efforts are truly market-based and phased appropriately in light of the projected time line for clearing the World Trade Center site.

The administration is committed to taking a thorough, comprehensive and coordinated market-based approach in addressing New York's immediate and long-term economic recovery efforts. And to this end, we believe it is vitally important to work not only with state and city officials but also with New York's business leaders.

With that in mind, last week several senior administration officials met with New York City business leaders and the New York City Partnership, the leadership of which includes CEOs of some of the global businesses headquartered in New York.

The New York City Partnership has commissioned seven of the world's leading consulting firms, including A.T. Kearny, Booz-Allen, Baine (ph), Boston Consulting Group, KPMG McKenzie (ph) and PricewaterhouseCoopers, to assess the economic impact of the World Trade Center attack on New York City and identify investment priorities for renewal.

Based on our conversations with New York City business leaders, my sense is that the most urgent need is to focus on recovery of businesses in the collateral damaged area because ground zero cleanup is probably a year away.

The best information that I have seems to indicate that there are approximately 5,000 businesses directly affected in New York City at ground zero, as well as the cordoned off areas that Senator Clinton mentioned earlier. Approximately 4,000 of those are small businesses that previously employed about 77,000 people. These are the most vulnerable businesses.

Because of the indeterminate extent of the New York City recovery plan and time line, it is evident that loans will not be the most appropriate vehicle in support of these businesses. And they can only be retained by some sort of grant program.

To that end, the director of Office of Management and Budget, Mitch Daniels, earlier today announced the release of additional funds from the emergency supplemental appropriation that New York can use for such grants to businesses.

The administration is currently providing significant funding to New York through a variety of agencies, many of whom are at this table today. And the administration is looking at a range of existing government programs for a comprehensive solution.

The administration is focused on ensuring that economic recovery funding is effective and truly focused on rebuilding New York City's economic infrastructure in order to get people back to work and businesses up and running again as soon as possible.

I believe that working together in this fashion with the private sector as a very important part of that, we will not disappoint those who need the assistance of an effective, coordinated federal, state and local response to rebuilding the economic infrastructure.

And of course, I'd be pleased to answer any questions that the committee may have.

JEFFORDS: Thank you very much. Very helpful.

Mr. Meserve, pleasure to be with you again, too.

MESERVE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee.

I am pleased to have been invited to appear before you on behalf of the United States Nuclear Regulatory Commission. I will discuss programs related to safeguards and security for NRC licensed commercial nuclear facilities, as well as actions that NRC and its licensees have taken in response to the terrorist acts that occurred on September 11.

I have submitted a longer statement for the record. Allow me to provide just a brief summary.

The NRC response began immediately after the September 11 attacks. Within 30 minutes of the plane strikes, we activated and staffed the NRC Operation Center at NRC headquarters and the Incident Response Centers at NRC regional offices. And we began close coordination with the FBI and other intelligence and law enforcement agencies, our licensees and various military, state and local authorities.

Shortly after the attacks, we advised all our major licensees to go to the highest level of physical security, which they promptly did.

We have provided continuing oversight and advice to our licensees since September 11.

As of today, the NRC and our licensees are still in a heightened state of security readiness. Our headquarters operations center and regional response centers are fully staffed 24 hours per day, seven days per week. We are prepared to make adjustments to security measures as circumstances warrant.

NRC activities related to domestic safeguards and security and emergency response can be grouped into four categories:

First, developing and implementing requirements for safeguarding nuclear facilities and materials and inspecting for compliance with those requirements.

Second, assessing the threat environment, including the international environment insofar as it has implications for domestic threats.

Third, maintaining and coordinating emergency response capabilities.

And finally, providing physical security for NRC employees and offices.

Beginning in the late 1970s, the NRC established requirements to safeguard civilian nuclear power plants and fuel facilities. The result is that nuclear power plants are among the most hardened civilian facilities in this country. The NRC inspects these facilities to verify compliance with NRC requirements, to assess licensee safety performance and to enforce our regulations.

In the aftermath of the terrorist attacks on September 11 and the continuing uncertainty about future terrorist intentions, the NRC is undertaking a comprehensive review of its safeguards and physical security program. We currently are interacting with the FBI, other federal law enforcement and intelligence organizations, the military, and the newly established Office of Homeland Security so that necessary changes to our programs consider pertinent information from all relevant federal agencies.

We also are reevaluating the agency's ability to communicate with the press, the public and interested parties, regarding information relevant to security and physical protection of our licensees.

As the commission conducts its comprehensive reassessments of plant safeguards and security, we recognize that specific legislative needs may become apparent. In the interim, the commission on June 22 submitted legislative proposals to your committee that we believe we need now.

Specifically, we are seeking legislation that would amend the Atomic Energy Act to enhance the protection provided by guards at designated NRC licensed nuclear facilities; to criminalize sabotage of nuclear facilities during their construction; and to make clear that the unauthorized introduction of weapons or explosives into nuclear facilities will be subject to significant federal criminal penalties for the individuals involved.

I might add that we submitted that legislative proposal well before September 11.

We have also recently developed a fourth proposed statutory change. We seek to confer upon guards at NRC-designated facilities the authority to possess or use weapons that are comparable to the Department of Energy guard force's or other federal protective forces.

In closing, I would like to reiterate that the NRC had a strong security and physical protection program in place prior to September 11, and we are building on that strong foundation. We look forward to working with the Congress to address our mutual concerns and determine where the assets of our nation are best deployed to fight the terrorist threat.

I appreciate your invitation to appear here today to discuss the NRC's programs. And of course, I am prepared to respond to your questions. Thank you.

JEFFORDS: Well, thank you. And we'll have questions, I assure you, and look forward to working with you.

Mr. Mitchell, you've had a tough time, I know. This is not something that you experience very often and -- obviously, to be facetious. But appreciate all the work you've done. Please proceed.

MITCHELL: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, my name is Herb Mitchell. I am the associate administrator for Disaster Assistance, and I'm appearing on behalf of the agency in the absence of Administrator Barreto.

We thank the committee today for allowing us to come and just share with you what SBA's role has been, not only in all disasters, but particularly in New York City. SBA continues to play an immediate and major role in providing disaster assistance loans, not only for businesses, but for homeowners and renters as well.

While certainly the disaster in New York is different in scope, but it does provide us with the same opportunity to assist in the immediate recovery of New York City, the region and the nation as a whole.

In this disaster and all disasters, we have experienced a great deal of cooperation within the federal family with FEMA. We certainly, in the past, have worked with EDA and HUD in terms of economic recovery in disasters all around the country.

FEMA certainly serves as the coordinator and the one-shop stop to ensure that those that are in need of disaster assistance has one place to come. And at that point, all businesses are referred to SBA for assistance.

Since the afternoon of September the 11th, the SBA has been in lower Manhattan working with FEMA, state agencies to coordinate our response to the recovery effort.

SBA has since deployed 94 people to New York City to complement our staff in Niagara Falls where the actual processing has taken place with about 200 employees there as well. We certainly have employees around the country that are available to us in the need to supplement that staff in Niagara Falls.

SBA's disaster program is the primary federal program for funding recovery for private-sector disaster victims. The program provides low-interest loans not to exceed 4 percent to applicants without credit available elsewhere, and a higher rate at 8 percent -- not to exceed 8 percent for those who do have credit available elsewhere.

We offer loans to repair real and personal property for homeowners, business loans to repair the property that's lost by the businesses in New York, economic injury loans to provide working capital to sustain those businesses until they are able to return to normal operations.

And a recent addition has been the military reservist loan program where the small businesses around the country that are impacted as the result of a key employee being called to active duty, those businesses that are impacted economically are also eligible to apply for working capital assistance.

To compliment the programs that SBA has available, we've been working with the New York State's Empire Development Agency and several financial institutions in New York where we have -- actually the city of New York and the state, along with these financial institutions have set up bridge loan and gap loan programs.

The bridge loan program is intended to provide those businesses with immediate assistance until the SBA application process is completed. And then at that point, we're able to pay off those loans to the bank.

The gap financing is intended to address those needs that the SBA loans do not or are unable to address either because of size limitations or because they may not fall within the eligibility criteria. The gap financing that the lenders are providing will certainly try to address those needs.

MITCHELL: As of October 31, the SBA has made almost 1,000 loans for $82 million.

Historically, under the disaster program, our assistance has been limited to the declared disaster area. In this case, it would be New York City and the immediate area and the state of Virginia as well. But because of the unprecedented nature of this attack and the widespread economic impact that has caused around the country, SBA, working with the administration, has expanded the economic injury programs around the country to allow those small businesses that have been impacted by the terrorist attack or subsequent federal action, most of which have consisted of closure of airports and security measures along the border -- for those small businesses that have been economically impacted as well, regardless of where they're located, to apply for economic disaster loans.

Mindful of the nature of the businesses located in lower Manhattan, the administration has also submitted to, one, increase the size standards for businesses in New York City, to address the need where we find there are a number of small businesses or medium-sized businesses, based on our current size standards, would not qualify for the working capital assistance.

We've also proposed legislation that would allow financial service organizations and non-profits to be eligible. Historically, these categories or industries have not been included in the assistance for working capital assistance.

Also, recognizing the tremendous need in New York, we are also proposing that we have the authority to raise the $1.5 million loan cap that's currently in place, to increase that to $10 million.

SBA's disaster loan program is also complimented by our regular loan programs and the technical assistance programs that we're able to provide through our resource partners, including the Small Business Development Centers, the Woman (ph) Business Centers, the Business Information Centers and the Senior Corps Retired Executives, which have all been brought to bear in providing assistance to businesses in the New York City community.

We look forward to working with you, with all of you, to help the citizens of New York as well as those around the country that refuse to let terror destroy what we have collectively worked to build.

In closing, I just simply want to share with you -- while Administrator Barreto and I were in New York on our first visit, we met a business owner -- and just share with you what he told us at that time. He said the terrorists tried to declare victory by destroying the World Trade Center, but insisted they would not score second victory by closing his business.

This is the patriotism and this is the spirit that we've seen every time we visited New York. There were business owners there that want to get back in business. They simply want the customers to return so that they can get on with their lives.

I would be pleased to answer any questions that you may have. Thank you.

JEFFORDS: Well, thank you, Mr. Mitchell.

Ms. Savenko (ph), please proceed.

SAVENKO (ph): Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, thank you for the opportunity to discuss the Environmental Protection Agency's role in domestic terrorism preparedness and, more specifically, the agency's role in protection of the nation's water resources.

The tragic events of September 11 have raised valid concerns over our nation's vulnerability to terrorist attack. As a nation, we are scrutinizing our efforts to prepare for and prevent terrorist threats. Realizing that we must always remain vigilant to new threats and must always be ready to respond, the agency welcomes the opportunity this hearing offers to examine these issues.

My testimony today covers four major areas: EPA's role in counterterrorism preparedness and response before and after September 11; a specific discussion of drinking water protection related to the September 11 attack; EPA's overall protection of our nation's drinking water; and the critical federal coordination needed to meet the counterterrorism challenges that we face.

The National Response Team consists of 16 federal agencies with responsibilities, interests and expertise in various aspects of emergency response to pollution incidents. The EPA serves as chair and the Coast Guard serves as vice chair of the NRT. This partnership includes such federal agencies as the Agency for Toxic Substances and Disease Registry, Department of Defense, Department of Energy, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, FEMA and key non-governmental organizations.

Our federal partnership sprung into action on September 11. Before the second plane had struck the World Trade Center in Manhattan, EPA headquarters had already begun coordination with our New York regional office to address the crash of the first plane.

Ten minutes later our EPA headquarters had linked all of our East Coast regional offices to begin coordination in support of the New York response effort. EPA's emergency response program was present on site in New York, Virginia and Pennsylvania within hours of the four plane crashes.

Throughout the response effort, EPA worked in coordination with our federal partners to monitor and protect human health and the environment from potential hazards associated with the three crash sites. At both the World Trade Center and the Pentagon, EPA provided monitoring for various air contaminants.

For example, EPA and other federal, state and city agencies have taken literally thousands of samples of dust, air, drinking water, storm water runoff and river sediments in and around the World Trade Center site. We have tested for the presence of pollutants such as asbestos, lead, volatile organic compounds, dioxin, benzyne, metals, PCBs and other chemicals and substances that could pose a threat to the public and workers at the site.

Fortunately, EPA, OSHA and others have found no evidence of any significant public health hazard to residents, visitors or workers beyond the immediate World Trade Center area. And despite recent press accounts which suggest otherwise, these findings have not changed.

In addition to our monitoring activities, EPA assisted in removal of cleanup of dust and debris from the streets using vacuum trucks, and we provided rescue workers and others in site with protective gear and health and safety recommendations for the difficult conditions on site.

Regarding water concerns associated with Manhattan, EPA collected and tested water at several distribution points. Following several days of heavy rain immediately after the incident, we collected water samples from storm sewers and surface runoff to determine if potential contamination from the site was entering the Hudson or East Rivers. All samples of water, which were tested for a wide range of contaminants, have levels below the federal standards.

Recognizing the need to ensure appropriate coordination of water security activities, EPA has established a water protection task force that will guide efforts on long-term drinking water, infrastructure protection and waste water treatment infrastructure protection.

The administration has requested $34.5 million as part of the terrorism supplemental appropriations for support of vulnerability assessments for drinking water systems, and $5 million for state grants for drinking water counterterrorism coordinators to work with EPA and the drinking water systems.

With EPA's support, the Sandia National Laboratory of the Department of Energy, in partnership with the American Waterworks Association, is developing a tool kit to assist drinking water systems in conducting vulnerability assessments and identifying remedial action. We expect training on these resource to be available later this month.

As an interim measure, EPA has disseminated a fact sheet that outlines measures utilities can take immediately to protect their drinking water supplies. Issued through state drinking water program managers, this document should now be in the hands of every public water system.

As this tool kit is being developed, the American Waterworks Association Research Foundation is dropping additional more detailed training materials that will provide step-by-step guidance to drinking water utilities on conducting vulnerability assessments, identifying remedial actions and strengthening their emergency operations plans. Formal training sessions that will take utility security officials through the first steps of their vulnerability assessments will begin in December.

As EPA continues to strengthen its counterterrorism program by building on the existing National Response System, the agency is involved in a variety of other activities with federal, state and local officials.

EPA is requesting $5.5 million in the terrorism supplemental appropriations to establish and equip a West Coast environmental response team similar to the East Coast team that exists in Edison, New Jersey, and that has been so instrumental in assisting at the World Trade Center.

In the 10 EPA regions, the agency's first responders are the on- scene coordinators. The OSCs have been actively involved with local, state and federal authorities in preparing for and responding to threats of terrorism.

EPA's OSCs located throughout the United States have broad response authority and a proven record of success in responding rapidly to emergency situations.

We're expanding work with the state emergency response commissions and the local emergency planning committees to help them incorporate terrorism response issues into their existing emergency plans. And we're working closely with the Office of Homeland Security to develop long-term agency response plans for terrorist attacks.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word about the anthrax situation that we face here in the District of Columbia, in Florida and in New York.

The agency is receiving an increasing number of requests to provide assessment, sampling and cleanup assistance at anthrax- contaminated buildings across the country, many very close to home here in this hearing room.

The dilemma we face is that the Superfund statutory language that allows us to respond to these biological releases also limits our ability to recover our response costs. To the extent these activities will continue, they will have an impact on our Superfund cleanup activities later in the year in many parts of the country.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I would like to emphasize that the administrator, Governor Whitman, has made very clear to the entire agency that there is no higher priority than ensuring that ensuring EPA's mission to protect the environment and public health is a broad umbrella that encompasses homeland security.

The expertise and experience the agency has developed over 30 years is poised to assist and support the hard work Governor Ridge and this Congress will be doing.

Clearly, the administrator is adamant that EPA's efforts to help secure the safety and integrity of America's water supply an infrastructure must be undertaken with great speed, energy and attention.

Deadlines that were established before September 11 are no longer appropriate. We have no time to waste in completing this work, and we intend to devote the resources necessary to make certain that it is done quickly and properly.

Governor Whitman, myself and our professionals throughout EPA welcome the opportunity to work with you, our colleagues in Congress, your professional staff, and with Governor Ridge and the Office of Homeland Security to protect and preserve the health and well-being of every American citizen.

Thank you.

JEFFORDS: Thank you.

Thank you. Very excellent statements from all. And I deeply appreciate all of the effort that's gone into your testimony for today.

I'm going to change the ordinary procedure and, in view of -- we have two people, two senators here from the areas that experienced it and allow them to ask questions first, before I do.

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

And let me thank all of the witnesses for your testimony and your extraordinary response to our needs.

Mr. Meserve, I look forward to seeing you next week, and so I will hold my questions about nuclear security. I've got some that I will submit to you in preparation for our meeting. And I thank you very much for your testimony today.

Mr. Mitchell, I understood you to say that you were submitting legislation with respect to the size requirements and to raise the loan caps. And does that request go to the Small Business Committee?

MITCHELL: It has gone -- my understanding, it's gone up as part of the administration's request, as part of the additional supplemental. I'm not sure what particular appropriation it actually will be attached to, but it's certainly been -- we've submitted that.

CLINTON: Well, that's very good news, and I thank you for that.

And perhaps we could check into that, Mr. Chairman, find out if it's not part of the SBA responsibilities under the Stafford Act that, wherever that authority resides, we could perhaps help to expedite that so that more companies will be able to take advantage. And I greatly appreciate your sensitivity to the difference in size issues in New York.

I also want to thank both Mr. Brown and Dr. Sampson for your understanding of the particular issue that we're confronting, which is trying to allow direct payments to private businesses so that, as Dr. Sampson reported from his meetings with a lot of our business leaders, they can get back on their feet more quickly.

And I was with Director Daniels earlier and appreciate his announcement of what the administration is trying to do through CDBG. I hope though that we will continue to work together to try to figure out how to get this done right in the next several weeks.

There are some real problems with moving through CDBG. We have tried CDBG in the past with direct payments. In other disasters like Oklahoma City, it's my understanding that it took a year. There was a lot of bureaucracy. The agency that administers it, HUD, is not used to this kind of expeditious necessity that grows out of a disaster. And I think that we could perhaps slightly structure it differently or look for ways of getting the money out more quickly.

I know that both Senator Schumer and Congressman Walsh, because of their committees of jurisdiction, will be working with the administration to try to determine how best to do that. But I think I would like to, you know, offer that we keep looking for the best way to achieve this.

Finally, after looking through many different options, you know, we concluded that the Cerro Grande model would be particularly helpful. And I'd appreciate both of you responding to that.

Mr. Brown?

BROWN: Well, the Cerro Grande model is, as you know, an incredibly good model. It's been proven to work. We got the money on the ground very quickly, very efficiently. I hope GAO agrees with us in the future that we did it appropriately, but I think we did it quickly and efficiently.

There are some differences though. And I do not want this to sound crass or inappropriate, but in Cerro Grande, it was federally- caused disaster, and here we have a terrorist-caused disaster. And while that shouldn't impact our decision to try to get money on the ground in New York as quickly as possible, the basis for the models is different in that Cerro Grande as in response to a federally-caused disaster.

So that's just the difference I think we ought to be aware of.

I think there are ways to take the Cerro Grande model and what we're doing now in Sante Fe and apply it in the Stafford Act now. There may be some regulatory changes that would accomplish the same thing without actually creating the office. But in all honesty, Senator, it's come on us so quickly we haven't really set down and analyzed that. I would just lay it out on the table that's something I would like to do is go back and say to the director and to our staff, "Is there some way regulatory that we can accomplish the same thing without creating a separate office?"

CLINTON: I really appreciate that offer, Mr. Brown, because I think we're all trying to get the...

BROWN: Exactly.

CLINTON: ... solution, and we're concerned that the CDBG model has some built-in problems. One of our -- my Republican colleagues in the House came up to me after Director Daniels announcements and said, "How are we going to make sure that they don't just run it through the same old political system that they've had before? We'll never see that money, or at least in any expeditious way."

So that is our goal, is try to figure out how to streamline this and maximize the return. Because what -- we had one of our executives who was with us today was representing CitiGroup, and he told us that they're processing about $800 million worth of private insurance for about 16,000 businesses. He says the vast majority of those businesses, even with their insurance proceeds, are not going to keep their doors open; they just can't figure out to make it an economic go under the circumstances.

But if they could get some bridge help through grants like this and we get through with the crime scene problems, which are such an impediment. And you know, I keep mentioning it, because I've been to lots of disasters. You know, we were with Senator Lott and he said that he and I having had experience in Tornado Alley, we're well aware of disasters, but this is a massive disaster with the layover of the crime scene, and businesses can't get customers.

So, you know, we're just struggling for creative answers. And I appreciate greatly the distinction that others have drawn between the Cerro Grande model, saying that the federal government had caused that.

CLINTON: And I mentioned that to some of my business executives. I said, "Well, you know, the difference is that the federal government caused the fires." And this gentleman said, "Well, does that mean if, you know, if Mohammed Atta had been a federal employee, we'd get the claims office?"

And you know, it's a very chilling kind of question because, you know, we need the money now and however we get it out -- and one of our problems is the timing. You know, Congress is moving toward adjournment. If we don't get the authorizing legislation or the regulatory changes, then the appropriated dollars that will come from the promised money that the president has, you know, stood behind, and as Director Daniels again reiterated today, the $20 billion, won't be able to be allocated. So that's the urgency that we face.

And so I would like to work with Dr. Sampson and Mr. Brown particularly to see if we can't come up with, you know, a model that -- through regulatory or statutory changes, through this committee or others -- we can push this through.

I also wanted to ask -- Mr. Brown, when you said that you've agreed to the 13 additional weeks on unemployment insurance, is that in addition to the 13 weeks that have already been declared so that we have a total of a 26-week extension now?

BROWN: That was my understanding, it's now a full 26-week extension.

CLINTON: Would this only apply when your other criterion is met, a 30 percent increase in the unemployment rate since September 11?

BROWN: I'm not aware of the answer to that. Let me ask one of the experts. Do we know that answer? We're not familiar with that. We'll find out, Senator, and let you know.

CLINTON: Because we know that we've already gone up from 5 percent to 6.3 percent.

BROWN: Right.

CLINTON: And, you know, I think that the 13 weeks is great and welcomed news. I mean, we're still of the opinion that we need an additional 26 weeks on top of that. But we're going to work with you on that and I'm very grateful for your support.

And I also appreciate your reviewing of the health tracking legislation, because I'm very concerned about our World Trade Center cough. You know, I mean, we're worried that the men on the pile are injuring their health while they try to continue to do the work we're requiring to be done, and so we need to work that out as well.

But I appreciate greatly the extraordinary cooperation, and if we can, kind of, have a sense of urgency to try to figure out what regulatory and statutory changes we need, we then can get into this process, the sort of authority that's required.

Dr. Sampson, did you want to add to that?

SAMPSON: Yes, Senator. I concur and am very sensitive to your concern about delivering funds through the same mechanisms that may delay. I think that there are some very intriguing models that we became aware of in visiting in New York and with New York's business leaders. And I think one of the opportunities, through the CDBG program, is perhaps creatively to channel some of those funds through preexisting business-based organizations that have a protocol in place, to assist these businesses that have a very extensive volunteer network based on a work force that's being provided by all of the banks in the area, to assist these small businesses.

So I think there are some creative ways to be able to get that money delivered much more quickly than perhaps traditionally is done.

CLINTON: That would be great, because the Downtown Business Association, which I think was represented at your meeting, is...

SAMPSON: Yes, ma'am.

CLINTON: ... a very competent organization. If we could bypass the usual, you know, bureaucracy which, frankly, has a different set of criteria -- they usually work with low- and medium-income people, predominantly low-income people in different settings than what we're facing now -- if we can get that money out and get it to some of our voluntary associations who know how to run lean and effective programs, that would be a big help.

SAMPSON: I think that's very promising. We'd be happy to work with you and explore that.

JEFFORDS: Senator Corzine?

CORZINE: Thank you, and let me once again, compliment all of your agencies for, I think, outstanding work in a time of crisis for our country. And so if the questions don't match those words, I think that's the primary message that I want to get across, but there are...

(LAUGHTER)

... occasionally things that I think we can learn from some of the issues.

Let me start with Mr. Brown. The New Jersey, at least, senatorial delegation has a call into the director to try to set up just the meeting that you were talking about. And it's not because there hasn't been cooperation, it's just that enough time has gone by that we know the things that we need to work on.

BROWN: Senator, just let me say, he's going to be out of pocket for another five to seven days for a personal health matter, and so I would just suggest that perhaps your staff get a hold of the director's office again and let's get that set up immediately. Let's don't waste any more time.

CORZINE: Most of the issues that resolve or evolve from New Jersey is right from the centerpiece of major disaster declaration versus emergency declaration. And while -- and I think there's an important issue here that goes at the heart of the Stafford Act.

It may be hard to actually designate New Jersey, even though it has enormous loss of life and real impact, within the context because it doesn't meet some detailed definition or standards, but by any normal human standard, the kind of loss of life you would think would lead to reactions that are similar to any other area, and it just happens to be that we have a river running between the two states. We call them the New York Giants but they play in the Meadowlands, and that's really symbolic of what the nature of the neighborhood is.

And I think that there are a number of things within the Stafford Act, starting with how you deal with the declarations, that end up dictating terms. And this is certainly one that I want to talk about specifically as it relates to a number of issues that flow specifically. I won't tie up the committee with respect to those, but they're really quite serious in application.

I would mention which I think also relates to New York and another of others is the issue of straight time plus this overtime repayment. A number of the emergency personnel and police forces -- it is how resources are allocated that sometimes is the issue, not whether there is overtime payment actually going on with respect to law enforcement and other facilities.

CORZINE: And I forewarn you that I will be at the second or third point of a meeting, but I think it is equally true for New York City and New York state and New Jersey and a number of people that are involved in anthrax situations and others with regard to needs that I think need to be addressed within the context of FEMA reimbursements. And I think it's actually quite a significant issue.

You know, I listened to the conversation -- I think it was you, Dr. Sampson, that said there were 5,000 businesses south of Canal Street and 4,000 of them small business. And I think it's remarkable, Mr. Mitchell, that we have 1,000 loans outstanding and $82 million, and there is a disconnect with 4,000 businesses and 1,000 loans for small business when undoubtedly the need is really quite great. And while I don't have as much information on this as I do on some of the hurricanes that have come along, this is a cumbersome process, not because anybody intends it to be, but because it is.

And I think, within the context of the FEMA response in disaster areas, we need to expedite this process. And while I like some of these models, I am of the "keep it simple stupid" stage with regard to how we deal with getting money into pockets of people who don't have business interruption insurance, don't have the sophistication to deal with a lot of the either applications or even interfacing with CitiCorp to try to get some of these loans. And I think that there is real need for examining the Stafford Act within these contexts.

I wish I were smart enough to tell you all of the ways that that should be done. I don't think it's ill will on anybody's part; I think it's just a very complicated process. And I hope that we will step back and move.

And I compliment EPA for the creativity of tapping the Superfund site to get money into certain pockets that wouldn't naturally tie, and I certainly would encourage that here with regard to small business in Lower Manhattan. I'd like you to think about the west side of the river on some of those places as well.

But these are desperate times for those companies and time is their enemy as much as the issue with respect to access at loans. And I think actually grants are more appropriate since it's a national disaster and not something that anyone could have legitimately planned for.

I would say that I also, Mr. Chairman, think if we took a tour of EPA's testing facility in Edison, we would find that it is in a 1942 barracks, refitted for laboratories, and there are more trailers than there are buildings in the process. And if we expect our people to do timely and adequate work, I think we have a real obligation to understand what it is we're investing in the facilities to be able to generate the kind of response that I think we need. And I really would encourage, whether it's formal or informal, a review of how this is all put together. People have done an outstanding job at EPA to do what they have done.

I think I'm going to stop there. is so much to learn and so much that I think we need to do, but time really is an enemy of recovery, because a lot of people will lose their ability, if not their will, to survive in these times. And I look forward to working with the chairman on a number of these issues and making sure that we replenish that Superfund site since New Jersey has 115 Superfunds.

(UNKNOWN): Senator Carper, I...

SAVENKO (ph): We're more than pleased, Senator Corzine, to -- Mr. Chairman, Senator Carper, to come up and brief you on what we're doing and some of the challenges that we face.

JEFFORDS: I appreciate that. I would give you a shot. I waited for my questions for the last because I have a rather long list and the senators from the area I let go, but if you want to have a comment now I'd be happy to accommodate you.

(UNKNOWN): Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I'll not be long.

I don't watch much TV but every now and then I catch a commercial that I especially enjoy. And I had the news on this morning and there was a commercial that was, sort of, a band that looked like KISS, the rock group KISS, in concert. Then, after the show, they're back stage and the (inaudible) guy walks in and he says, "I smell world tour. I'm going to take you guys and make a fortune going around the world." And then they start taking off their costumes and they're not KISS at all; they're some other group. And the guy says, "Who are you guys?" And one of the fellows says, "Well, I'm just nobody special, but I did stay at a Holiday Inn last night."

It reminded me of another similar commercial. Same company, and it was a situation of a nuclear power plant and the place was just about to have meltdown and the alarms were going off. And this one guy, kind of, takes charge right in the middle of everybody and he's sitting there eating a jelly donut and just telling everybody what to do, what to shut down and all. And after he gets everything under control, everybody turns around and says, "Well, who are you?" And he says, "Well, I'm nobody special, but I did stay at a Holiday Inn last night."

So this is a question involving nuclear power, not jelly donuts, not KISS, but nuclear power. What if a terrorist strikes one of our nuclear power plants and the guy that was in that commercial isn't around or there's nobody there to stay at the Holiday Inn last night? How do we react? And how do we make sure that a terrorist attack doesn't somehow spill over and cause the kind of calamity that we all know that it could?

Just put us at ease, Mr. Meserve, if you will and tell us how we're preparing for that eventuality and what we're going to do.

MESERVE: Well, let me say, I think it is very easy for people to have a lot of dramatization about nuclear power plants and fortunately the reality is quite different.

MESERVE: Before September 11, we had in place a very serious capability at nuclear power plants in order to provide security. And that includes basically a perimeter defense system, detection systems for intruders, heavily armed response forces who are also well trained, defensive positions that are within the facility that are armored in order to be able to respond to various kinds of attacks and, of course, a whole defensive strategy.

We inspect the facilities to verify that the facilities have the capacity to be able to defend themselves against what we call a design basis threat, which is the regulatory obligation that every power plant have a capacity and demonstrate the capacity to defend against certain kinds of attacks.

Since September 11, we have required that all of our power plants go on to a heightened security status. The details of what that has meant you'll appreciate are ones that we are not advertising and do not advertise publicly. It's classified information.

(UNKNOWN): We don't want to know.

MESERVE: But that basically involves an enhancement of the kinds of things that I've described as part of the capability: increased number of guards, increased weapons, increased patrols and control posts.

I have also communicated, after September 11, with the governors of 40 states to make sure that those states were aware of the nature of the defenses at the facilities and aware of the limitations of those defenses, in the event that some extraordinary attack were marshaled, that there would be state assets that could be provided. And as a result of that, at most of the sites today there is assistance being provided at the perimeter of the facilities typically by local law enforcement, by state police and by National Guard.

We have also had extensive interaction with other agencies of the government, including the military, to assure that there is an awareness of the limitations of the defenses at the facilities and the need, perhaps, under some circumstances for federal assets to be provided.

So that there is an awareness throughout the government of these plants and what they can and can't do. I think we have taken every reasonable and prudent action to assure that the nuclear power plants are capable of defending themselves against the circumstances in which we now find ourselves.

(UNKNOWN): One more follow-up on that, Mr. Chairman, if you don't mind.

JEFFORDS: Yes.

(UNKNOWN): The law which deals with the insurance for -- Price- Anderson, which I believe is up for reauthorization this year...

MESERVE: That's correct.

(UNKNOWN): ... how does the need for reauthorization of Price- Anderson -- how is it affected, if at all, by the kind of threat that our nuclear power plants might be under?

MESERVE: Well, the Price-Anderson Act covers a large number of different kinds of facilities, including Department of Energy facilities. With regard to the existing nuclear power plants, the Price-Anderson protections will continue on even if the Price-Anderson Act itself terminates. So with regard to existing power plants, there is no effect on the liability and protection scheme that is established by that statute.

If there were to be new construction, the failure to have a Price-Anderson Act would mean that the new plants would not have the benefit of that statutory system. So if there were to be new power plants, there's a need for reauthorization.

There is also a need for reauthorization in light of the Department of Energy facilities. But the demand is not there because of a pressing need for existing power plants.

(UNKNOWN): Are there some proposals that have come to your attention to build some new nuclear power plants in the next couple of years, or at least to start that process?

MESERVE: There is serious evaluation that is under way by the generating companies about the prospect of new construction. No one has come to us and said that they assuredly will file an application. But this is an area in which there is interest.

And the reason is really I think quite simple to see; it's that the existing nuclear power plants have really established quite an extraordinary record of both economic performance and safety performance over the last couple of decades, steadily improving performance. One of the consequences of that is the that production costs for nuclear power plants, as such, that they are now the cheapest form of electricity on average that's on the grid today.

MESERVE: So that has meant that, if you're a generating company, you're interested in those types of assets.

(UNKNOWN): OK, thanks very much.

And, Mr. Chairman, thanks for letting me go ahead of you.

JEFFORDS: Thank you.

(UNKNOWN): And inject a little humor into this serious deliberation.

JEFFORDS: Thank you. It's always a pleasure to have you with us.

Ms. Savenko (ph), have there been any studies pertaining to the health effects of human exposure to chlorine dioxide gas? I have staffers who are pregnant and staffers who suffer from asthma who work in the Dirksen Building, which joins Hart. Can you assure me that their health will not be compromised by these remediation activities?

SAVENKO (ph): Mr. Chairman, that's a common question that we are hearing from folks on the Hill whom we are briefing on our proposed remediation plan for the Hart Building.

And a couple of things I'd like to say to put their minds at rest about our plan.

JEFFORDS: That's why I'm asking it. Thank you.

SAVENKO (ph): Absolutely; very valid concerns.

First of all, the actual chlorine dioxide gas itself will only be present in the building during very limited times during which we have the building sealed off and access to the Dirksen Building sealed off. And the Dirksen Building itself will be empty during that period. So there will be no human exposure to the chlorine dioxide gas during the period with which we propose to remediate the building.

The gas itself decomposes relatively quickly. In fact, it will be a challenge to us to make sure that we keep it active long enough at levels that are appropriate to remediate the anthrax spores, and then we will scrub the building and make sure that it's completely safe, both from the standpoint of no gas being present and also no spores being present, before anyone is allowed back in the building.

The gas itself decomposes to relatively harmless salts, and, in fact, it's commonly used today in a number of commercial settings such as sanitizing bakeries or dairies or other places, used on computer equipment and many household products and food products. And, in fact, we're exposed to this pretty ubiquitously in the environment because it's used so commonly today.

My staff is telling me that, in fact, by virtue of having run this gas through the H-VAC system in the Hart Building, whatever spores or mold or bacteria was in the H-VAC system will actually be remediated. So anyone who has asthma will probably be in better health as a result of our fumigating the building than they would be if we had not.

So we'll work to get our scientific data up to you all so that you can see that this is a very safe and effective product and that they will not suffer any ill effects as a result of the residual impacts of this technology.

JEFFORDS: Well, thank you for that answer. I've never been through an experience -- I don't think any of us have -- like this, where we ourselves are in the midst of the exposed areas. And it's a great deal of anxiety created in our staffs in particular. So that would be very helpful.

Back to the power plants.

Good to see you again.

I understand that the FAA has established a no-fly zone of sorts around the nuclear power plants. This new fly zone applies only to non-commercial aviation and expires November 7. Additionally, there seems to be a question of how this no-fly zone can be enforced.

This is a concern to my state, where reports of an unidentified plane flying close to the Vermont Yankee plant on September 13 have never been fully explained and obviously caused some anxiety.

In your opinion, what is the advisability of providing greater protection for airspace around nuclear plants? And do you have any suggestions on ways this might be accomplished? And is there anything we need to do to help you?

MESERVE: It's a difficult issue. Immediately in the aftermath of the September 11 event, we started our discussions with the FAA and with the military about the possibility of another aircraft attack.

And there has been for some time something that's called a notice to airmen that's issued by the Federal Aviation Administration that requests pilots not to fly in the vicinity of -- over or in the vicinity of nuclear power plants and other similar facilities, not just nuclear power plants but other infrastructure of a similar kind: chemical plants and the like.

We did see a reduction in the number of fly-overs as a result of that notice, but they were not eliminated. We established a protocol with the FAA so that if there were fly-overs, our licensees were to do the best they could to observe the tail number on the aircraft, communicate that to the FAA, to us and to the military, in order that there could be follow-up activities to pursue the reason for that fly-over and to discourage any further fly-overs.

MESERVE: We're not always successful, of course, in identifying the aircraft. Nor when there were police or military efforts to intervene did they always find the aircraft. It had exited the air -- the region by the time you got there.

As a result of the announcement that -- the intelligence that led to the announcement by Attorney General Ashcroft the other day, there was a decision to establish no-fly zones for general aviation aircraft over 70 sites licensed by the NRC and 16 or 17 sites that are under the control of the Department of Energy.

That was the result of a discussion that not only involved the NRC, but Office of Homeland Security, the military, FAA and other agencies with interests in the matter. And it's a balance between the disruption of federal aviation -- civilian usage of the airspace and the need to provide protection.

And this is a limitation that is going to expire in a week or so as this current threat is understood to diminish.

It's my view that this is an issue that -- you have commercial issues that have to be evaluated in terms of the impact on the usage of airspace by general aviation aircraft, some of which, of course, are commercial, not for flying passengers but that are business travel and for freight and the like.

There is a question of the military response, in that, you -- there's little point to establish a no-fly zone if there is, in some way, to enforce it. So you have an issue about the deployment of your defensive assets that have to be resolved.

And so I think this is a complicated issue that involves interests that go well beyond just the NRC's. It involves the interests of a variety of other agencies.

JEFFORDS: It obviously does. And so, I don't know whether any legislation is needed or whatever, but I'm sure you will let me know if we, this committee, has the responsibility over the plants in the sense of security. So we want to work with you and make sure you have whatever authority you feel is appropriate.

MESERVE: Thank you very much, Senator.

JEFFORDS: Mr. Moravec, last week I met with you and GSA Administrator Steven Perry. In that meeting we discussed the federal building security. And you told me that one of the biggest obstacles facing your agency is the retention of security personnel. And because of the differences in pay grades between GSA and other federal law enforcement agencies, you told me that your agency experiences a tremendous amount of turnover with your federal security personnel.

Can you discuss what needs to be done to help your service attract and retain trained law enforcement personnel? And, again, what kind of legislation, if any, do you need to help you?

MORAVEC: Thank you, Senator.

This is a point of vulnerability for the Federal Protective Service. And particularly lately with the high state of alert that we've been forced to maintain at all federal facilities, it's thrown into high relief that pressure that our manpower is under.

We have determined that we need not only to keep the manpower that we have, the federal law enforcement officers that we have, but probably to increase that force, because we're being force to run 12- hour shifts, and that's putting a lot of pressure on them and, frankly, we're stretched pretty thin.

The Federal Protective Service uniformed personnel are at a disadvantage relative to other federal police forces in terms of the pay scale that they are entitled to and also in terms of the benefits package which they're entitlement to on retirement. And that has proven to be a challenge for us in terms of retaining people.

We're also, of course, subject to people being called up by the National Guard, which is putting pressure on us, but there's really not much we can do about that. The principle concern is losing our people to other federal services.

For example, the air marshals right now are offering $25,000 signing bonuses for qualified law enforcement and security personnel, and that's awfully tempting for some of our people.

JEFFORDS: Have you seen a number looking into that? Is that what you're telling me?

MORAVEC: Have we seen a number of...

JEFFORDS: Of your employees looking to go?

Moakley: Yes, in fact, just last week we lost two of our most highly qualified people in the National Capital Region, people that we could ill-afford to lose. And we're concerned that that could be a continuing challenge for us.

JEFFORDS: How do you go about approaching a solution? Do you have to come to us or do you...

MORAVEC: Well, a certain amount of relief, I think, can be orchestrated through work with the Office of Personnel Management, but it's my understanding that legislative relief would be required to change the -- particularly the benefits package which we're able to offer these people.

JEFFORDS: Well, I feel for you. So if we can be of help, let us know.

MORAVEC: Thank you very much, Senator.

JEFFORDS: Mr. Brown, on October 16, this committee held a hearing to discuss FEMA's response to the events of September 11. During a discussion with the emergency response personnel at that hearing, the emergency responders suggested the need for a dedicated national communication system for emergency responders to better coordinate and respond to disasters.

And listening to that, I could understand. We have a hodgepodge of communications systems. Trying to connect them up in a disaster is not an easy thing. Crews from Maryland and Virginia responding the Pentagon disaster were at times unable to communicate with each other because they were using different radio frequencies, et cetera, et cetera, et cetera.

What's the solution?

BROWN: The solution, Mr. Chairman, is to do the study, get some money, and fix it. It's very simple. I mean, it's not simple -- the solution itself is not going to be simple, getting there is. We have to identify how we're going to use those different broadbands, get those dedicated to us, get the money, and have a national system.

JEFFORDS: OK. What about the digital spectrum? Do you need access to that?

BROWN: Yes we will. Yes.

(CROSSTALK)

BROWN: Although I've heard -- I'll have to get back to you on this -- I have heard that actually we have more problems utilizing the digital spectrum than we would an analog, and that actually analog, in terms of disasters, may be more beneficial to us.

JEFFORDS: Well, just please keep me advised.

BROWN: We will do that.

JEFFORDS: If you need any help...

BROWN: We need your help in that area.

JEFFORDS: All right, because we're here to help.

BROWN: Good.

(LAUGHTER)

JEFFORDS: Dr. Sampson, since 1992 the EDA has received over $600 million in supplementary appropriations to deal with the aftermath of major disasters. Can you explain the disaster grant process and the role EDA plays in post-grant oversight? And how can the agency put this experience to use to aid the people of New York?

SAMPSON: The EDA has primarily three sets of tools to use in disaster response grants. First, our technical assistance and planning grants. Secondly, capitalization of revolving loan funds that can be used where appropriate for financing that is not available on the market. And then the third primary tool is through public works grants.

As we discuss the circumstances in New York, and the needs of those businesses are somewhat unique to many of the other disasters that we have been involved in, I think the major lessons that we have learned from working with those disasters over the past really many number of years is that the fundamentals of economic recovery don't change after the disaster. The economic development stays basically operating thorough several principles. You have to, before businesses will reinvest, there has to be a likely outcome that they're going to get a return on that investment. And I think Senator Corzine referred to that basic principle.

Secondly the effort needs to be thorough, comprehensive and coordinated. I think we've learned that we need to carefully scope the problem is, and then apply the right resources, and that's the approach the administration is trying to take right now by identifying the appropriate federal resources to bring to bear.

One of the major lessons is there is a need for streamlined delivery of those services. And I think Senator Clinton already identified the importance of that.

The role the EDA has consistently played is as a partner to those lead agencies that are here at this table -- FEMA, SBA, the Department of Transportation and HUD. And we're happy to bring those lessons to bear and to assist our partner agencies in dealing with this disaster as well.

JEFFORDS: Thank you.

Again, Mr. Meserve, I understand that the NRC has been in close contact with the governors and federal intelligence and enforcement agencies as well as the military. Have these discussions dealt with evacuation plans should an emergency occur?

JEFFORDS: And do all nuclear power plants have in place clear procedures for notifying and coordinating with local and federal disaster response personnel? And would local police, firefighters and government officials know what to do, how to coordinate, and what roads should be open and closed, et cetera? People like reassurance on these, as you understand.

MESERVE: I appreciate the question. Let me say that in the post-September 11 environment, our discussions have principally focused on whether a threat exists and assuring that there's appropriate defensive capability to be able to respond to any threat.

We do have, as part of our normal regulatory process, a requirement that every nuclear power plant have an emergency plan, and that would cover events of all types.

The NRC's focus is on the on-site portion of it. And we work with our colleagues at FEMA and with the state emergency response agencies with regard to the off-site portions of it.

Those plans are required to be updated whenever there is a significant change, like a road were to close or what have you, then the plan would have to be adapted. We require, in any event, that those plans be reevaluated every two years. And at every site, we have, every two years, we have a full exercise. That means not only the NRC portion, the on-site portion of the plan, but also involving the FEMA assets and the state and local assets in order to attest the capacity of the plans to be able to respond to events.

So this is something that is part of our normal emergency planning at nuclear power plants and is subject to continuing review to assure that the emergency plans are adequate.

SAVENKO (ph): Mr. Chairman, if I might add, our on-scene coordinators at EPA...

JEFFORDS: I'm going to ask you a question, too. So go right ahead.

SAVENKO (ph): Well, I was going to say, we, in addition to our lab at Edison, New Jersey, that Senator Corzine mentioned he believes is sadly in need of upgrading, we have a fine team of radiological emergency responders who are specialized and can assist our on-scene coordinators, our network of EPA teams that respond to chemical and oil spills, and also are responding to the anthrax. So our folks are also trained to respond to nuclear incidents and can help out in these situations.

JEFFORDS: Thank you. And I'll follow-up.

In your testimony, you state that the anthrax remediation and World Trade Center cleanup efforts may be depleting the Superfund trust fund. I'm very concerned about depleting the Superfund, but we obviously need to provide for anthrax cleanup as well.

Are you certain that if there's another terrorist event that EPA will have money readily available to respond? In light of this, are you certain that you had adequate resources to continue your current pace of cleanup at the Superfund sites?

SAVENKO (ph): Mr. Chairman, that is a very important question. And, frankly, we're at a point now where we are going to be taking a very hard look at our portfolio of sites. Thus far we've been able to respond using our existing emergency funding authority under the Superfund law and deploy our resources. But it looks like we're in this for the long haul.

And I'll be meeting with my regional Superfund division directors next week. And we are going to take a very careful look at the portfolio of sites that we must address this year and figure out what we can and cannot do. And I'll be pleased to follow up with you and your staff after that meeting and figure out what we need to do the job properly.

JEFFORDS: I appreciate that, because we didn't think about these kind of things when we were creating the Superfund, and yet it certainly fits in that kind of a situation.

SAVENKO (ph): Well, and I will say that our existing system is responding very well. And I'm proud of the work that our folks are doing in the field.

JEFFORDS: And, Mr. Mitchell, thank you for your help. I don't have a question for you. Senator Clinton cleared up that area. So I just want to thank you for sharing with us your experience and your experiences.

Thank you all.

We also reserve the right to question any of you that we feel like it, by writing after you leave, so don't get too respent (ph).

(LAUGHTER)

Thank you. Goodbye.

"CNN Live Event/Special," CNN, 11/10/2001

JONATHAN KARL, HOST: A president rallies support at home and abroad. Our guests will have the latest on the military and diplomatic challenges.

And from New York, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton talks about the past two months, her state and the nation.

From Capitol Hill, a debate on the airline security standoff. Is a solution in sight?

Our experts will look at the slumping economy, where it's going and what it means for you.

Plus, your phone calls and e-mails. All ahead as CNN continues special coverage of AMERICA'S NEW WAR.

Welcome. I'm Jonathan Karl in Washington.

We're looking for your phone calls and e-mails over the next two hours as we discuss the war on terrorism, homeland defense, airline security and the economy. Send our experts your questions to security@cnn.com.

We'll be talking to my first guest, New York Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, in a moment, but first, here are the latest developments as America strikes back.

President Bush told the U.N. General Assembly today that every nation has a stake in the war on terrorism. And the president warned that those who think they can, quote, "pick and choose their terrorist friends" will pay a heavy price.

The Taliban admit they've lost the strategic town of Mazar-e Sharif to opposition forces, but they call it a strategic withdrawal. Opposition commanders say the U.S. bombing helped them capture the city.

A Pakistani journalist claims he has conducted the first interview with Osama bin Laden since September 11. Two different versions of the interview were published this morning. The English-language "Dawn" published one version, in which bin Laden says that if the U.S. uses chemical or nuclear weapons against him, he will respond in kind. He's also quoted as saying he possesses chemical and nuclear weapons as a deterrent.

Local newspapers headlined the nuclear issue. But Hamid Mir, who claims he met with bin Laden in the mountains north of Kabul, says the more important thing for him was that, in the interview, bin Laden's apparently reversed himself on his thoughts about American civilians. It is this part of the interview that is causing concern with Western analysts.

Previously bin Laden has said any American is a target. Now, according to Mr. Mir's account of the interview, he says there are some good Americans.

There is no independent confirmation that the interview actually took place, and the audiotape Mr. Mir says of the interview that was made has not been released. CNN has spoken directly with Mir, and we are working right now to check out the details he provided.

In New Jersey, four post offices have reopened this morning after tests found traces of anthrax. The buildings were closed overnight for cleaning. Health officials believe the anthrax was a result of cross-contamination with mail from the Hamilton center, the facility that handled three anthrax-laden letters. None of the postal employees who work at the four offices have been put on antibiotics.

And in Washington, anthrax has turned up again at the Longworth House Office Building. Investigators have found minute traces of bacteria in a fourth congressional office. The bacteria was found Tuesday in the office of Representative Elijah Cummings of Maryland.

The Pentagon has declared a missing Navy serviceman dead. Twenty- year-old Bryant Davis of Chicago had been taking part in military operations in Afghanistan on board the USS Kitty Hawk. He fell overboard Wednesday in the Arabian Sea. Despite two days of search efforts, his body was never found.

President Bush is in New York, where he addressed the United Nations General Assembly earlier today. CNN White House correspondent Kelly Wallace is traveling with the president and has details.

(NEWSBREAK)

KARL: And in Afghanistan, the anti-Taliban Northern Alliance has gained control of the key city of Mazar-e Sharif.

CNN's Ben Wedeman is just to the north of Mazar-e Sharif in Dashtiqala, Afghanistan, with the latest.

(NEWSBREAK)

KARL: Joining us now, a woman with a special perspective on the events of the past two months, both for her state and the rest of the country, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York.

Senator Clinton, thank you for joining us.

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Thank you, Jonathan.

KARL: I understand you're in Buffalo talking about an idea for new public security grants to help localities like Buffalo, New York, deal with the homeland defense issue. How much is needed, and where do you think this money is going to come from?

CLINTON: Well, I announced today a proposal for a public safety block grant which would provide federal dollars to our first responders, who are largely under the control of our city governments, our county governments throughout the country.

I think this has to be part of what we finally do in Congress before this year ends, because we need to pump up the resources that are available.

Here in Buffalo, the mayor has told me that before September 11, they never received a single weapons-of-mass-destruction call on 9/11. Since then, they've received 150 or so.

Each of those costs about $600 to $700 an hour to respond to, and just by doing the math, you can see how a city like Buffalo is going to be in terrible financial shape. But cities across

New York and the country are in the same fix, because they don't have the resources to step up and be able to provide the kind of first response we need without some federal help.

KARL: Now, is there a commitment to provide that help? As you know, the president has threatened to veto any additional emergency spending for this year. Where do you think the commitment stands in Washington?

CLINTON: Well, I would hope that the administration would take very seriously the concerns that I'm hearing from people all over New York and indeed the country. I met with a delegation from the Conference of Mayors.

You know, we expect our cities and counties to be on the front lines in the fight against terrorism here at home. They can't do it without the resources.

We certainly have done everything we could to support our men and women in uniform in the battle abroad in Afghanistan, Central Asia and elsewhere. I just don't accept the fact that we can't provide federal dollars so that our police, our fire, our emergency response teams are as well equipped. And I hope that that will be considered favorably before Congress goes home this year.

KARL: Well, Senator, we've got a lot more to talk about certainly, but we do have to take a very quick break.

We'll be back in just a moment.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

KARL: And there, live pictures of ground zero in New York City.

We're talking to Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Senator, I don't know if you can see those pictures, but it has been two months now since the September 11 attacks. How has all of this changed you?

CLINTON: Oh, Jonathan, I can't even begin to tell you in all the ways that this has had an impact on me and everybody I know. I couldn't see the pictures, but I assume that they show what we know to be the continuing fires that are burning below ground and the work that is so dangerous that's proceeding above ground.

I think all of us have been moved to really look at our own priorities in life and to understand what we have to do to protect our country. And that's why this fight against terrorism has to be such a united effort, and it has to take place here at home as well as abroad.

I think we're in for, you know, some difficult times ahead, but I have no doubt we can be successful. And so, despite the work I do every day to try to help everyone I can, I'm very conscious of the fact that this is a long-term effort.

KARL: Well, in terms of preventing future terrorists attacks, the attorney general talking about extraordinary measures to prevent future terrorist attacks.

One thing, the latest proposal is allowing -- and he's actually made this a rule at the Justice Department -- allowing the FBI to listen in on the conversations of suspects who are into custody and their lawyers. This is, of course, attorney-client privilege has been something that's been important to everybody for a long time.

What do you think, is this step necessary in light of the current circumstances?

CLINTON: Well, I know it's going to be reviewed. Senator Leahy and the Judiciary Committee have already sent word to the attorney general that they're going to be taking a hard look at this. And I will, you know, wait to see what the evaluation is.

Obviously, we are living in extraordinary times which demand responses commensurate with the dangers we face, but we don't want to throw the rule of law out the window, and we don't want to in any way demonstrate that our values are not enduring and lasting in the face of this challenge.

So it's a balancing act. And I'm going to wait to see how Senator Leahy and my colleagues evaluate it.

KARL: And Leahy's been extremely critical on that point. Others have been very critical of the administration in how it's handled the anthrax threat.

As a matter of fact, you've come out for a proposal for a single spokesperson to talk about the threat of bioterrorism. I mean, we've seen a dizzying array of spokespeople out there so far. Has the administration mishandled this so far?

CLINTON: Well, you know, we're all learning. This is an unprecedented challenge. And everybody's trying to figure out the best way to proceed.

I'll be going from Buffalo, where I am now, to Rochester to have a forum on bioterrorism and how we should respond.

But I do believe that we should consolidate the public- spokesperson role in one authoritative voice, preferably a doctor or scientist who is very familiar with the biological aspects of this new challenge, someone who, frankly, can come across well on television and offer honest assessments and good information, but, you know, not falsely either panicking people or telling them some things that aren't true in order to make them seem better than they are.

So I think this is a move that is under consideration, and I believe that the administration is settling on someone who would do that role.

KARL: Now, we've had some unity on the question of going about the war on terrorism, but when it comes to other domestic matters, we've seen -- I'm sure you were at the front row seat to all of this -- this week in Congress, some real partisan breakdown, especially on the question of what to do about the economy.

The Democrats have come out with a plan, a plan you have said you support. I want you to listen to what Senator Daschle had to say in defense of this plan. As you remember, the Republicans said that it was littered with special-interest pork-barrel tax breaks, essentially, including one for chicken waste.

Here's what Senator Daschle had to say about that.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. TOM DASCHLE (D-SD), MAJORITY LEADER: Poultry waste and waste of all agricultural products is something that continues to threaten our country. We've got to find ways with which to address the safety, the security of pollution and waste in various ways that have yet been addressed successfully in some parts of our country.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

KARL: Now, Republicans have seized on that, saying, "Poultry waste, a threat to national security, what are the Democrats doing?"

How do you defend against these charges of, you know, kind of pork-barrel tax breaks?

CLINTON: Well, you know, Jonathan, let me start by saying that I thought the plan passed by the House of Representatives was a fiscal disaster that would set our country back for years to come.

I don't understand how they passed it with a straight face, and it was really a giveaway to large corporate interests, even including a provision that encouraged businesses to take their jobs overseas. I don't see what that has to do with trying to put Americans back to work.

What the Finance Committee has tried to do in the Democratic proposal was strike a balance between those kinds of tax breaks for businesses that would truly spur new investments, not something that would go back 15 years like the House did and say, "Well, here's a bunch of money because you didn't like the tax you paid in 1985 and '86," but instead, really linking those kinds of tax breaks to investments and new job creation.

In addition, to try to provide unemployment insurance to those who have lost their jobs, to keep their health insurance by providing some help with that, to look at where we could spur the kind of investments that are future-oriented. And, you know, that does have to do with high technology, with energy efficiency, the kinds of things that people believe would make a difference.

My view on this, though, is pretty simple. We had eight years of prosperity because we paid down our debt and we got rid of our deficit. We hit a rough spot, and it was turned into a terrible bump because of the attacks of September 11.

If we hadn't passed the big tax cut last spring, that I believe undermined our fiscal responsibility and our ability to deal with this new threat of terrorism, we wouldn't be in the fix we're in today. But the fact is, we are.

And now we've got to figure out what's the best way out of it. I certainly don't think more tax breaks that are not linked to investment and job growth or turning our back on the unemployment and health needs of hardworking Americans who have lost their jobs because of the attacks is a very sensible proposal.

I'm also concerned that we're back into deficits, which we know from prior experience are, you know, job killers because they dry up private investment capital.

So I would say that, on balance, the Democratic alternative is far preferable. And any one of us could have written it differently, but, you know, in Congress you make necessary tradeoffs and compromises. The kind of balance that the Finance Committee struck under Chairman Baucus is a heck of a lot better than the Republican alternative or the House-passed alternative.

KARL: Well, we'll be talking to the other side shortly. We'll be talking to Senator Allen, who is kind of the champion for the Republican plan in the Senate.

But as we look at stimulating the economy, look at what's already been done. I am wondering what your thoughts are on the aviation bailout. Five billion dollars in direct payments to the airlines. Now we learn that most of the $5 billion has already been spent; the airlines are still in trouble.

CLINTON: Well, I think the airlines are facing some really troubled times, understandably so. Nobody is flying.

And I would have to point to the fact that, again, the Republicans and now unfortunately, joined by the administration, won't do what I believe most people want us to do, which is to federalize airport security, send a very clear signal that the kind of outrageous security breach that happened in Chicago, which we also found out meant that convicted felons were employed by the security company, will never happen again.

And, you know, the Republican leadership will not accept that having that kind of government law enforcement run our security system so that people can feel safer is probably the best way we can get people flying again for the holidays.

Instead, you know, we're getting National Guards troops in our airports. I've been flying constantly for the last two months, and I must say I respect the role that the National Guard is playing, but they're not doing baggage screening and security checks. They're there in case something terrible or untoward happens.

But what we fear is someone getting through security like they did at O'Hare, with you know, with stun guns, knives and mace. And that's not going to be stopped by posting more National Guards.

So I would hope that the administration and the Republicans would go along with the 100-to-nothing-passed Senate version. Let's get about the business of making our airports safer, and people will start flying again.

KARL: Senator, we only have a few seconds left. Wanted to get your reaction to the mayor's race in New York. Somehow a Democrat managed to lose again, in New York City. How did that happen? What do you think of Michael Bloomberg?

CLINTON: Well, I'm looking forward to working with the mayor- elect. I've already spoken with him.

We're going to have a great need for a close partnership between federal, state and city government. We've got a lot of work to do to clean up New York and rebuild New York. And I think that he's going to be a great partner in that effort.

KARL: Well, Senator, thanks a lot for joining us, and I look forward to seeing you next week up in Capitol Hill.

CLINTON: Around the Capitol. Thanks, Jonathan.

"CNN Breaking News," CNN, 11/12/2001

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: ... in the lead of recovering bodies, looking for evidence along with the FBI, the Police Department. The National Transportation Safety Board are bringing in their experts to determine what happened.

As we were walking over here, we saw one of the plane's engines that had fallen into a boat parked at the end of a driveway of a home, and the back of the home had caught on fire. But miraculously, the front was totally unscarred.

And then another piece of the engine fell into a gasoline station, and again it missed a fuel truck. It didn't penetrate the ground into the fuel tanks.

So although this is a terrible, terrible tragedy, one of the fire chiefs just said that, you know, it could have been a lot worse. And the investigation is looking at, you know, what caused this plane to go out of control so soon after takeoff.

There is absolutely no reason to believe at this time it was anything other than an accident.

QUESTION: Mr. Allbaugh, what are you doing now that you're on- site, what can you do working with the NTSB and the FBI?

JOE ALLBAUGH, DIRECTOR, FEMA: Actually, we're in close coordination with all of those agencies. We just met with Chief Frank Carruthers (ph), who's the incident commander here. Things seem to be well under control. There really isn't much that we can do right at this minute. They're going to be working through the night at the site removing all the bodies that they possibly can. And we'll provide any assistance that any agency needs.

I'm here at the direction of President Bush, making sure they have everything that they need. We'll make sure that they are covered from A to Z.

QUESTION: Are we sure at this point that this is just an accident?

ALLBAUGH: I think it's too soon to be sure. I hope that's the situation. That's horrible to say. We hope that it's just an accident, but it's very early in the process and the investigation.

QUESTION: There are reports that the pilot may have been dumping fuel...

ALLBAUGH: I'm sorry. We can't hear you.

QUESTION: There are reports the pilot may have been dumping fuel over the bay...

ALLBAUGH: I'm unaware of that.

QUESTION: Would that tell us anything if that were true?

CLINTON: Well, that will be part of the NTSB's investigation. And you'll see a lot of FBI agents and police officers who are, you know, walking up and down the streets. They're gathering evidence, both physical and from witnesses. So, that's all being pieced together.

QUESTION: And Mrs. Clinton, this is a city where the people have been through so much already. What would you say to them now on this (UNINTELLIGIBLE)?

CLINTON: Well, it sure has been a very tough two months. But there isn't any city in the world that is better prepared or has, you know, more courage and grit to take whatever comes. You know, I just was running into a lot of the firefighters and police officers that I've seen down at ground zero who are here. This happens to be a neighborhood where a lot of firefighters and police officers live. So you know, we're doing everything we can to deal with this, and you know, I know that the people of New York can rise to any challenge. And they will.

QUESTION: Mrs. Clinton, we know (UNINTELLIGIBLE). For these families overseas, where can they seek for assistance?

CLINTON: American Airlines and the city of New York have set up a -- an emergency center at the Ramada Hotel at JFK Airport. Some of you may remember the tragedy of TWA 800. It's the same hotel. There will be people there to provide information and assistance to family members. So I certainly urge everyone to make their way to the Ramada.

I know that -- I visited during the tragedy following TWA 800. That's where you can find information, where you can find help. And it is a -- it's a very good place for people both from this country and elsewhere to seek information.

BROWN: The junior senator from the state of New York, Hillary Rodham Clinton, along with Joe Allbaugh, the FEMA director, in town now, surveying the scene. These pictures are pool camera pictures.

It is hard, isn't it, not to see this line of firefighters and keep your memory in the present and not go back to the 11th of September?

I was coming into town on the train today (UNINTELLIGIBLE) Grand Central, and someone walked up to me and said, "This is the season of our tests, isn't it?" And it does seem for the city of New York this is exactly that. And this is yet another test for New York.

U.S. SENATOR TED KENNEDY (D-MA) HOLDS NEWS CONFERENCE, 11/14/2001

CLINTON: Thank you, Senator Kennedy, and thank all of you for being here and making very clear what the stakes are in this debate.

You know, I want to add to the eloquent points that Lorraine made out of her personal experience and that Senators Kennedy and Dorgan and Senator Corzine will make about why this is the right thing to do, because there really shouldn't be any debate about that. As has been said, the people like Lorraine across our country who have been laid off after working 10, 20, 30 years, showing up every day, playing by the rules, is something that should demand our immediate action.

But it's also the smart economic choice to make. We are trying to stimulate the economy. We are trying to get money into the hands of people who will spend it, and we know from not only economic theory and the many economists who have spoken with all of us, but we know from our practical -- you know, down on the ground experience -- that people who get unemployment insurance will spend that money. They have to. They have to go in, they have to pay the rent, they have to pay the mortgage, they have to buy the food. They are going to be stimulating economy.

And people who get this help extending their health care benefits are going to be able to avoid falling even further into economic distress. And they are going to do something else -- they are going to prevent the roles of the uninsured from increasing in our country. If they or their children or dependents are sick, they're going to be able to get treatment because we're going to give them this help to extend their health care benefits.

Now, why does that matter? Well, it matters because anytime we increase the number of the uninsured -- and remember, we're talking about working people who had health insurance through their jobs, who no longer will have health insurance -- anytime we increase the number of uninsured Americans, we add burdens onto our already-burdened health care system, onto our hospitals.

You know, speaking just from New York's perspective, we've lost, according to the New York Labor Department, about 250,000 jobs by year's end. Our hospitals are already feeling the extraordinary stress of trying to deal with the World Trade Center, with the plane crash, with the kind of demands that are coming in through the doors of the emergency room every single day.

CLINTON: The last thing we need is to add to the numbers of uninsured people who have to stand in that line to get in the emergency room, who increase the uncompensated costs that our hospitals have to pay, which therefore adds to the burdens of employers and the rest of us who keep our insurance.

So this is not only the right thing to do, to help out somebody like Lorraine and all of these workers behind me. This is the very smart economic decision to make. And I hope that the Republicans in the Senate, and in the House and the administration will really look to see the kind of help that we need to offer our fellow citizens to get them through this rough patch. Because it's not just for them, it's for all of us.

And I applaud Senator Kennedy for his leadership on this issue.

Thank you.

(APPLAUSE)

KENNEDY: Senator Jon Corzine is our cleanup batter today. Jon?.

U. S. SENATOR JON CORZINE (D-NJ): Good morning.

Let me thank all of the folks that are joining us today.

You know, when we get statistics released the first of every month, and it shows 415,000 people are unemployed, we lose track of the fact that they are real human beings with real stories that really do represent a need. Lorraine's story is very clear. And we need to put that in context when we're talking about a stimulative package.

The fact is, as Senator Clinton just said, and I believe, and I'm going to try to show you the practical reality of this, the Democratic stimulus package is about real economics -- how we get real results into the economy. And there are two charts here. We'll talk about one of them. I wish we could put up this other one that showed all that money going off to the Fortune 500.

I came from the business world. And you know, it's nice if you're IBM or Ford or others to get $1.5 billion or $1 billion in tax credits because maybe in the long run that will help your bottom line and your stock price can grow. But it's not going to create jobs in any immediate sense. It is the ultimate in trickle down. As a matter of fact, there are all kinds of economic studies that will tell you it will take three, four, five years to work.

But let me tell you another example of what we have been talking about today, which are health benefits for the uninsured. Here in the Republican plan, where there is no subsidy for those that are unemployed -- no subsidy -- they are going to spend 65 percent of what is already too low unemployment insurance to pay for continued health insurance benefits -- 65 percent of a $925 average monthly pay to go out for health insurance.

So where are they going to get the money to spend for shoes, or to go to any kind of support of their family, or doctors -- all that kind of thing? Where is it going to come from, when all of their unemployment insurance presumably is going to pay for health benefits?

Under the Democratic plan, where we get a 75 percent subsidy, almost all of that $925 is available for real spending. And you know, it provides real support so that Lorraine and others have the ability to continue their health care benefits and take care of themselves as opposed to taking care of the bottom line of the major corporations.

This is real economic stimulus. This is real. People go out and spend this. A dollar invested in stimulating our economy will be $1 that actually goes into the economy. It is not sensible, the kind of structure of stimulus program -- as a matter of fact, it's just a retreading of the same kind of programs we've had with regard to income tax breaks for those that are doing well in our society and corporations -- when in fact we have 415,000 more unemployed today than we had the beginning of October. And it is time to act with regard to strong economic policy, but also one that is sound with regard to real human lives.

And so I'm proud to stand here with my colleagues and make this point today. We will be making that on the floor because this is a real economic stimulus program that is focused on how we get money into the hands of those that will spend it.

Thank you.

(APPLAUSE)

KENNEDY: Finally, we welcome the support of the mayors of this country that have indicated their support for us, and Families U.S.A., which has been the principal group that has spoken for good quality health care for all Americans. Virtually all of the children's groups, all of the disability groups, all of the women's health groups have indicated strong support. I'm not going to take the time now, but there are two pages of different groups that understand the importance of decent health care for working families, and believe that this proposal is the best way to do it. And we are going to fight for it on the floor of the United States Senate. And we are going to be hopefully successful.

(APPLAUSE)

So, I want to particularly thank as well our sponsoring group, Campaign for Job and Income Support. We want to thank all of them that have been here.

(APPLAUSE)

I knew I would say something that would get applause if I stayed around here long enough.

OK, any of our colleagues would be glad to answer any of the questions which you have.

Let me just say then, finally, we are not only going to fight for this program, but we are going to resist the Republican effort to try and utilize unexpended funds that were voted to provide health insurance for needy children in this country as a means and a way to fund their health insurance for displaced workers.

KENNEDY: That's robbing Peter to pay Paul, and it makes absolutely no sense at all. The states need those funds. They will need them to cover their shortfall in these next two to three years. And they are virtually earmarked for coverage for children, primarily for needy working families. It goes from about $33,000 a year to about $15,000 a year, where health insurance is so expensive that these working families can't cover it. That's what the CHIP program was targeted for.

And we are not going to permit the Republicans to divert those needed funds which have been earmarked for children in our country when the OMB feels that they have got sufficient funding to be able to have the $1.4 billion for IBM and $1 billion for Ford and on and on -- several billion dollars. And we wonder why the administration's OMB can find the money in the treasury to afford that and not afford what is the health insurance programs for America's workers.

This is a clear question of choice. It's a clear issue of priority. Who is on the side of working families? And we welcome the opportunity to champion their cause.

Thank you very much.

U.S. SENATOR EDWARD KENNEDY (D-MA) HOLDS HEARING ON NA-TION'S ABILITY TO PROVIDE A RELIABLE SUPPLY OF VACCINES FOR AMERICANS, 11/27/2001

CLINTON: Thank you very much.

And I thank you, Senator Reed, for holding this important hearing. And I'd like unanimous consent to submit my opening statement...

KENNEDY (?): (inaudible)

CLINTON: ... for the record.

I am delighted to have this panel and I want to thank both Dr. Orenstein and Dr. Fauci for their lifetime of commitment and work on this and so many other important issues. And I also want to acknowledge and thank my friend, Betty Bumpers, who has been working on this for decades now, not just years. And she, along with Mrs. Carter, have continually brought this matter to our attention.

But I would imagine -- and, unfortunately, I have to go preside, I'm not going to be able to be here for the second panel -- I would imagine that there is a kind of frustration that Mrs. Bumpers, Mrs. Carter, the doctors and those of us who've worked on this issue for many years feel because here we are, once again, talking about the challenges of immunizing our populations, particularly our children. And I'm hoping that out of this set of hearings and particularly the bill that you've introduced, Senator Reed, the bill that Senator Feinstein has introduced and then whatever else we need to do, we will be able to address the challenges of funding, of adequate infrastructure, of the appropriate public-private partnerships that are needed so that perhaps we won't have to continually revisit this issue.

And I'm hoping, too, that the unfortunate threats that we face because of bioterrorism will galvanize us into action on a range of responses that go from improving our immunization rates for the typical childhood immunizations to being better prepared for the production of vaccines for not only influenza but for any other threat, like smallpox.

I just had two questions that I don't know that they've been addressed yet, but I would like to ask our two experts to respond to. We've talked a lot about the fragility and shortfalls in our vaccine supply. And I'm confident that we're going to respond to that. I just hope it's sooner than later. But I'd also like you to address the potential shortages in the supply of therapies to treat vaccine-related illnesses. There's been a lot of talk in the press about the number of people who might be adversely affected by smallpox vaccination, whether we did it in a limited way if it were required or on a mass basis. And I understand that our supply of what are called VIGs -- vaccinia immunoglobulins -- needed to treat adverse events from smallpox vaccinations is dangerously low. And I would assume that other VIGs are similarly in low supply. What plans do we have along with increasing our vaccines -- the availability, the affordability -- to address this VIG supply problem as well?

Dr. Orenstein?

ORENSTEIN: Actually, there's an interagency group looking at -- at the same time that we are increasing our smallpox vaccine supply is looking for ways that we can increase our vaccine immune globulin supply.

They're also looking at other kinds of therapies that might be helpful. For example, it turns out that many lots of some standard intravenous immune globulin have been collected from people who still had antibodies to vaccinia. And there is an effort underway to determine whether those lots might be useful to treat any adverse effects of smallpox vaccine.

But I think the interagency group, which is multiple partners throughout the executive branch, is taking this very seriously.

FAUCI: There's another issue, Senator Clinton, that is, I think, very important and that is, in addition to what Dr. Orenstein says, it's the development of antivirals against smallpox. Smallpox was a problem in an era that anti-dated any antivirals. We have an interesting situation that I think will serve as the prototype that will (ph) -- of research that we are now actively pursuing. We, the scientific community, developed a drug years ago for one of the complications for HIV. And that was a drug called Sadoftaveere (ph), which is an antiviral against the Cytomegalo virus -- the CMV that so many of the HIV infected individuals used to get. They don't get much of it now because of the effective drugs that we have.

It turns out that that drug is extraordinarily potent against a variety of pox viruses in a monkey model and in an in vitro system. So what the NIH has done, together with our colleagues at the CDC and other agencies -- the FDA -- have taken out an investigational new drug application to use Sadoftaveere (ph) as a back up for vaccinia-related problems -- as a backup to VIG.

So VIG, as you mentioned appropriately, is still the first line of defense. Hopefully we'll get more of that with the studies that Dr. Orenstein is referring to. But we also now have the capability in an experimental way of looking at antivirals. And not only Sadofftaveere (ph), but we're screening a whole group of other related compounds. If we're successful, we'll have a two-pronged defense against that. We'll have immune globulin and an antiviral.

CLINTON: Dr. Fauci, I'd like to follow up on that because it leads me to another question. I know you, particularly, have been an advocate for the role of technology transfer tools in the development of new vaccines and I would assume that would also be the same with VIG development. I think we need to be creative about how we look at these technology transfer instruments -- the cooperative research and development agreement. It seems to me that there ought to be a way as we're looking for a guaranteed supply and an affordable rate to create more of an opportunity for NIH or the federal government to retain certain rights that would then be plowed back in to the development of a lot of the vaccines and the antivirals and the rest of the range that we know we now need.

Is there a way to think about doing that that, perhaps, we could put on the table that we haven't looked at before?

FAUCI: I think so. And I think it's a very delicate issue because it's a delicate balance. You don't want to have so much, quote, "control" by the federal government that it's a disincentive for the industry to get involved. On the other hand, you don't want to just give away the store and not have the capability of being able to have the kinds of in-good-faith interactions to be able to have what's the best for the public health with the public investment.

I think that's an issue that still has not been satisfactorily addressed. We've made attempts and some of them have been successful. But I think if we can get that on the table again and examine it in a good-faith way and come out with some better interactions between industry and government, we will go a rather long way further towards improving the interaction and the public health.

So I'm enthusiastic about that.

CLINTON: Well -- and I know that on the second panel we'll be hearing from a witness who will be talking about the need to limit liability for manufacturers.

CLINTON: And I think we should put all of this on the table. I mean, part of what our new challenges are calling us to do is to think outside the box. I mean, how do we create a supply of vaccines that is constantly available? How do we make them affordable?

I would just end by pointing out that, you know, Betty Bumpers has some very good suggestions in her testimony that really go to the heart of once we do this creative work, how do we make that available to people? There might be an opportunity if we're thinking about relieving people of liability -- if we're thinking about creating these agreements -- that we could begin to create a fund that would help to provide access, increase our infrastructure, create the accountability systems that many of us have been talking about for, you know, 25 or 30 years but we've never adequately funded because when our immunization rates are high, or higher than they traditionally have been, it falls off the radar screen. And then when they go down again, and Senator Bingaman raises issues about his state, for example, then, you know, we have a spike. But we don't have the continuing commitment. And if we're going to look at a lot of new ways of addressing this, I think the public-private partnership and all the rest of it could begin to create some funding streams that might be used not only for research, but for actually delivering vaccines.

Thank you.

"The Early Show," CBS, 11/29/2001

Jane, as you know, women in Afghanistan lost their rights when the Taliban took control of their country. Now that the Taliban's out of power, there's hope that women can renew their place in Afghan society. Women like Farida, who fled Afghanistan with her children over a little over a year ago and is now hoping to return. She's on Capitol Hill with Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton. Ladies, good morning.

Senator HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (Democrat, New York): Good morning, Bryant.

Ms. FARIDA (Fled Afghanistan because of Taliban): Good morning.

GUMBEL: Senator Clinton, let me start with you, if I might. You're going to be hosting a Senate panel on the future of Afghan women. What's--what's the objective?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, Bryant, we want Afghan women to have the opportunity to speak for themselves. And here in the Senate we've been introducing legislation and calling on the international community and our own government to ensure that the Afghan women are at the table in Bonn and part of any transitional government. But really, the best people to speak on what has happened over the last years and the hopes for the future are women like Farida, and the other women who are here with the Vital Voices Project who have been brought into the United States, and met with Mrs. Bush and will be here in the Senate this afternoon.

GUMBEL: Well, before I get a chance to speak with Farida, let me ask you this, when all of Afghanistan is in conflict, and when the country has so many problems, why single out the plight of women for attention?

Sen. CLINTON: Bryant, we know from long experience that when half the population are oppressed and denied their rights, that leads to instability, not stability. Women played a very important role in Afghanistan before the Taliban. Many women want to go back or emerge from the fighting and the overthrow of the Taliban to resume their roles. We're not asking that particular choices be pushed on women. We want to give women the opportunity to make their own choices, like Farida has done...

GUMBEL: Uh-huh.

Sen. CLINTON: ...in her very courageous work on behalf of peace over the years.

GUMBEL: Farida, let me ask you, your words, how active a role in--in Afghanistan did you play before the Taliban took control?

Ms. FARIDA: I was working, before Taliban. I was in Kabul, and what I do in Kabul I was work to help women projects inside Afghanistan, like we had income generating and skill building and education--educational training, and health programs for Afghan women to have access to these programs. I--I had even an education inside Afghanistan with my two children and husband. And even I walked for three-four hours to reach the places that they don't have access...

GUMBEL: Mm-hmm.

Ms. FARIDA: ...such--in such programs.

GUMBEL: We've--we've seen pictures of women in Afghanistan being hit with sticks, some even being executed. How difficult was it for you and other women to suffer in silence while the Taliban were in control?

Ms. FARIDA: I know there was--there was threatened and a risk for me, even for my family, that I lost one of--a member of my family during the Taliban regime. He was killed there. So I didn't want my--to put my children and other family member in danger, and in such a risk situation in Afghanistan. And then I came into Pakistan and then from Pakistan I came to the United States. And if we have such programs like leadership training that we have now from Vital Voice, I think it will support and--and relieve us, and the role of this--of women...

GUMBEL: Mm-hmm.

Ms. FARIDA: ...and make us stronger.

GUMBEL: Senator Clinton, you--you've heard the criticism that promoting equal rights for women in Afghanistan amounts to some form of cultural imperialism. How do you respond to that?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, Bryant, I've heard it all my life, I guess, not just with respect to Afghanistan. But, you know, in 1995 I said what I believe, which is that women's rights are human rights. And I think that we have to stand for that. During the Clinton administration we stood against the recognition of the Taliban regime because of the apartheid that they practiced against the women in Afghanistan. So, as we move forward, I think our values, which are universal values, respecting the rights of individuals, don't mean that individuals can't choose whatever religious or cultural practices they believe in, but that they should be given a stable society in which to make those choices.

GUMBEL: All right, we'll let that be the last word. Senator--Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, I thank you very much. Farida, thank you and wish you well.

Sen. CLINTON: Thank you, Bryant.

Ms. FARIDA: Thank you.

GUMBEL: All right, it's 7:35.

"Mornings with Paula Zahn," CNN, 11/29/2001

PAULA ZAHN, CNN ANCHOR: Welcome back. For the first time since the Taliban took control of Kabul five years ago, Afghan women are again able to show their faces in public. The fall of the Taliban has freed women to shed their burkas, lifting the veil that made them all but invisible. But what does the future hold for Afghan women?

Joining us now from Capitol Hill New York Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton along with her, an Afghan woman named Farida. Farida left Kabul just as the Taliban came to power. Her husband remains there in hiding. Welcome to both of you, delighted to have you with us.

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON, (D), NEW YORK: Thank you Paula.

ZAHN: So Senator, before we talk with Farida directly, I have a question for you. We have had a number of Afghan women on the air over the last several weeks who have basically accused the Northern Alliance men of being animals and they say they don't treat women all that differently from the Taliban. How concerned are you about the fate of women in this transition period as a government is formed?

CLINTON: Paula, I'm very concerned. I think one of the reasons we're holding this hearing today to hear from Afghani women like Farida is to make sure their voices are heard and one of their experiences is that the Northern Alliance was not a stable governing regime and in fact, there were many abuses of power and crimes against women and others committed during that time period. Then the Taliban came along, partly as a reaction to try to impose law and order and of course went so far that they oppressed half of the Afghani people.

We want to have a stable situation, a peaceful one, with the kind of security that will enable women to go about their daily lives, to resume in their positions in the workplace, to be part of whatever transitional government takes place. But in order to do that, we have to have a stable regime. I'm pleased that in Bonn they seem to be making some progress, and there are women there as participants and observers.

But I think it's only right that the Afghani women speak for themselves after having been silenced so long, first by fear because of lawlessness and then second, by the Taliban's repressive regime which kept them basically without a voice.

ZAHN: Farida, you have been in America for a year now. You have political asylum. Do you plan to return home or are you still afraid?

FARIDA: Sure, I plan to go back to Afghanistan, but first of all to make sure that there is peace and stability and security and (INAUDIBLE) security (INAUDIBLE) guaranteed there. I'm sure every single Afghan will contribute and they want to participate in rebuilding and reconstruction of Afghanistan.

ZAHN: And what do you believe will be the key to a better life for Afghan women?

FARIDA: I think first of all that to make sure that and all that broad-based government is established once in Afghanistan and to have the participation of all groups and all ethnic groups and representative of all side of Afghanistan and also women to play a key role in establishment of government in Afghanistan.

ZAHN: Farida, what do you think might have happened to you if you hadn't sought political asylum, if you had stayed in Afghanistan during the Taliban era?

FARIDA: Obviously if I was there, I would have been killed. It was not just myself, my family and especially my children that I have hope for their future to be builder of Afghanistan and their future (INAUDIBLE) Afghanistan and the next generation that we want them to have peaceful life and security at to what they want to wish to achieve in their life and to provide them. So this is my hope that once we will get this.

CLINTON: You know Paula, one of the things that we're going to be talking about at the panel today with all of the senators is how so many of these women were really forced to leave Afghanistan. They had to seek refuge. They crossed the border, usually into Pakistan, but in Farida's case and the case of so many others, they kept going back often at great personal danger.

The reason you don't know her last name is because her husband is still in hiding. We want the individual voices of these women to really communicate to Americans how difficult this has been, but how much hope and resilience they have and how willing they are to play their part in building a peaceful, stable future for Afghanistan.

ZAHN: And Senator I know this is an issue you have cared deeply about for years. As you know First Lady Laura Bush got a great deal of credit for - excuse me I'm losing my voice here - doing a radio address focusing in on the plight of Afghan women two weekends ago. As you look back at your time as First Lady, do you think if there was anything more you could have done to focus America's attention on the plight of these women?

CLINTON: Well I'm really grateful that Mrs. Bush has taken such a strong leadership role in speaking out on behalf of Afghani women and their rights and the role that they must play in the future. I spoke with her yesterday and I was delighted that these women were able to go to the White House through the Vital Voices partnership, which has sponsored their visit here to meet her personally and to sit and talk with her.

You know during the Clinton administration, we took some very strong stands. We refused to recognize the Taliban. I and Secretary Albright and others were very vocal in saying that you can not recognize a regime that basically has imposed an apartheid (ph) system on half their population, which has attempted to deny women all their rights. That goes in the face of universal principles of what we believe human rights are - certainly was absolutely contrary to what I believe and as I stated in Beijing about women's rights being human rights, I think we have seen a lot of progress in our understanding of what the women in Afghanistan suffered.

But I think now is the real opportunity for us to stand with these women to provide the education and health care and other services that they're going to need and to recognize that we can't walk away from Afghanistan again as we did more than 10 years ago. We have to be willing to support those brave Afghan men and women who are willing to stand against the Taliban, but also against disorder, criminal behavior, violence in order to build a peaceful society.

ZAHN: Senator Clinton, Farida, thank you both for filling us in on the hearings that come later today and we'd love to have the two of you back once a former government is in place and maybe to gauge your reaction to how you think women are represented in that government.

Thank you both for your time this morning. Good luck at your hearing.

CLINTON: Thank you Paula.

U.S. SENATOR JAMES JEFFORDS (I-VT) HOLDS HEARING ON REMEDIATION PROCESS OF BIOLOGICALLY CONTAMINATED BUILDINGS, 12/4/2001

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and I'd like to submit my opening statement for the record. And I want to associate myself with the questions and comments of both Senator Corzine and Senator Voinovich on the matter concerning the protocol for use and the responsibility for overseeing the response to anthrax.

I appreciate very much your describing to us in your written testimony as well as here what you're doing. I think we do have a lot of questions that we need to answer. They're questions that everybody's trying to answer. There isn't any standard response out there yet. But that's what we're intent upon learning about and trying to create.

On October 26, I actually wrote to the Postmaster General and the Centers for Disease Control, asking that we begin the process of trying to adopt a standard protocol. And we look forward to working with EPA, with every other agency that is affected.

Certainly, the impact on my colleagues, including EPW staff, because of the discovery of anthrax and its effects in Hart have been extremely difficult, and we know that it's even more so for our citizens who have been working in post offices. I just want to be sure that whatever we do, we do for everyone, that we don't have some special treatment for members of Congress as opposed to people who work in postal offices or any other facility.

One question I would have, specifically, out of your written testimony is that the agency has apparently approved two pesticides for treating anthrax spores under emergency exemption provisions of existing pesticide laws. And I would like just a written response with more explanation as to what that means -- how does it work? And I believe that the emergency approval was to permit actions to be taken in postal facilities, and I, along with my colleagues, hope we are getting good information about comparing what we've done in the Hart Building with the use of the aqueous solution of chlorine dioxide and a foam of some kind, just so that we know what we're learning and what we're doing.

I'd also be interested in how you're currently paying for the work that you're undertaking, since I believe you asked in your testimony, among other things, the ability to recover cleanup costs. How is that being paid for now?

WHITMAN: Right now, we're working under CERCLA. We've spent about $7.5 million to date nationwide. We expect that to get significantly higher before we're finished with it.

The Senate has agreed to pay for the decontamination here, and that's an area where we have some concerns. There is not a responsible party here in the traditional sense, because this was done by a third party unknown to everyone who's been impacted by it thus far. So we are using our CERCLA monies at the moment to do that.

CLINTON: Well, I would just note that in Senator Byrd's homeland defense package that I think we're going to be considering this week, there might very well be some funds that could be used to reimburse EPA for the work that it's doing right now.

On a different environmental and public health issue, I'd like your response about ground zero and the area surrounding the World Trade Center. As we all unfortunately are aware, the fires are still burning. If you saw the paper today, there's going to be an effort to remove the gas that was used to cool the towers, something that is extraordinarily difficult to undertake.

Certainly, I hear from a lot of people who are complaining about the air quality, asking questions about the environmental and public health concerns, whether it's asbestos, dust, or high levels of benzene (ph), or thousands of gallons of PCB laden oil being released. As you know, I sent a letter on October 26 expressing my concerns on this issue and requesting a meeting, and I was scheduled to meet with Assistant Administrator Maryann Hurenko (ph), who I'm pleased to see is here. She had to, unfortunately, cancel that meeting last week, which I hope will be rescheduled for this week.

I look forward to meeting with you, because I think it's imperative that we make every effort to provide the best possible information to people about what is happening in the air quality testing, so that the public can make decisions concerning their own wellbeing.

One of the big issues we're facing right now, Mr. Chairman, is whether to bring elementary school children back down to ground zero to be going to school in their schools again, and I don't know what to tell parents. I don't know what I would do if I were the mother of an elementary school child.

We did reopen Stiveson (ph) High School. The kids are going to school. The air is being tested, but there's a lot of what we're now calling World Trade Center cough, respiratory, asthma problems, and no one is quite sure whether we should go with the younger children.

So, Mr. Chairman, I think this would be a good matter to hold a hearing about when we get back after the holidays to try to figure out what we should be doing and how we can provide good information.

And, finally, I couldn't have the administrator appear before the committee without asking about the Hudson River cleanup. I would like, if I could, a brief update on the record of decision and when you expect that to be sent to the state.

I know that the governor and many of us have been working very hard behind the scenes to make sure that this is carried out the way that we believe it should be, and we're opposed to the agency including performance standards in the record of decision. And I hope that you're going to be able to give me some news today about where we stand in that process.

JEFFORDS: I'm sorry. Your time has expired.

(LAUGHTER)

CLINTON: I'll wait around.

JEFFORDS: Please proceed.

WHITMAN: We hope to have that out very shortly, and I mean very shortly.

CLINTON: Very shortly. Is that like within the time period that I'm no longer able to -- I assume very shortly -- the end of this week?

WHITMAN: We hope.

JEFFORDS: Well, thank you very much. We deeply appreciate your help, and we will be continuing to communicate with you to try to get a better understanding of where we are and where we're going.

I know one question I'd like to sort of end up with is when does zero arrive in the determination of a risk in these situations? Those of us that are involved with farmers know that anthrax is in the fields, and yet we seem to be looking for one spore to close things down. What kind of guidance do we have as to when it's a sufficient problem to take action?

WHITMAN: Well, Senator, there is no background level that's been determined of anthrax in an urban setting or in buildings, and that's why, at the moment, the goal that's advocated by the CDC is zero. That's what we're operating toward.

We have cleaned up three offices thus far in the Hart Building, and they are showing no sign of contamination. They have been successfully remediated. We have overseen the remediation of a couple of post offices in Florida, where they did call us in -- at Brentwood, they have not -- to take a more active role, and those have been cleaned and show no background.

So we're comfortable that we will be able to reach that understanding. As you say, anthrax is a naturally occurring agent, not in the kind of form and milled to the fineness that the anthrax in the letter to Senator Daschle was milled. That was very refined. It was able to get through the envelope itself without even having to have been opened. They're finding that, in fact, it could get through the paper itself.

So this is a different type of contamination of anthrax. But the CDC is looking at this, and the CDC will make the determination of what is safe, whether there is a safe level of anthrax for human exposure. And until that time, until they make that kind of determination, we will be going for the goal of zero anthrax, and, thus far, we have seen that.

JEFFORDS: You mentioned that Presidential Decision Directive Number 62 needs improvement. What changes do you think may be necessary to strengthen the Presidential Decision Directive 62, and do you anticipate recommending these changes to the president?

WHITMAN: We are working very closely with the Office of Homeland Security.

WHITMAN: We're working through lessons learned on this whole issue and analyzing where we think there could be better coordination, where we feel there is more need for focus, for instance, as I indicated, on what we need to provide our responders.

I mean, we've had people in the Hart Building from the very beginning. Initially, they didn't have all of the protective gear that they now are wearing, although we took extra steps right from the beginning. But we need to come to a better understanding of how those determinations are made and coordinate that more closely.

JEFFORDS: Senator Voinovich?

VOINOVICH: I'd just like the statement that I've prepared inserted in the record, and I have no further questions.

JEFFORDS: Senator Corzine?

CORZINE: Administrator Whitman, did I hear you say that you were invited in or requested in in the Florida postal situation and not in others?

WHITMAN: There were three postal buildings in Florida where we were asked to actively oversee and be in the building as they decontaminated. They have moved forward with decontamination. They hired contractors, moved forward with decontamination. We have done the...

CORZINE: Are you supervising the decontamination in Florida?

WHITMAN: We're technical consultants and coordinators. It's not a -- you know, we're not doing...

CORZINE: I think the whole point here that I'm driving at is the same one that we've heard several times here. One time, you're in. Sometimes you're not.

I don't think people are going to take great confidence in knowing that there are broadly different approaches to this, and it's not particularly fair to your staff and certainly not fair to the public at large. And if one thought that the Hart project was going to get the triple-A fashion treatment, and others are not, I think there will be serious misgivings in the public, and rightly so.

WHITMAN: There's no difference in the approach taken and the thoroughness of the approach taken. Anything where we're consulting and acting as technical advisors, the standards are exactly the same for everybody.

CORZINE: If you're acting as technical advisors.

WHITMAN: Right, yes.

CORZINE: That's a big difference across the way, and this is not like you're going to have 100,000 incidents. We hope it's not going to be the kind of thing where you have to have a lot of practice. So where the best practices reside, I think the public has a reasonable right to expect that we apply them on a consistent basis.

Again, I want to underscore multiple times this idea of trying to get to best practices and making sure that we have a coherent and consistent protocol on how we deal with this.

JEFFORDS: Senator Clinton?

CLINTON: I just want to be absolutely clear that EPA has not been asked for help with the anthrax contaminated buildings in New York.

WHITMAN: No. The NBC buildings were done -- they had private contractors that did that.

CLINTON: And the postal facilities?

WHITMAN: In New Jersey, they've not done anything at the Hamilton facility. That remains closed to date. We have an on-scene coordinator there working with them.

CLINTON: What does that mean, though? If you've got an on-scene coordinator, what level of responsibility does that suggest?

WHITMAN: If we were to determine that the cleanup was not thorough enough, that the capabilities did not exist with the on-scene coordinator or whomever was doing the actual decontamination, then we could go to court to supercede them, to come in and oversee the actual decontamination.

There is an entire protocol of response, as you know, that on- scene -- the first people on the scene usually are the local responders, and they are the ones who are the responsible party for seeing it through to the end. Working very closely with the federal government, depending on who's needed, they will bring in the national response team, and that is made up of all the different agencies. So it depends on what the threat is, what the problem is, who is involved in it.

CLINTON: But you're not involved in Morgan (ph) Station, which is a very large postal facility in Manhattan, at all?

UNKNOWN: (OFF-MIKE)

WHITMAN: Could you hear that answer?

CLINTON: Yes, I did. Let me ask, too, about the protocol for dealing with the waste that comes out of these buildings after they are decontaminated. I think there was an article about Tom Brokaw's desk being sent to some waste disposal facility.

Is there an existing protocol yet about what we do with the hazmat suits, with the vacuum cleaning equipment, with desks or other pieces of furniture, or carpeting that has been infected? Is the waste going to a hazardous waste facility? Where are we in the process of figuring out what we do with this?

WHITMAN: It's all treated as hazardous waste and taken to appropriate hazardous waste disposal facilities.

CLINTON: Even if you're not involved.

WHITMAN: We have an on-scene coordinator who will make sure that nothing is overlooked in terms of the public safety. We don't make the final decisions. Senator Corzine was looking for kind of a set pattern of how it happens. There is really a set pattern. There's just not a set response.

What we will do is once there's been a determination that there is a biological agent that poses a threat to human health, we will have an on-scene coordinator onsite, overseeing to make sure that those handling the actual decontamination are handling that appropriately and that the waste is handled appropriately as well.

But we can't force them to do things. We don't have the legal authority to force them to take actions. We can suggest, we can recommend, but the only way we could force is to go to court to supercede them as the primary responder.

CLINTON: So a city could make its own decisions, a county. Could a private facility basically decide they were going to handle it on their own and not have...

WHITMAN: Yes.

CLINTON: If there were another incident in New York, you could have a private company say they didn't want the New York City first responders, they didn't want the EPA, that they were going to do this all by themselves? That's all permissible under the laws that currently stand?

WHITMAN: They could make that determination. But if it was determined that, in fact, there was a biological or chemical agent there that posed a risk to human health, we would have an on-scene coordinator, and if we felt they were doing something to jeopardize people, then we could go to court to supercede them. But, no, you're correct in saying that they have the primary responsibility for decision making.

CLINTON: Well, it's clear I think we have a lot of work to do thinking this through, Mr. Chairman. I thank you for having this hearing.

"CNN Capital Gang," CNN, 12/15/2001

Senator Clinton appeared on NBC's "Meet the Press" last Sunday, and is the subject of the cover story in tomorrow's, Sunday's, "New York Times" magazine. Al Hunt sat down with her on Capitol Hill earlier this week.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

HUNT: Senator, your first experience in a legislative body, you started at the top. How is the Senate different from your expectations?

SEN. HILLARY CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Well, I didn't know what to expect. It's turned out to be an extraordinarily positive experience for me. I have felt very welcomed by my colleagues. I feel like I've been able to get a lot done this year.

HUNT: Your proudest moment?

CLINTON: Well, you know, Al, I think it's hard to call it the proudest moment, but the fight that we've had to wage on behalf of New York's needs since September 11 has, you know, focused every cell in my body. That honor was just, you know, extraordinary, to be able to stand on the floor of the Senate and speak on behalf of the people who had demonstrated what America stands for so well.

HUNT: In New York City, the federal government has committed $20 billion. Is that sufficient, or will the city have to come to the federal government for more money?

CLINTON: I don't believe that is anywhere near sufficient. It was a great vote of confidence for New York, when the president and the Congress stood behind that $20 billion. We've had to fight very hard to get about $12.5 billion in terms of what the administration has provided and what we voted for in the Senate.

Our needs are so much greater, and particularly when it comes to rebuilding New York. We have not only the World Trade Center site to think of, we have all the underground damage that destroyed subway lines, the path train coming from New Jersey. We're going to have a lot of expensive rebuilding. But I'm confident we're going to get the support we need.

HUNT: September the 11th affected everyone. You and Mayor Giuliani afterward overcame a long-standing animus and worked very closely together. Was that a spirit-of-the-moment change, or do you think you and Rudy Giuliani really have an enduringly different relationship now?

CLINTON: Well, I hope it's the latter. You know, I have the greatest of respect for the mayor. His courage, his resilience, his demonstrable love of New York is just inspiring, and we saw that in action on September 11 and in the weeks since. And I hope that whatever he chooses to do next in his life will bring him a lot of happiness, and I imagine he'll be, you know, still involved on behalf of New York, which he truly is absolutely dedicated to doing everything he can to help.

HUNT: As you know, there's never any shortage of Hillary- bashers.

CLINTON: Oh, no.

HUNT: Yes.

CLINTON: Oh, Al.

HUNT: One, TV talk show host Bill O'Reilly is assailing you now for what he charges is indifference to the families of 9/11 victims. He says you have only attended three memorials services. Your response.

CLINTON: Well, you know, he assails me for something nearly every day and I -- I feel sorry for him. I have done everything I can, not only attending the memorial services that were held in New York and in Washington, going to the funerals of the people that I knew personally. I do not believe after a long lifetime in and around politics that people should thrust themselves into private grief just because they're politicians.

So I was privileged to go and speak at the funerals of the two people I knew, one of whom was the chaplain, who was a great man, as everyone now knows. I've also worked very hard to meet privately with a lot of the families and the victims. I'm working very hard to make sure that they get the help they need.

HUNT: Will there be a public role for Bill Clinton in the next year, and what might it be?

CLINTON: You know, Al, I think that he has a very busy agenda that includes a lot of public activities. Certainly the work he's done on earthquake relief in India, on HIV-AIDS in Africa, where he's assumed a position with respect to the AIDS Trust. I think that he will begin holding conferences and speaking out on a lot of the important issues facing our country and the world.

HUNT: Is he a good political adviser, too?

CLINTON: He's the best.

"CNN Live Today," CNN, 12/18/2001

JUDY WOODRUFF, CNN ANCHOR: As we have been reporting, there's a great deal going on here in Washington as Congress prepares to leave town. Those talks are continuing on an economic stimulus package. And a sweeping education bill today passed the Senate by a large majority. New York's Democratic senator, Hillary Rodham Clinton, joins me now from Capitol Hill.

Senator, thank you for joining us. Was this education bill all that you wanted?

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Well, Judy, it wasn't all that I wanted, or all that I think that the children of our country need. But it was a step forward in the right direction, because we were able to target the money, called title 1 funds, more effectively for the poorest of our children in the highest need districts.

And you know, that's really important for a state like New York, because we have a lot of cities, from New York to Buffalo, that, you know, are really trying to educate children who have a lot of needs when they walk in the door.

WOODRUFF: Senator, CNN has learned, one of our reporters, Dana Bash, was telling us a little bit earlier today that last week there was a meeting in which you and other Democrats in the Senate met, sat down with Senator Kennedy, and urged him not to go forward with this bill unless there was more money forthcoming from the White House.

Now, that money -- more money was not forthcoming, and yet the bill passed. You voted for it. Did you change your mind here?

CLINTON: Well, Judy, ever since last spring, I have said the very same thing. I believe that we should have both high standards and more resources. And that will give us the kind of results that we need from our school system.

And I think we made some real progress. We got more money than initially was offered by the administration. What we were particularly concerned about, though, in the weeks leading up to this vote, is the failure to support the Senate bipartisan commitment to fully fund special education. I was very proud of the Senate that we did, during the education debate, pass an amendment which made very clear that, finally, the government was going to support local districts in the very big expense of paying for special ed.

Unfortunately, the House and the administration did not go along with the Senate's bill. And we, after a lot of negotiation, were not successful in moving that forward. We will be back, however, because, as I travel around New York, the cost of special education is something I hear about from one end of the state to the other in every kind of district.

So, as I say, it was a step forward. It wasn't everything I would have wanted or that I believe is needed. But it was enough that I particularly felt comfortable supporting it because, in New York, we are suffering from the effects of 9/11. We have a tremendous loss of revenues. And this will bring hundreds of millions of new dollars into the state.

WOODRUFF: Senator, I want to turn now to the economic stimulus, so-called economic stimulus plan. The president is pushing very hard. He is working, as we know now, with Democratic centrists in the Senate to try to put pressure on -- not just on the leader, Tom Daschle, but on you and other Democrats who have wanted a different approach to stimulating the economy.

And the president, in so doing, Senator, is portraying Democrats as being the ones who are against those who have been laid off here. What's going on?

CLINTON: Well, I think a little partisan politics may have reared its ugly head, because, certainly, the priority that I have and that many of my colleagues share, is to take care of the people we promised to take care of when we first passed the airline bailout bill.

If you remember -- I sure do -- we were told that we needed to do that. I voted for it because I wanted people to start flying again and I wanted our airlines to have the support they needed. But we wanted at that time to start taking care of people who had been laid off, who had lost their jobs and lost their health care. We were promised that we would get that kind of help. And still we are fighting for it.

And, you know, a lot of what is being proposed here has no economic basis. It is not going to stimulate the economy. And it is not really meeting the needs of the people who are most at risk of having been affected by this 9/11 tragedy.

WOODRUFF: But the president and the White House are portraying the Democrats as the obstructionists here, preventing health care assistance for those who have been laid off.

CLINTON: Well, it would be very easy to solve this. All we have to do is increase the Medicaid matching rate so that states all over the country that are having terrible times with their health care needs can take care of people, provide extended unemployment insurance, and subsidize the COBRA payments for people who are COBRA eligible, not with some kind of a tax credit, which most people would not be able to afford, but with the kind of subsidy that the Democrats have offered. And we could have a deal and be home for Christmas.

WOODRUFF: Senator, two very quick questions. One is, the White House is now saying the president may move during the holiday recess to nominate -- to go ahead and make some recess appointments, people who you and others in the Senate have not agreed to. Is that a smart move on his part or not?

CLINTON: Well, we would have to wait and see who he is going to be nominating. I think that the committees handling nominations have proceeded very efficiently. They have certainly confirmed more people than sometimes was done in the previous administration by a different Congress.

So I will have to wait and see who is nominated. I'm interested in quality people. I know that the president has a right to nominate those with whom he agrees. But I think some positions call for a more balanced approach. So I'll withhold judgment until I see who the people are.

WOODRUFF: And, finally, Senator, do you agree with your colleague, Senator Schumer from New York, that what needs to happen is for the Super Bowl to be moved to Giants Stadium outside New York City from New Orleans?

CLINTON: I want as many big events in New York as we can possibly get. That includes the Super Bowl. That includes both political conventions. I would like to see the Congress convene in New York, as the very first Congress did in the beginning of our country. I would like to see the Olympics come to New York.

We want to move as much as we can to demonstrate that New York is still the capital of the world. And we are open for business. We want people to come. And these would be good steps to do that.

WOODRUFF: All right, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, thank you very much.

CLINTON: Thank you. Happy holidays to you.

WOODRUFF: And to you.

"Larry King Live," CNN, 12/18/2001

KING: Joining us now in Washington is Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, a member of the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, of course, the former first lady; and in New York, Dr. Kerry Kelly, chief medical officer of the New York Fire Department, has been with that department for 20 years. Her father and grandfather were firefighters. She testified before the Senate about the need for mental health resources for firefighters and public safety officials in the aftermath of September 11. That's what we are here to talk about.

But I want to ask one question of Senator Clinton first. What do you make of this John Walker thing? And as a lawyer, what do you make of it?

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Well, Larry, I think that we are learning more. I don't know how reliable the information is and how accurate his own words even are as to what he experienced and what he observed. I'm pleased that he is in American custody and I hope that he is providing useful information to those who are questioning him.

You know, the president will be making a decision about how he should be treated. And we'll wait to hear that decision. But I think what's really a significant difference between what we see when we hear this young man talk about taking up arms against his country is the hundreds and thousands of young men and women who are putting their own lives at risk defending not only our country, but the rights of people to be free from terrorism. And, you know, as we go into this Christmas season, we all ought to be grateful for, you know, their commitment and service.

KING: All right, Dr. Kelly -- and we'll get the senator in on this of course -- what are the needs with regard to mental health in the aftermath of 9/11?

DR. KERRY KELLY, NEW YORK FIRE DEPARTMENT: I think you have to look at our membership and realize the experience that they have gone through. Our entire membership has really been exposed to the events of 9/11, both in their response from the initial alarm that went in. They were there during collapses. They have been there in rescue and recovery efforts 24 hours a day, seven days a week, since that event.

They have been busy trying to rescue and now recover the bodies of loved ones and civilians. And their exposure has been tremendous to really a very overwhelming event. And I think it is important that we supply the emotional follow-up for these members so that we can keep them healthy both physically and mentally.

KING: Senator Clinton, is there funding for the psychological end of this problem?

CLINTON: Well, Larry, Dr. Kelly testified before our committee. And I was very struck by her personal experience. She was there doing the work that she has done for all those years, taking care of people. And so she not only has the responsibility of taking care of those in the department, but she has firsthand experience of the real terror that was experienced by so many, in addition to the loss of life.

So I went to work to get some additional funds. You know, the fire department does take care of its own. And I think that is one of the really admirable characteristics that everyone is seeing, that this is a, you know, a real extended family, where people, you know, look out for each other and are going to be there day in and day out. But Dr. Kelly knew from her own work and from the work of others who've dealt with disasters and tragedies that there would be a lot of mental health and counseling needs. And so I was able to get some additional dollars, about two and a half million, to go to firefighters and the emergency personnel who were there working on 9/11 and who have been involved in the aftermath.

And I just have to commend Dr. Kelly and, you know, her team and the people who are working so hard to provide for all of the needs that we are seeing in this holiday season, but that we know are going to go on for months, and months afterwards.

KING: Dr. Kelly, other than the obvious, what is the biggest emotional problem people face after loss?

KELLY: I think in addition to the grief process, which has really been extended because we have had memorial services and funerals that began soon after this event and have continued and will continue through, people are dealing with their own stress reactions. They are dealing with the aftermath of being at this event and dealing with being part of a terrorist attack. And I think sleep disturbance and anxiety are not unusual after an event such as this.

KING: We often, Senator Clinton, have concentrated on the physical aspects of things and the mental aspect have generally been put aside historically. Has that changed?

CLINTON: Well, I hope it is changing. And, you know, leadership from people like Dr. Kelly and others are really helping us understand that, yes, the physical has to be dealt with, but the grieving process and the healing that has to go on not only affects those who lost loved ones and colleagues, but, you know, it really ripples out through the whole society.

The day that Dr. Kelly came to testify, we had some others on the panel who had worked in previous disasters. And they warned us that we were going to be seeing a lot of fallout from this. And I'm hearing it more and more. You know, we saw the tragic suicide of the wife of one of the victims just a little over a week ago. I have been meeting with so many of the victims' family members. And they are being brave and trying to go on, especially when they have children to care for. But they are asking for, you know, somebody to talk to. Some of them need some additional help. And what we are trying to do is provide it in appropriate ways. And that is why trying to get extra resources for the fire department to be, you know, funneled through the experts like Dr. Kelly, is one way of doing it, making it more readily available in society at large so that people can see seek it out is another.

But we have to be ready to deal with this for, you know, sometime to come. I was talking with some people from Oklahoma City who said that, you know, there are still some of the rescue workers and survivors who are just coming to grips with what happened there. And this is going to be a long-term commitment all of us have to make.

KING: Now, Dr. Kelly, you grew up in a family, your grandfather, your father are firefighters. Is any of this grief tempered by the fact that the families knew they were in a high risk occupation to begin with?

KELLY: I think people in this profession realize that they take risks. And they are fully aware of that, although this event was clearly something on an extraordinary level. But I think the family aspect of this has made the grief deeper.

We have over 65 fire houses that have lost more than one member. Some have lost 10 to 12 members. We have 60 to 70 siblings who have lost a sibling on the fire department and yet still are back at work. We have fathers that have lost sons. We have sons that have lost fathers. So the family of the fire department has really suffered a great loss. And we need to help people heal. And I think that can be done through an approach that recognizes that each firehouse has its own identity and family, and that we need to get counselors into the firehouses along with peer counselors and trained clinicians to work to address the issues as they are occurring in the firehouse and meet the needs of the individuals who need more individual counseling.

KING: Senator, how are you doing with the idea of tax relief for the widows?

CLINTON: Well, we got it through, thank goodness, Larry. The end of the day in the Senate, we were able to pass the Tax Relief Act so that families will not have to pay income tax and families that didn't make enough to pay income tax, but had, obviously, payroll tax costs are going to be given $10,000 as a way of making that up to them.

I was really pleased that we were able to get this done. A lot of people needed this money. They needed to know that they were going to be able to plan. We have lots of employers who had already written checks and had not taken any income tax out because they read that the Congress had passed it.

So this was an early Christmas present for a lot of families.

KING: And Dr. Kelly, the attorney general says the families are going to get at least 500,000, probably not more than 3 million, 50,000 immediately. Does money help in the emotional area?

KELLY: I think there is not one person that would not give up all that money to bring back their loved one. Certainly, having some financial security is important, and I think that is what helps our firefighters, when they go into a dangerous situation, know that their families will be cared for.

And that is a given that the families are important to us in the fire department, and we will make sure that they are cared for, that we have a commitment to these people. But the people are missed so greatly.

KING: And Senator Clinton, are you supporting the proposal by Senators Lieberman and McCain for an independent commission to look into the events of 9-11?

CLINTON: Yes, I am. I called for that earlier this week, and I'm glad that the Senate will help put together such a commission. I'm also sending a letter to the president, because I think there are ways that the federal government could also participate from the executive branch, in this investigation. But I think everyone needs to have a professional investigation to learn what we can learn, so that, you know, if something like this doesn't happen, if it can at all be avoided, we are going to try to prevent every possible terrorist attack, but in the event of an attack we want to make sure we have taken every precaution to save every life possible

KING: Happy holidays to you both. Thanks for being with us.

CLINTON: Same to you Larry, thank you.

KING: Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton in Washington, Dr. Kerry Kelly, chief medical officer, New York fire department in New York. When we come back, we'll have two congresswomen discuss the John Walker matter.

And later, Rangers from Fort Benning, don't go away.

"Greenfield at Large," CNN, 1/17/2002

GREENFIELD: Tonight, a conversation with Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton on the nation and the world after September 11, on GREENFIELD AT LARGE.

Little more than a year ago, New York state's new junior senator might well have been thinking she was headed for a quieter harbor. For eight years as first lady, she found herself at the center of enumerable storms, from the health care plan she shaped to her role as one of the most politically involved first ladies in history, to the Whitewater probes, to scandal and impeachment, and to her unprecedented, ultimately successful run for U.S. Senate seat in a state she'd never lived in. And now it was time to take a breath, learn the job, and maybe think about future possibilities.

Then came September 11. A world turned upside down, a nation at war, thousands dead, and tens of billions of dollars lost to New York, and a whole new set of questions about politics and policies and presidents, present and past.

Senator Clinton, welcome.

That's a summation of the last year of your life.

SEN HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Thank you, Jeff.

GREENFIELD: Let's start here in New York. The city is going to face at least a $4 billion deficit, probably worse than that in the year to come. The economic damage is in the tens of billions of dollars.

After September 11 the president said: New York would get what it needed for its economic recovery. Is that happening?

CLINTON: Well, we have gotten a good down payment on what we need, and there's a lot more that has to come.

You know, earlier today I was at a very large meeting where I listened to workers who lost their jobs, people who have lost their health insurance, widows who don't know how they're going to keep the insurance that they need for their children and themselves, small businesses that are suffering. It was just a litany of our unmet needs.

But there was a real spirit in the room that we would continue to demonstrate to not only the president and the administration and our colleagues in Congress, but to the entire country, why New York has to have America's help.

GREENFIELD: One of the areas where help was designed, and has now been an area of controversy, is the Victim's Compensation Fund that Congress passed. There's a rally in New York tonight where families felt that there was a series of unfair elements in that bill. Let me just ask you straight out, the idea that the family of a corporate executive might get millions, while the family of a dishwasher might get 1/50 of that, is that fair, in your mind?

CLINTON: Well, you have to remember what the purpose of this fund was. You know, it really was an effort to try to balance the immediate and long-term needs for families against the uncertainty of going into the court system trying to obtain the relief that was needed, and maybe not seeing any of it or seeing something in years to come.

And I think the Congress and the president in signing it really did a very noble thing in saying: Look, we need to try to eliminate that uncertainty from the lives of these victims.

Now, the legislation that was passed was not everything I would have wanted; there were restrictions in it. But it was based on our existing idea of how we compensate for death actions, wrongful death actions when you go to court. And fairly or not there are differences, because people get compensated on the basis of lost wages and future income that has been lost.

GREENFIELD: Do you want to see any part of that legislation -- I think it passed unanimously -- do you want to see any of that changed?

CLINTON: Well, first, I would like to see some of the proposed regulations changed. And I've written to the special master, of whom I have a very high regard...

GREENFIELD: Ken Feinberg.

CLINTON: Ken Feinberg. And I asked him to reconsider some of his preliminary recommendations, because I think there were some clear areas of unfairness. Issues like having to prove temporary or permanent disability, and having had to go to a doctor within 24 hours in order to be considered someone eligible for compensation for medical harm; that, I think, we need some discretion.

I didn't like the idea that many of the widows who feel that, you know -- their husbands worked very hard and built up, you know, life insurance and pensions, they weren't going to be getting anything, because...

GREENFIELD: Because the pensions and life insurance are...

CLINTON: It has to be deducted. But I thought there was a way of fixing that, which is to deduct it from the so-called economic damages, but not from the non-economic damages for pain and suffering.

I gave some ideas that I hope the special master takes into account.

GREENFIELD: Let's broaden this out. Because September 11 hit the world and it hit the United States, big argument about what's to be done about the American economy in the months ahead.

Just yesterday one of your colleagues, Senator Ted Kennedy, said he thought one thing that should be done is at the later years of the tax cut should be delayed. Should it?

CLINTON: I thought Senator Kennedy made a very good argument, really following up on Senator Daschle's argument of a few weeks ago, that the world changed on September 11. Even those who supported the large tax cuts back in the spring have to recognize that we've suffered some very damaging blows to the economy that are directly related to September 11. And maybe we ought to take a look at the changed circumstances and act according to what has happened as opposed to what was projected last spring.

GREENFIELD: So is that a yes or a no?

CLINTON: Well, I favor postponing it.

GREENFIELD: You do?

CLINTON: Yes, I do. But I favor it for several reasons. I think, economically, it is not in our best interest to try to fight a war, prepare for our homeland security and invest the billions of dollars that we need, rebuild New York, take care of the rest of America's needs and try to do it while we're pushing ourselves back into deficit and taking money out of Social Security and Medicare.

GREENFIELD: And yet we're in an election year. Twelve of your fellow Democrats voted for the Bush tax cut plan that you and most Democrats voted against, and some of those Democrats are up for re-election in what are now called the "red states," states that went heavily for Bush: Tim Johnson of South Dakota, Baucus of Montana.

Do you think the idea of the Democrats, as a group, urging for a delay of these later tax cuts, which is going to be described as a tax increase, is going to be politically damaging to some of your colleagues?

CLINTON: I think each senator has to make that judgment for himself or herself. You know, I'm not going to substitute my judgment for theirs. Many of my colleagues who did vote for it thought it was the right thing to do last spring. But I...

GREENFIELD: But you can see the politics of it...

CLINTON: Oh, sure, sure...

GREENFIELD: Vote for Tim Johnson, and you'll get Hillary Clinton and Ted Kennedy in leadership positions, and they won't give you your tax cuts back.

CLINTON: You know, I don't think it's fair to characterize what Senator Daschle or Senator Kennedy or I say as saying that, you know, we're not in favor of tax cuts.

I voted for an alternative that was supported by the majority of the Democrats last spring that I think would've been a good bargain. It would've had affordable tax cuts, and they would've been more targeted toward people who really need the tax relief.

So I think there is still room for tax cuts. In fact, I would like us to really do more to help lower-income, middle-income people and particularly to try to make sure that the unemployment insurance coffers are filled and the people get their health insurance.

GREENFIELD: Well, speaking of the economy, Enron is in the news, as you may have noticed.

CLINTON: I've heard that.

GREENFIELD: And one of the things that is happening, something that you were familiar with in your day at the White House, there's been a lot of -- you know, 10 congressional investigations, 10 separate investigations.

One of the issues is, you have Attorney General John Ashcroft who said: You know, I got $50,000 in Enron contributions in my last Senate campaign, I better step aside. Some of the Democrats who'll be chairing the panels -- Jeff Bingaman, for one; he was the second biggest recipient of Enron funds among any Democrat. Is sauce for the goose, sauce for the gander here? Should the Democratic chairs who got substantial Enron contributions recuse themselves from heading investigations?

CLINTON: I don't think so, Jeff, and I think that for several reasons. First, I have the highest regard for my colleagues, both Democratic and Republican, to be able to conduct thorough and fair investigations, and congressional investigations are different from executive authority, particularly out of the Justice Department, that might make determinations about who would or would not be criminally prosecuted.

But I think that the bipartisan investigations that are now under way in both the House and the Senate, you know, hold great promise, both for figuring out what happened -- it's a very complicated situation -- but also for coming up with recommendations so that something like this never happens again.

GREENFIELD: You say they hold great promise, and I guess one of the reasons that might surprise me just a bit is that you were on the other end of an investigation machine that went on for the better part of eight years. From your experience, do you have any advice for your fellow Democrats chairing these Senate committees about how to do this and how not to do it?

CLINTON: I don't have advice just for Democrats or just for Republicans or just for the White House or anyone else other than to say that this is a very serious matter. You know, thousands of people have seen their financial security wiped away. The implications of what happened for our financial markets are extraordinary.

You know, we run a free-market, capitalistic system that operates on good information. We've got to make sure that we get accurate information.

So I think that there are policy implications that go to the heart of our market system and go to the heart of the government's role in regulation, and I think that's why it holds promise because we need to know what we should do.

GREENFIELD: Do you know any major Senate investigation in either of our lifetimes that hasn't been surrounded by politics one way or the other?

CLINTON: Well, politics is the lifeblood of our democracy. You know, it is the way we make decisions. It's not just something that happens in Washington or in a congressional investigation. It's, you know, how two or more people in America figure out in a democratic way what they're going to do. I think that's all, you know, part of our system.

GREENFIELD: Do you think the tone in Washington -- we've heard a lot about the tone -- is different than it was during the days when Bill Clinton was in power? Is there less polarization on both sides than there was, you think?

CLINTON: Oh, I -- you know, I think there has been an effort. And certainly, the united fronts that we've all had in support of the president and our men and women in uniform in the war effort demonstrates America at its best and our American political system at its best.

There are legitimate differences. You know, I have a difference about the economy than some of my friends on the other side of the aisle. I come from the, I guess you could call it the Clinton-Rubin school of economics. I think we knew what worked, and I would like to continue doing what worked, rather than veer off and make a U-turn to the past, which I don't think worked well for our country.

I don't consider my disagreement on an issue like that to be disagreeable. I think it's where I come from and where someone else on the other side might have a different point of view.

GREENFIELD: We're going to take a break. We'll have more with Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton after this. Please stay with us.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

GREENFIELD: We are back with Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton for the duration of the show.

Senator Clinton, what should be done at ground zero? You have an opinion?

CLINTON: I think we have to have a process that includes everybody, Jeff. My opinion is no better than anyone else's, and I would like to make sure the victims are included.

I do think we have to come up with a plan that revitalizes downtown, that puts commercial and retail activity back there, that, you know, perhaps has some entertainment complexes that can bring people downtown, that takes account of the great neighborhood that was there before September 11. You know, there were so many people living there, there were a lot of children there, there were playgrounds and elementary schools.

And then there has to be just the most profound, moving memorial that the mind can devise. You know, I've read a lot about some of the history of memorials, and, you know, when you think of the Vietnam War memorial, for example, you know, that was controversial at first, but now people are just so grateful that Maya Lin had that vision of what it could be.

If you go to the Mall in Washington and see the new Korean War Memorial, it's very different than the Vietnam War memorial, but I've talked to a lot of Korean War vets who say it captures the experience.

Oklahoma City, with those empty chairs. You know, something...

GREENFIELD: Something to memorialize it.

CLINTON: Oh, something absolutely that will give maybe some, you know, some not comfort, but at least recognition to everyone who died.

GREENFIELD: We talked about how everything's changed since September 11. One of the things that's clearly changed is the way President Bush is being seen. I mean, he came into office under the most unusual circumstances imaginable. Certainly a lot of Democrats and some late-night comedians used to constantly put on the table that this guy maybe wasn't up to the job; too casual.

Now, I'm hearing even from some Democrats, frankly, that they say, you know: We're really happy that he and his team are there, seasoned people: Dick Cheney, Rumsfeld, Rice, Powell.

Are you surprised? Are you surprised by how the president has stepped up to this challenge that nobody could have expected any president to have to face?

CLINTON: Oh, well, I'm grateful that he's not only stepped up to it, but done an extraordinary job leading the country, putting together the coalition that has gone with us into Afghanistan.

GREENFIELD: I understand grateful, but what I'm asking is, did he step up in a way that surprised you a little, given what you might have thought of him and what a lot of Democrats thought of him during the campaign?

CLINTON: You know, Jeff, I guess maybe I've been around politics, and certainly around Washington long enough to know that you don't know what someone will do in a crisis or a disaster until it happens. And certainly, given his background, his father being in politics, his grandfather being in politics, I'm, you know, very aware that when some kind of terrible crisis strikes, that's when people are tested.

And certainly, you know, the team that he had in place and his own leadership has, you know, met the test of leading our country forward.

GREENFIELD: No more jokes. No more talk about dimpled and hanging chads certainly. This makes him, in a straight-out political way, a much more formidable figure, doesn't it?

CLINTON: Well, understandably so. I mean, we're at war. And we have a lot of adversaries around the world who wish us ill, and we're all going to stand behind our president. We only have one president at a time, he's our commander in chief, and I've tried to be as supportive as I could, not only politically and publicly, but even privately, because I have, you know, some idea of the burdens that anyone in that office bears, and, you know, I'm very pleased that, you know, he's demonstrated such leadership and pulled us together.

GREENFIELD: Speaking of presidents and their assessment, the House and the Senate Intelligence Committees are about to take a long and probably very tough look back at what led up to the failures of intelligence. And it clearly seems to suggest in part that the legacy of all the past presidents, and most immediately and especially Bill Clinton, may be thrown on a different light.

I was struck by something that a member of one of President Clinton's intelligence panels said, Lauch Johnson (ph). What he said basically was that he thought Clinton's legacy will have to drop a few notches, his priorities were out of balance, there was too much focus on the domestic side. And I want to show you in this regard a very recent CNN/USA Today poll.

We asked the country: What do you think about the job President Clinton did on the economy? And the numbers were extremely high: 80 percent said very good or good.

Then CNN-USA Today gallop asked: What about terrorism? And the numbers were way worse: 48 percent rated him as poor or very poor.

He is said to care a lot about his legacy. Do you think this is going to put him in a different and darker light?

CLINTON: Well, based on what I know, I don't believe so, because I think that the evidence is very clear that there had never been more emphasis before on terrorism as there was in that administration, and there were some real successes. You know, there were a lot of things averted, including the attempted millennium attacks.

But I don't think anyone can argue with the fact that we didn't have the coordination. It was very difficult to get. We didn't have the legislation, sometimes despite the best efforts of the Clinton administration to try to have legislation to track money and to do some of the things that we thought was important at the time. After September 11, whatever shortcomings or lack of coordination no longer could be allowed to continue.

And I think that what really has to change is the culture in Washington and the bureaucracy in Washington and the turf protection in Washington, so that different agencies have to coordinate and they to be made to work together.

I mean, one of my concerns is that, despite his very good intentions and best efforts, that's a struggle for Governor Ridge in the White House. You know, because I've seen it before -- anyone who has been around Washington has -- how difficult that is.

GREENFIELD: But the idea that, for instance, the former CIA director, James Woolsey, whom your husband appointed and then replaced, said that this is basically a public relations response in terrorism. He said that in so many words.

September 11 has to have changed a lot of people's views on everything. And while some it may be second-guessing, is it something that causes you and the former president concern that it is going to be seen as being so focused on the economy and on domestic issues that this somehow wasn't given the attention it turned out to have needed?

CLINTON: You know, Jeff, I just don't think that's a fair assessment. You know, but I will certainly wait to, you know, learn with everyone else.

But, you know, there was a tremendous effort made, and a successful one, to track down and capture and punish the bombers. There were efforts made to try to get people who are now our allies, who were frankly not our allies before -- we didn't have the level of cooperation internationally from people who had any kind of control over or knowledge of someone like bin Laden and his movements.

You know, so I think that it's always easy to look back and say what you could have or should have done. But the facts are that, I think, there was a tremendous amount of intention. I know that it went from the top down through the government. But certainly things not only during that administration, but in the first eight months of this administration, if people had known more they would have done things differently. They would have forced changes that they couldn't otherwise have gotten done.

GREENFIELD: One of the tougher questions, I think, that may be raised in this, and I'm just going to put it out there. August 1998, attacks on the American embassies in Tanzania and Kenya: The work of Osama bin Laden. Virtually, the same time, almost to the day, when the president had to come to the country and say he misled you and the country about the Lewinsky affair and that began the months-long process of impeachment.

And the question that I'm thinking about is, there was so much argument back then, which I don't intend to revisit, about what's private and what's public, that I wonder if, in the cold light of day, we might think that when a president of the United States is so embroiled in what might otherwise be a private matter that it might take his energy and focus, as a fight for political survival has to, that that, in a sense, becomes a public matter just because it's the president and nobody else.

CLINTON: Well, I can only say from various firsthand observation that it did not. I remember that month very well. I went out and spent a lot of time with the families of the victims of the embassy bombings.

We were out at Andrews Air Force Base for a memorial service. And Bill and I went, you know, table to table, and I can remember, you know, fathers of young men and women who were serving our country, either civilian or military capacity, saying, you know: We've got to try to do something, Mr. President.

And, you know, Bill was obsessed with it. They had people on the ground already. They'd already had directives about covert actions; something people didn't know. And they had intelligence that led them to believe that bin Laden would be in a certain place. And, of course, you know, they tried to take him out at that time.

GREENFIELD: So the fact that he was about to fight for his political survival, as far as you're concerned, just had no impact on whether he was able to focus simultaneously on this fight?

CLINTON: Well, I can just tell you firsthand, it did not. Obviously, that controversy was not of his making. We'll let history judge whether that was something that ever should have happened in the first place. But it did not take away his obligation to the country.

And remember, the embassy bombers were caught within about 30 days or so -- I can't remember the exact timing -- from the time that they bombed the embassies. So it was a quick response. Unfortunately, the cruise missiles missed him. But we now know how difficult it is. We have troops on the ground and we haven't found this man yet.

GREENFIELD: Because we're close to the end, I want to give you a chance -- I mentioned to you at the outset that Hillary Rodham Clinton as a lightning rod is not exactly new news. But we get a lot of e-mails when we book someone. So I want to just -- this is a great chance for you to just respond directly. We've got a few of these.

"Could you please ask Mrs. Clinton why she never visited any World Trade Center victims in the hospital or attended funerals of those who were killed in the terrorist act?"

CLINTON: You know that's -- you know, it's so sad. There is -- there is just no truth to that. And, you know, I went to the funerals of people whom I knew personally. I do not believe that public figures should go uninvited to private funerals. I went to all of the memorial services. And I also have visited in the hospital one victim and met with many, many, many other victims who were either out of the hospital or who lost a loved one. I've tried to fight very hard for the victims and their families.

You know, it is something, though, that I just know people are going to have questions about because some folks generate that. And, you know, I just have a different attitude than perhaps some people in public life do. And particularly in my position, I don't think that private grief should be intruded upon for political reasons.

And so, there were two friends of mine who died and I went to both funerals.

GREENFIELD: So it almost sounds like you're saying if you had gone to a lot of those funerals, people who held you in a minimal high regard, might have seen you as a publicity seeker?

CLINTON: Oh, I think that, you know, sometimes, you know, you can't do anything to please some people. That's not what I think about. You know, what I am focused on is trying to do the best I can as a senator, not only to comfort people, but to try to fight for them.

GREENFIELD: Got a title for your book yet?

CLINTON: No. Got a good one to suggest?

(LAUGHTER)

GREENFIELD: No, I was just wondering. I mean, have you thought about that?

CLINTON: Oh, yes, I've thought about it. But, you know, I haven't -- you know, September 11 has taken, you know, most of my energy and emotion for the last four months.

GREENFIELD: And yet, you know that people -- the people who paid a pretty good advance for that book are expecting a pretty heads-on, no-holds-barred book. Are they going to get it?

CLINTON: Well, we'll just have to wait and see.

GREENFIELD: When you're at it, I'm not sure I like that answer, but all right.

Senator Clinton, thank you for being with us.

When we come back, from me to you, no more Mr. Nice Guy.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

GREENFIELD: And another thing, for those of you into sado- masochism, there's no better example of a master-slave relationship than what goes on between those of us on this side of the screen and those of you on that side. And there's no question about who holds the whip-hand: You do. Except the instrument of torture is the remote control device.

We know -- Lord, how we know -- at any moment, any second, you can wipe us off of the face of the screen, which is why we beg you, stay with us, don't touch that dial, even though we know there aren't any dials anymore.

Well, friends, I have had enough of this pandering. In fact, after reading some of your e-mails -- and you know who you are -- I'm telling you that some of you, a tiny minority, to be sure, do not have enough brain power to light up a 30-watt bulb.

If you don't like a guest, then we're biased for booking that guest, even if we raise some very tough questions with them. If you like a guest, then the tough questions we ask them proves we're biased.

And some of you even wrote in today and said: Since I know you won't ask the right questions, I'm not even going to watch.

Fair warning: I have decided this, no more Mr. Nice Guy. You keep this up, we're going to put your e-mails on the air, names of all, so the rest of the world can fully appreciate your wisdom.

And as for the vast, silent, reasonable majority of you, here is a modest promise: Keep watching us, and you will soon reap wealth and power beyond the dreams of kings.

U.S. SENATOR KENT CONRAD (D-ND) HOLDS HEATING ON FY 2003 BUDGET, 1/23/2002

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

And thank you, Dr. Crippen.

And I'm sorry that Senator Gramm has left. I thought his what I inferred to be an offer to repeal the tax cut and put new restrictions on spending sounded like a good place to begin.

Because, basically, what I heard him saying is that we needed to act on both sides of the ledger, which I think many of us around this table agree with. So, perhaps, Mr. Chairman, we've got the start of an agreement that we can work out.

I think, also, the points made by both Senators Stabenow and Snowe need to be revisited. And I certainly, as someone who supported their work on the trigger, would believe that it should be on both sides, that there should be triggers on spending, as well as on tax cuts.

CLINTON: That's the way many states have to operate. You know, that is, to reiterate Senator Hollings' point, why, you know, Governor Bush is having to postpone tax cuts, because you can't run those sorts of deficits at the state level.

And, you know, I've long thought that we ought to be looking at similar mechanisms, understanding the more difficult challenges facing the federal budget. But still, I think there is some wisdom in the states that we ought to try to learn from.

I had a couple of questions, Dr. Crippen. And I thank you for your testimony and for the work that you and your staff have been doing.

But clearly, it is pretty breathtaking that, in less than a year, $4 trillion of the projected surplus has disappeared. I mean, I don't think we should lose sight of the fact, as we go back and forth in our discussion, that that's really what you're talking about today. If you were to write a headline, it would be, "$4 Trillion is Gone," from the time that you sat here a year ago and made the projections with the very fair assessment of uncertainty that you put into those projections. But nevertheless, $4 trillion is gone.

And your caution about what that means for us, not just in the short term but in the longer term, is one that we disregard at our peril. It is something that really haunts me, that we would be putting this load of debt and these extremely difficult political decisions on the backs of our children instead of facing up to them ourselves.

So I don't know whether Senator Gramm's idea of postponing tax cuts, or even repealing them, along with stricter spending limits, following in the footsteps of both Senators Snowe and Stabenow, will be heeded, but I certainly intend to do everything I can to make that case.

I would appreciate, Dr. Crippen, getting the tax rates on your chart, the total revenue as a share of GDP. Several members have made the point that the average, approximately 18 percent, has been exceeded. But what I am interested in is, my recollection of tax policy, going back 30 or 40 years, is that the relative burden borne by different segments of our society has shifted dramatically.

And I would like to get that information if I could, because I think that the corporate tax rate, the individual tax rate on the upper end have gone down dramatically, and in fact, middle-income and lower-income Americans are bearing a disproportionately higher share of the tax burden.

And this revenue spike is due, in large measure, to that increased share. And particularly when, you know, my constituents pick up a newspaper and see that a company like Enron has paid no taxes whatsoever, that wasn't the case in the 1950s and 1960s when corporate tax rates were both higher and tax collection was more strenuous.

So, if I could, I'd like to see the correlation here, because I think one of the biggest lessons in this curve is that we've shifted the burden of taxation. And the tax cut that was passed last spring shifted it egregiously onto the backs of middle-income and lower-income taxpayers.

But my question goes to something that you alluded to earlier, and that is the intergovernmental impacts of what you're telling us this morning. I know that CBO does have a role in measuring these intergovernmental impacts.

Have you done any estimates of state budget shortfalls?

CRIPPEN: Senator, we haven't done any independent estimates. We have been talking to the many groups, like the National Association of Budget Officers, the National Governors Association, to try and monitor as best we can the developments there.

The December report from the National Association of Governors was quite instructive, as you probably know, of how the deterioration in surplus pictures for many of the states, and of course many of them surrounding Washington. We're seeing headlines every day about billions of dollars in shortfall.

So yes, we're monitoring it, but we don't do independent estimates of what the states are going to have to face.

CLINTON: Dr. Crippen, would the budget shortfalls and the unemployment increase, for example, require perhaps greater Medicaid outlays? And are those included in your baseline projections at this time?

CRIPPEN: Yes. Both unemployment we expect will -- outlays for unemployment will be higher, as well as Medicaid. And they are included in the forecast today.

CLINTON: And similarly, the impact on the states' revenues that are tied to federal tax revenues, those declines, could you also give us some insight on that? Because, as some of these tax cuts kick in that were passed last spring, they're going to have a direct impact on state revenues.

CRIPPEN: We don't have an independent estimate of time, but we probably could provide you with one. You're absolutely right, of course as states mimic the federal tax code, both in application and what the tax base ultimately is, if it changed in the federal level it could ultimately change their revenues and, presumably, in the same direction.

CLINTON: I think that information would be helpful to us, because certainly, you know, my state's in a unique position because of the extraordinary revenue shortfalls from 9-11 that directly impacted on both the city and the state. But as I read the press, in any event, this is a phenomenon that is widespread across the country. Many governors and state legislatures are facing significant shortfalls, and I think we're going to be called on, here in the Congress, to respond in some way.

I am hoping that whatever package of economic recovery is put together will include a recognition of increasing health care costs and the need to try to help, you know, on that front in many of our states that have been hard hit.

Dr. Crippen, I also would like to ask you about a comment that OMB Director Mitch Daniels made at a National Press Club speech recently, back in November, in which he predicted deficits through at least 2005. And he said that the new budget scenario calls for, quote, "separating must-do from nice-to-do items."

And it's going to be difficult to have a good discussion about our budget when so much that's embedded in the budget already are must-dos. I mean, so many of the biggest spending items are required, they're mandatory, they are so-called entitlements, when we know we're going to be asked for increases in defense spending, which many of us will be prepared to support.

I know this would be hard for you to give me an exact number on, but how much discretionary spending dollars are really in this budget projection that you're talking about, in terms of what is available for non-defense, non-entitlement?

CRIPPEN: We assume, Senator, that this year's level, the current year that we're in, for all programs on the discretionary side, domestic and defense, for purposes of today's forecast will grow only with inflation factors -- inflation in the economy but also in wage inflation.

And so, in that regard, we have not built in any increases for a program, any increases for homeland security, increases for defense. None of those are in our baseline. So anything that you all and the president will add to that would make the deficits worse and the surpluses smaller.

CLINTON: That's very important, because clearly I think a lot of people don't know that. I have a statement I'd like to submit for the record.

CONRAD: Without objection.

CLINTON: I thank the chairman for holding this hearing.

U.S. SENATOR KENT CONRAD (D-ND) HOLDS HEARING ON STATE OF THE ECONOMY, 1/24/2002

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And I too was with Senator Bond at the hearing where Mrs. Bush appeared. I apologize that I missed the beginning of your testimony and the questions that were asked.

I agree with your framework saying that our country needs to set objectives that we expect to be working toward achieving, and that we should do so by asking ourselves where we want to be in 2015, to pick a date; one could pick another date, but that was the one that you referred to, and I think that's a fair way to describe how we should go about determining our budgetary decision-making.

And I'm following up on Senator Sarbanes' points because when you were here last year, I think many of us, although we were facing some economic indicators that suggested a downturn, believed we had more control over our destiny than perhaps we do right now; that given surpluses, and given the rapid rate at which we were paying down debt, that even in the face of an irreducible debt, basis of your testimony which led to the concerns you express, we could do the kind of planning that would get us to 2015, having dealt with, in a rational way, the demographic challenges that we faced.

Yesterday, when Dr. Crippen testified, and certainly given the uncertainty that you reflect on the future of the recovery and its pace, I think many of us think we've lost some of that ability to plan for the long term; that perhaps we have even given away the capacity to make the decisions that would put us in a better posture than we see currently available to us.

Now, going back to the San Francisco speech, I want to go back to something that I believe you said, because it relates to something Dr. -- something we talked to Dr. Crippen about, that the diminished outlook for debt reduction has probably played a role in keeping long-term interest rates relatively high this year. Is that a fair inference from what was said in San Francisco?

GREENSPAN: That's correct, Senator. I said that there are, in my judgment, two elements involved. One was the expectation of an imminent recovery and economic activity, which would ordinarily, other things equal, move long term rates up. But I also stipulated that a deterioration of the long-term fiscal situation was also a contributor.

CLINTON: Well, I happen to believe that. And I think that, you know, the high long-term interest rates on a relative basis this year, despite your efforts at the Fed to use monetary policy on short-term rates, has had and will have a continuing negative impact on debt reduction, which, I think it's at least a fair bet, will impede the recovery.

I well remember the discussion that you were instrumental in in 1993, when the discussion about how we could craft a debt reduction plan that would lower long-term interest rates, spur economic growth, led to the decisions that were made in 1993.

What I'm concerned about now is that, just as in 1993, some people criticized the administration at that time for keying economic policies to bond traders, which I remember very well. It turned out to be a pretty smart bet.

Now, my biggest problem with the tax cut last spring is that I don't think the bond traders were asleep. And whether my colleagues believed the projections of surplus and the impact on the debt as being overstated by those of us who expressed concern, I think the bond traders had a pretty clear and cold eye about what would happen. And, as Senator Sarbanes, based on the chairman's chart, has just reminded us, although in this first year the tax cut impact on the surplus has been minimal, the projected impact is as stated in that chart.

So here we are. I accept those who say politically there won't be any change. There won't be any repeal. There won't be any serious effort to rethink our changed circumstances. But I don't think the market and the cold, clear-eyed bond traders are going to be impressed by our failure to exercise responsible fiscal policy in the face of changed circumstances.

So that leads me back to this discussion of a trigger. And I would just clarify, I think, a point that my colleagues Senator Snowe and Senator Stabenow have repeatedly made is that their idea for a trigger would not repeal a tax cut, but would delay one until it could be paid for. And the paid for part of that would take into account the various factors that would be available at the time, however it was constructed.

And the final point that I just feel compelled to raise as well, following up on Senator Corzine's comment, is that I agree with your assessment that the reaction to what's happened with Enron and Arthur Andersen is a healthy reflection of how much we value transparency and accurate information in order to have a functioning market system. But I don't think we're anywhere near the end of this story. And what will really count is what are the consequences.

In fact, we could further drive down business and consumer confidence, in my opinion, if the outrage is not followed by consequences. And one of my concerns is that, at least at present, based on press reports, the discussion about the accounting information practices and how we go forward guaranteeing to people that their outrage is not misplaced raises some serious issues.

And I would, if you believe it within your purview as someone who looks at the entire economy, go at Senator Corzine's question a little differently, which is, when the outrage has exhausted itself, will it be important for the continuing functioning of our market to have an accounting system that is understandable and regulated in such a way that people can put their confidence in the results of whatever the statements might be?

GREENSPAN: It's hard to know what the next two years are going to unfold, or how they're going to unfold. But I think it's reasonably certain that what has come out of this particular event is going to alter the way not only accounting is done in a more transparent way, I think there are effects on corporate governance as well. Because the incentive structures in audit committees within corporations, amongst accountants, at least in my judgment, is not optimum for the appropriate allocation of capital within our economy.

CLINTON: But excuse me, Mr. Chairman. Are you suggesting that that will be a self-policing, self-regulating transformation of human nature that will occur?

GREENSPAN: I do not know. No, it's not human nature. Well, in part, it is. I mean, it's called self-interest. There is a very important economic value in reputation, more so than it's been in recent years, largely because we're increasingly moving towards what I would call a conceptual economy in which physical assets are a decreasing proportion of the market value of firms. And that as I indicated earlier, that this reputation capitalized and placed on the balance sheet is called good will.

And it is a major competitive advantage to be able to say to somebody, "Our accounts fully represent what is actually going on in our company." Indeed, those of us who have been involved in bank regulation are aware of the fact that those financial institution which get into businesses which are somewhat obscure will find -- have found that the price/earnings ratios of those institutions are less than those are -- who are in businesses which are fully exposed to the light of day in their accounting systems and in the structure of the type of risks they take.

There are going to be changes. And I suspect there may very well be changes in statutes, because it is crucially important that the trust which is so fundamental to all transactions in a market economy be reinforced. And I don't know how that's going to happen, but I do know that the pressure to do that as a consequence of this event is going to be significant. And I think that is a very fortunate potential outcome of this rather unfortunate story.

CLINTON: I agree with that.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

CONRAD: Thank you.

And we want to thank Chairman Greenspan for your appearance here today. We've held you somewhat beyond the time that we had agreed to. And I thank you for your patience.

Let me just say that especially welcome your suggestion that we revisit the notion of a mechanism to adjust spending and revenue so that we do everything we can to aggressively pay down this national debt in expectation of the baby boom generation's retirement and the desirability of building surpluses in preparation for that time.

I think that's a very constructive and important suggestion that you made last year that you've repeated this year. And hopefully, we will proceed to try to find a way to get it enacted into law.

I thank you again.

GREENSPAN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

U.S. SENATOR KENT CONRAD (D-ND) HOLDS HEARING ON BUDGETARY ISSUES AND THE ECONOMIC OUTLOOK OF THE U.S., 1/29/2002

Senator Clinton, do you preside at 11:00?

CLINTON: I do. I'm going to have to leave.

CONRAD: Why don't we recognize you at this time for questions that you might have.

CLINTON: Well, thank you, Mr. Chairman, and I thank our witnesses, and I appreciate the interchange we've had. I think that's something we should do more of, to have our witnesses respond to one another, because I think it helps to clarify a lot of these issues.

I would have to say there is a very big difference of opinion, not only among the witnesses or between two and Mr. Wesbury, but also on this committee and, I think, in our Congress and throughout the country as to what is the best way to stimulate economic growth. That's what we're interested in.

What we want is a growing economy that enables even more people to work, creates the conditions for rising incomes. And in looking at some of the statistics about federal revenues being a high percentage of GDP, I think, again, as Dr. Orszag sort of reminds us, we can't take any statistic out of context, because certainly, median family income rose by over $6,000 after adjusting for inflation between '93 and 2000.

There were significant bonuses, not only in the financial services sector, but in many sectors of the economy that pushed people's income tax burden higher. And, indeed, though, federal income taxes as a percentage of income for the typical American family dropped to their lowest level in 35 years.

Now, this is not an argument for keeping tax rates higher than they need to be.

CLINTON: I, among many of my colleagues, argued for a balanced tax reduction last spring. What I think we're concerned about is the impact of this large tax cut and the way that it was configured.

I guess my question would be to go back to, for me, the most important issue. What is it we're trying to achieve? We're trying to achieve economic growth, and I think we should be trying to achieve some ability to deal with problems that we know are on the horizon. And the best way to do that is through growth and fiscal responsibility to be prepared.

So I guess I would just ask each of the witnesses -- perhaps beginning with Mr. Wesbury, because I know that your view is different -- as you look forward -- and I'll have to leave soon -- as you look forward, Mr. Wesbury, and you see the demographic inevitability -- I don't think there is any debate about that. We're going to have increasing calls on Social Security, Medicare, and other services that an aging population requires. How would you best prepare our country to deal with those problems?

WESBURY: Well, thank you, Senator Clinton. First of all, let me just suggest to you that I agree 100 percent with you about the strength of the 1990s. It was a fabulous period in U.S. economic history. In fact, it was the longest economic recovery in our history.

What's interesting, though, is that the period between 1982 and 1990 was the third longest economic recovery in our history. And when we go back and look at that period from '82 to 2001, we were in recession during that period only 3 percent of the time. During no other 20-year period in our history have we ever experienced uninterrupted growth like we experienced in this 20-year period.

What I would suggest is that we look at what caused that. And in my opinion, what clearly caused that was an increase in technology and the boom in productivity that slowly gained steam over the 1980s and into the 1990s.

I am one of the economists who was out there in the past five or six years talking about a so-called new era. I realize fully that we still operate under the old economic principles. They're still all the same. But what we had done is we had pushed ourselves back to that kind of growth that we experienced in the Industrial Revolution or in the '50s or early '60s.

This doesn't mean that we can't have recessions. And my belief is that the tax increases of 1993 -- they increased the number of brackets for taxpayers, and because we had such strong productivity growth, it boosted real incomes, as you pointed out very correctly, and those higher real incomes pushed people into higher and higher tax brackets. There was a tax increase on people throughout the 1990s, and by the time we reached 2000, those burdens reached such a high level that it finally was able to, I believe, topple the economy.

And if I may point out, the bipartisan nature of the tax cut that was passed in May of 2001 at least suggests to me, as someone who lives in Chicago, that in Washington, people realized that people around the country wanted a tax cut. And that's why we got it, because taxes were too high. As a result, I think we're now on the way to recovery.

My belief is that the best way to guarantee the safety of Social Security, the safety of Medicare, the safety of all the government programs that we have is to work as hard as we possibly can and have faith in the American entrepreneur. And the way to do that is to increase incentives, and the way you increase incentives is to keep tax rates low and allow the entrepreneur to benefit from his or her efforts.

We live in one of the greatest times in world history, in my opinion. Technology is growing faster than ever before. That technology is coming from the private sector, and I want to see us support that and allow it to grow. It will make all of our problems, budgetary or otherwise, much less significant in future years if we do that.

ORSZAG: I have a somewhat different view. I think the key objective in preparing for the longer-term challenges that we face is higher national saving. And, basically, higher national saving will leave future workers with more productive equipment, higher levels of productivity, and an easier burden in meeting our future challenges.

In my opinion, the best way to boost national saving is for the federal government to have a serious program of fiscal discipline. We've tried lots of other ways of trying to get the private sector to save. They don't work very well. The most auspicious way of boosting national saving is simply through fiscal discipline.

And I note that in the current environment, changing some of those longer-term fiscal discipline policies would have a short-term benefit. Just like we saw in 1993, when you have back-loaded fiscal discipline, you can get short-term benefits from that, in addition to the long-term benefits. So, interestingly, normally, there's a tradeoff. Right now, I don't think there is one.

CLINTON: Mr. Reischauer, I'm going to have to leave, but I know you can be succinct. I've seen it so many times.

REISCHAUER: Then you know I'm going to agree with you, too.

CLINTON: And I'd hate to miss that.

U.S. SENATOR KENT CONRAD (D-ND) HOLDS HEARING ON FY 2003 BUDGET, 2/5/2002

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I appreciate the comments that the chairman made in response to this budget. Obviously, all of us are still digesting it, as is the case with a very large and complicated document such as this.

But I am particularly concerned that there isn't any direct reference to aid for New York in the budget. Yesterday, Director Daniels, in discussing emergency aid to New York, you said, and I quote, "It seems strange to me to treat this as a money grubbing game," unquote.

Now, I have to tell you that we were shocked by that. The shock was felt throughout New York. It was on the headlines of our newspapers. The tabloids, obviously, had a field day with it, because it was so unbelievable that something like that would come out of the mouth of the OMB director.

Clearly, we've all recognized that the September 11 attacks on New York were an attack on America. The majority of people who lost their lives that day were from the New York area -- not all New Yorkers, but certainly predominately. New Yorkers were heartened on September 20, when the president promised to rebuild New York.

Now, I know that the president is scheduled to visit New York tomorrow to salute the heroism of our police and firefighters and our first responders and I appreciate your including the picture of ground zero and the firefighters in the budget.

But, my first question is, do you speak for the president when you called New York's request for emergency disaster aid a "money grubbing game"?

DANIELS: Well, Senator, it's a very fair question. I remember that Winston Churchill once said that he frequently had to eat his words and generally found it a wholesome diet, so maybe I'm in that position.

I regret, if my comment was misconstrued, so let me tell you exactly what I think. I think it's consistent with your views. I mean, the president's commitment to $20 billion of aid is both inviolate and, frankly, well within our view. It will take some years to get there because the commitments that the government, the federal government made, the unprecedented commitments of support, 100 percent funding of infrastructure and other rebuilding and so forth will, in many cases, take years to complete and we won't know the real tally until that happens.

I don't have any doubt at all, as we have often discussed, that that will substantially exceed $20 billion and it should. I expressed in poorly chosen words, I think, only this frustration that I've been in lots and lots of meetings, we're working hard on this. You've held our feet to the fire and that's as it should be, that in many of the meetings with either reporters or advocates for New York, it's hard to get the question of what are we trying to get down. If people want to sort of start and stop with how many dollars and you know, for instance, it would be terribly wrong if we got to some magic tally of $20 billion and quit and said, "Good."

CLINTON: But we don't expect that.

DANIELS: Right. And we don't intend that. So, that's all I really meant was, let's try to focus more often on what are we going to get done together.

I'll give you the best example you well know of some unfinished business. The president supported the Liberty Zone concept, $15 billion of investment that would be triggered by guaranteed loans for New York. It was in the stimulus package. It didn't quite get across the line. In December, we had to get that done. That's the biggest missing piece now in a total package that's again, I assure you, that's going to go well beyond $20 billion.

CLINTON: Well, I appreciate that clarification and I would certainly work with you and the administration and our colleagues here in getting that Liberty Zone tax policy through, because I agree with you. I think that is one of the missing ingredients, but I also just want to clarify, for the record, Dr. Daniels, that you're, therefore, not counting the victims compensation fund as aid for New York. That's a different category, which is mandatory spending. Is that correct?

DANIELS: Well, it is. I think when history rights the story it would be fair, only fair to recognize, again, the unprecedented expression of compassion and support from the rest of the American taxpayers.

CLINTON: I agree.

DANIELS: But I think we're going beyond $20 billion before and without counting that. Please tell New Yorkers that we love them, we admire them and we're going to keep the president's commitment to the last.

CLINTON: That's very welcome news and I appreciate that tremendously.

I just had a few other specific questions that again, this may be easily answered in the budget, but I'd like your guidance.

I don't find in the budget any commitment to fund the SEC (ph) pay parity, which Congress passed authorized increases for in December and certainly in light of what we're going through now with Enron and the accounting issues that are being raised, it's very difficult to imagine we're going to get the staff assistance that we need and keep down the employee turnover without that SEC (ph) pay parity.

Is that in the budget and I'm just missing it or is that a commitment that we can count on from the administration?

DANIELS: A first step toward higher pay and perhaps one day to parity is clearly in the budget. We have $19 million, as I recall, in unspent funds that we've authorized using for this purpose, as well as some new money.

DANIELS: Going straight to parity by the definition at least to some people would lead to a dramatic increase in spending and we don't think that the case has yet been made, at least for what some people are calling for, a dramatic 20 plus percent increases for the entire agency. But we've had extensive conversations with the chairman. He's an advocate of doing more, faster, than this budget suggests. We'll be working with him over the days ahead to make sure he can keep the best people he has. We want him to be able to reward the best people that he has. His work has never been more -- and their work -- has never been more important.

So, I would characterize this budget as taking a first step, and we anticipate it's only the first.

CLINTON: Well, Director Daniels, I would just refer you to the legislation we passed. Obviously, the Congress believed even before the Enron Anderson matter was quite as difficult as it appears to be that we should have parity with other regulatory agencies such as the FDIC. It certainly is, I think, critical to be sure that we do have the resources, so I hope that that can be moved on quickly.

I'm also, just if I could, one last issue that I'm concerned -- I'm concerned about a lot of issues, but I join my colleagues in their concern about job training and federal highway funding.

But I was surprised to see a dramatic reduction in the federal payroll tax revenues for the federal unemployment system. As I read the budget, you're calling for a dramatic decrease in the annual payment per worker to support federal and state unemployment, and in effect, shifting much of the responsibility for funding unemployment operations onto the state.

Is that a fair reading of the budget as it currently is?

"American Morning with Paula Zahn," CNN, 2/11/2002

PAULA ZAHN, CNN ANCHOR: New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Connecticut Sen. Joseph Lieberman are holding a field hearing to examine the possible health hazards stemming from the fires and dusts at the World Trade Center site.

And Sen. Clinton joins me now from lower Manhattan.

Welcome back. Can you hear me, Mrs. Clinton?

SEN. HILLARY CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: I can now, yes.

ZAHN: OK, welcome back.

CLINTON: Thank you.

ZAHN: Do you think that the air downtown is as clean and safe to breathe as the EPA says it is?

CLINTON: Well, Paula, that's the purpose of this hearing. We're going to try to get to the bottom of what we do know and what we don't know and what else we need to find out and what we should do about that information. I think that based on what the experts will tell us today and all the evidence I've seen, the air in the general vicinity doesn't raise health hazards.

The air right at the ground zero site, where the first responders and the construction workers have been exposed, you know, has some questions that have to be answered. And that's why I would like us to follow long term the health of the people who were really right in the center of ground zero.

There's been a dispute between the city and the EPA and others about who's responsible for outdoor air versus indoor air. I think we need a plan -- we've learned a lot about this terrible disaster -- that really does put the health of the workers and the residents at the very highest priority of any kind of response. But I think in general, what we know is that in most instances people really don't face any kind of a known health hazard. But we do need to keep monitoring the situation.

ZAHN: How concerned are you though, Senator, that you got the U.S. Geological Survey taking surveys or taking samples at ground zero and actually turning over the data to the EPA? I'm going to actually put up on the screen now what one of those scientists had to say who took part in that study, Geoffrey Plumlee.

And he said, "We made this analytical effort because we were concerned about the likelihood that the composition of the dust could be potentially harmful to the rescue and cleanup workers at the site and to people living and working in lower Manhattan. We share their findings with EPA, FEMA, the federal emergency response coordinator and everyone else we felt appropriate. We anticipated that the results would have been shared with the people on the ground, those at risk, but it looks like the information never got to the people who needed it."

Is the EPA hiding something here?

CLINTON: Well, that's what we're going to try to find out, Paula. You know, certainly, they have had to respond to some very tough scrutiny in the last couple of months. And I don't -- you know, I'm not ready to point any finger at anyone. This is a breakdown of a system and maybe the lack of a system in response to the immensity of the disaster we faced. You know, we really didn't have the right equipment in the beginning for people to go on their rescue and recovery efforts.

You know we haven't done the kind of thorough review that will tell us what we should do to protect people, and that's really what this hearing is about. Because I share your concern and the concerns of, you know, competing experts, as well as residents and workers. Let's get to the bottom of what we know and don't know, and then let's take appropriate action.

ZAHN: Let's address some of the conflicting information here. Some independent surveys have come up with drastically different results from the EPA. I'm going to put on the screen one now from Cate Jenkins, from the hazardous materials company. She said, "For every asbestos fiber EPA detected, the new methods used by the outside experts found nine." And then Hugh Granger, a scientist at the firm HP Environmental said, "The people at the EPA are 10 times brighter than I am. I think some people who really know the answers to all of this are being a little coy."

Based on what you've been exposed to so far, is there any defense for these major discrepancies in findings?

CLINTON: Focusing on very big (AUDIO GAP). Depending on who owned the building you were in, the standards under which they cleaned, the kind of tests that were run, we're getting different results. And I think most buildings -- certainly most public buildings -- were adequately cleaned. And so people should have those concerns. But there were many other buildings where there weren't any standards.

Now we have this conflict between the EPA and the city. Who is responsible? You know, frankly, I really don't care. What I'm interested in is how are we going to assure people that the air they breathe indoors is as safe as it can be under the circumstances. And I think we've gotten kind of a mixed message here from the various levels of government. And that's what I'm trying to sort out today.

ZAHN: Sen. Clinton, before we let you go, I wanted to give you a chance to respond to a piece in "The Daily News" over the weekend, suggesting that the administration now has asked the GAO to expand its probe into alleged vandalism done by the Clinton administration. According to "The Daily News," Bush aides even urged the GAO to expand its investigation even into your offices that you used. Your reaction to this report?

CLINTON: Well, I was as curious as anyone when I read it. I'll just have to wait and see what the real story on that is. You know, today, I'm going to focus on air quality, but, you know, there are many other issues that are swirling around and that's one of them. And I can't understand why they're spending their time, you know, chasing red herrings and false trails, but maybe they can tell us.

ZAHN: Can you categorically deny that anybody vandalized anything in your offices before you and your husband left Washington?

CLINTON: You know, this has -- you know, this has been investigated and, you know, there's just no basis and fact. I don't understand what the administration's, you know, obsession with it is, but maybe they can tell us. Certainly, you know, it's not anything that, you know, I've paid any attention to for over a year now.

ZAHN: I know you said it's been fully investigated, but can you tell us this morning -- you can tell us that -- can you assure us that nobody did anything in the nature of sabotaging your office before you left?

CLINTON: I can't even imagine, you know. There was no such -- as far as I know, there was no such action. Certainly, no one's brought it to my attention and I just don't believe it happened.

ZAHN: All right. Well, Sen. Clinton, we appreciate your joining us today. Good luck with the field hearings. We'll be very interested in finding out the conclusion that you all come to later on this morning.

CLINTON: Thank you. Me too.

ZAHN: I appreciate your time.

U.S. SENATOR EDWARD KENNEDY (D-MA) HOLDS HEARING ON EMPLOYMENT NONDISCRIMINATION, 2/27/2002

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, and than you for holding this hearing. Clearly, this is an issue that I believe is long overdue to be addressed and to pass ENDA, and I want to thank this panel.

I'm sorry I had to be late, but based on what I've heard since I arrived, this is one of the more distinguished and effective panels that I've had the privilege to hear, and I particularly want to thank Mr. Berman, representing a wonderful company in New York, which has had a policy that prohibits discrimination based on sexual orientation since 1986.

And, I think that both the testimony from the business representatives here, Ms. Billingsley and Mr. Gifford, I thank you both for being here with Mr. Berman. I hope we'll get widely distributed, because people need to hear what you each have to say, and I thank Mr. Womack for your passionate advocacy of this particular legislation.

I think it's important to remind ourselves what ENDA does, because as Senator Harkin made reference, there's a lot of misconception about what this bill will do. It is not going to change people's attitudes overnight. We know that. Neither did the civil rights laws of the 1960s, but that was not a reason to avoid doing what was right at that time, just as it's not a reason to avoid doing what is right at this time.

And what ENDA does is to extend federal employment discrimination protections that are currently provided, based on race, religion, sex, national origin, age, and disability to sexual orientation. I think that we can all agree that it was not the end of the world when we ended employment discrimination as a matter of law on any of these other bases.

And certainly, it should be clear that the evidence supports this legislation, and even in the absence of the kind of strong evidence that we've heard testimony about today, it is simply the right thing to do, which is long overdue.

We also know that it extends fair employment practices, not special rights to lesbians, to gay men, to bisexuals, to heterosexuals, to everybody. This should not be an issue. What should be an issue in your employment is your job performance. Can you or can you not do the job? Is your behavior connected appropriately with the job or not? And we need to get beyond holding status in any way against someone who is seeking and holding employment.

This also prohibits public and private employers, employment agencies and labor unions from using an individual's sexual orientation as the basis for employment decision. So it's not just a question of hiring. It's also firing, promotion, and compensation. The next panel will hear very eloquent and moving testimony from Lawrence Lane from New York also about what had happened in his experience.

We also know that ENDA provides for the same procedures and similar, but somewhat more limited, remedies as are permitted under Title VII and Americans with Disabilities Act. So even though the law would say, don't discriminate, the remedies available are actually not on the same level as they are under Title VII and ADA, and of course, it applies to the Congress the very same procedures, which is absolutely appropriate.

Now what ENDA does not do is cover small businesses with fewer than 15 employees, does not cover religious organizations, including educational institutions, does not apply to the uniformed members of the armed forces, although many of us believe that it should, does not allow for quotas or preferential treatment, does not allow a disparate impact or the imposition of affirmative action, and does not allow the EEOC to collect statistics on sexual orientation or compel employers to do so, and does not apply retroactively.

So, it's very important that we clearly lay out what this bill does and what it doesn't do, and that we take into account the evidence that we've heard today, that with respect to employers who actually practice diversity and hire and fire and compensate on the basis of job performance, not on the basis of one's status, one's religion, one's race, one's sexual orientation, that this is not as dramatic or revolutionary a step as many people have advocated that it is.

And I hope that as we move forward with the consideration of ENDA and the chairman has been the champion of its passage for several years now. We can get those facts out, and make it absolutely clear what is done by the legislation and what is left undone, not covered at all.

So, Mr. Chairman, I thank you for bringing such effective and compelling witnesses to this committee and I hope that their testimony is widely circulated, particularly to our colleagues who have doubts and concerns and, just frankly, fears about what this would mean, because it is something that I think Senator Collins is absolutely right in addressing.

We should just be honest about it, put it on the table, and make clear that people have some very deep concerns and fears that are not founded, and we can help to disabuse them, and I hope that the testimony of our four witnesses today will be widely circulated and made available to all of our colleagues, and I thank the witnesses for being here.

[GAP - FROM LATER IN HEARING]

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and I want to thank these witnesses as well. Mr. Lane, what's the status of your efforts to seek remedy under the New York City provisions?

LANE: We are pre-trial. We actually have a trial date of March 18th. C&A did file for a summary judgment, specifically as it relates to the sexual orientation, and thankfully we did win that in our favor and now we await trial.

CLINTON: Well, we wish you well, and of course it's striking that you, at least, have the opportunity to make your case because of the New York City law, and I greatly appreciate your willingness to come and speak with us about this. It will add to the arguments that we have, as we try to take this legislation to the floor, and to eventual passage.

Mr. Coles, could you clarify for the record what the experience has been in states and cities that do prohibit discrimination based on sexual orientation? Have they been flooded with lawsuits and employers tied up in court endlessly? What's happened?

COLES: What's happened is just about what you'd expect, if you assume that lesbians and gay men are about five percent of the work force, which is what most statisticians tell us is probably the right assumption, and you look at the number of complaints that have been filed under the existing laws. And we've had, one law was constant for over 20 years, and several others throughout the '90s. You get just about as many complaints and lawsuits as you do based on race discrimination and gender discrimination.

And I will say frankly that, I think the number of lawsuits you wind up having is certainly smaller than we did when the '64 Civil Rights Act first passed. I think when Congress passed the '64 Civil Rights Act, the idea of civil rights as a part of American life was a new idea, and there was a lot of resistance. I don't think that that's true now, and I think when we make it clear that discrimination on a certain basis shan't happen, most employers comply.

CLINTON: Well that certainly has been the report that I've reviewed, and I think there was a 2000 GAO study of litigation, following the passage of 11 of the state laws, which found that only 1.4 percent of the total discrimination claims in '99 were based on sexual orientation. So it's not proven to be burdensome to courts or burdensome to employers, as some people had feared.

I think that, Mr. Chairman, your long-time support of civil rights legislation, going back to the 1964 Act and in so many ways since then, gives you a standing that the rest of us don't have to support and champion this legislation, and I appreciate that as is your custom, you are once again going forward with it, and I thank the witnesses for being here today to help us put this back on the legislative agenda and try to be successful in the Senate and hopefully in the House and have a signing ceremony, perhaps sometime this year. Thank you very much.

KENNEDY: I want to thank Senator Clinton and thank our other colleagues for their participation. This has been a good hearing. It's my intention to mark this legislation up in March, and get it on the agenda, and we'll do the best we can to get it on the floor. It's, I think, one of the real priorities for us in this Congress, and we have every intention to press it and push it and further it.

And we thank our witnesses for being here, and thank many of our national leaders who have joined us as witnesses to this hearing this morning out in the audience and have been incredible advocates in helping this country move us forward to the time when this legislation will become law.

The committee stands in recess.

U.S. SENATOR EDWARD KENNEDY (D-MA) HOLDS HEARING ON MAMMOGRAPHY, 2/28/2002

CLINTON: Thank you very much, and thank you for holding this hearing.

And thank you, Doctor, for now being in the hot seat for quite some time. And I appreciate your clarification. I'm sorry that I missed your testimony. I just want to ask three brief questions, just be sure that I can accurately report to my many constituents who are deeply concerned about the controversy and also about the high prevalence of breast cancer in many parts of New York, higher than the national average.

Is it fair to say that your testimony today, reflecting the NCI position, is that all women should get regular mammograms after the age of 40 or is it that women should be provided with information about the benefits and risks which they then, in consultation with their doctors, make their own decisions?

VON ESCHENBACH: We're recommending that it be a combination of both the performance and availability of the mammogram, along with the education and understanding of the implications of it. I believe both of those are important, but I would not leave out the mammogram as a primary part and the initial part of that recommendation.

CLINTON: But now a woman who's a potential recipient of a mammogram really has no independent way of determining the efficacy or the quality of the mammogram. So if I'm asked by a constituent after this hearing, "Well, what did Dr. von Eschenbach say should be done," what's my short answer?

VON ESCHENBACH: Beginning at age 40, you ought to have a mammogram every one to two years.

CLINTON: OK. Great. I just wanted to be absolutely clear about that.

Now, as to the second issue, with respect to the quality and the efficacy, we will be reauthorizing the Mammography Quality Standards Act, recertifying it, I think, this year. Will you be able to provide us with specific suggestions as to any modifications of the act that might be helpful to address this controversy and increase the quality standards? I think that there's been some debate about whether or not the MQSA has really lived up to its promise, and can you offer any suggestions as to what we can do to modify it when we reauthorize the act?

VON ESCHENBACH: At this point, I could not, Senator, but I'd be happy to provide that to you in subsequent information and material that would give you the kind of documentation that you needed for an intelligent recommendation from me.

CLINTON: That would be very helpful. Because one of the things which is happening in New York, and I assume it's happening elsewhere, even before the back and forth of the last month or so, is that many physicians' offices and freestanding mammography clinics were eliminating the service, because the reimbursement was insufficient to pay for the physician time, the technician time and the overhead costs. So we have many parts of my state where it's very difficult to access a mammogram.

And what I'm worried about is that in light of this controversy we will see more and more insurance companies determining that they will no longer cover the cost of mammography, concluding that because it is somewhat in dispute as to its importance that it's no longer a covered service. So I'm hoping that your very straightforward statement, that it is still the recommendation of the National Cancer Institute that women starting at the age of 40 have a mammogram, will give us the ammunition we need to avoid further cutbacks in access and reimbursement, which I'm very concerned about.

So I join the other members of this panel in thanking you for your testimony, thanking you for taking on such an important task, because, certainly, those of us who have been involved in this issue for some time -- and I see my friend, Fran Visco, out there -- knows that we have to do even more to find ways of preventing and curing breast cancer and that mammography is a tool in that fight, but it is not the principal weapon that we need to utilize. And so thank you very much for being here.

[GAP - FROM LATER IN HEARING]

CLINTON: Thank you very much. I want to thank the panelists. We have three extremely dedicated witnesses who have given their lives to this fight against breast cancer.

I couldn't agree more with the point that Fran Visco made about the inequitable distribution of resources with respect to dealing with breast cancer. In fact, most of our major health problems are more likely to fall disproportionately on the poor, on the people who don't have access to affordable, quality, reliable health insurance.

And I think that the National Breast Cancer Coalition's constant advocacy on behalf of more resources and on better access has been an extremely important part of this debate. I hope that it's not a point that's going to be forgotten, because we still have a lot of work to do.

I wanted to ask Fran about what the coalition's current review of insurance coverage, with respect not only to mammography, but to breast cancer treatment in general, has led you to conclude about any action we need to be contemplating with respect to insurance coverage.

VISCO: Well, I think one of the most important issues before the Congress now is coverage for oral anti-cancer drugs. As you know, breast cancer is primarily a disease of older women, and women who are covered by Medicare -- Medicare does not cover Tamoxifen, which is probably responsible for much of the decrease in mortality that you've seen in the charts that Dr. Von Eschenbach put up. That is a critically important question in breast cancer, much more important than if a woman has to wait three months for a screening mammogram. I also want to say that there is no way that the National Breast Cancer Coalition would let up on pushing for access to health care for all women and all Americans.

Another point that I need to have the opportunity to make is about breast self-exam. You know, there is no scientific evidence that breast self-exam saves lives. That is another infrastructure that has been built up in this country based on no evidence. And, in fact, the evidence that we're seeing now indicates that there may not be a difference in mortality through teaching breast self-exam.

CLINTON: Thank you.

Dr. Runowicz, I'd really appreciate your perspective, both as a physician and as a breast cancer survivor yourself. What is the best for us to dispel the confusion and, to some extent, even more than that, the despair that women feel about knowing what they're supposed to do and who they believe and how they make these decisions?

I think that what the American Cancer Society, the National Cancer Institute, and others have said, which is, I think, putting it sort of simply, that you can't let the perfect be the enemy of the good. Until we know something more than we know now, it's prudent to continue to recommend the same standards that we have adopted. How do we get that message out?

RUNOWICZ: I think that's a very big challenge, and one article on the front page of the New York Times can undo all of the good of all of the organizations. But I think we should continue hammering home the same consistent message and letting patients know that controversy is what science is all about and that's how we make new discoveries, and that until we have other data that makes us change these guidelines -- these guidelines are based on good science, and we need to get that message out over and over again.

CLINTON: Well, I thank you for your role in doing that.

And, Dr. Leffall, thank you for your years of service to patients and as an advocate and spokesman. From your perspective, also dealing with patients, and from the work that you do with the Koman Foundation, is there more we could in the Congress to try to convey more support for the clinicians' work that you and Dr. Runowicz and others are doing? How do we help you get the message out, and, from your perspective, what additional steps should we be taking in funding to try to move the breast cancer debate beyond mammography to prevention and cure and some of the other issues that are at the root of it?

LEFFALL: Well, we must always be concerned about those, Senator Clinton, the prevention and cure. But one thing that I think you can do -- so many of my colleagues that are radiologists are telling me that they are no longer willing to perform mammography, because the reimbursement they get is not worth it from a pragmatic point of view.

They say, "I want to help patients. That's why we're in medicine, to help patients. And I don't get enough to pay the expenses in my office." So that's something that certainly can be done.

But in addition to that, as long as we can continue to emphasize that until we have something better, the things that are based on science -- and the mammography recommendations are based on scientific data, and we are not opposed to other people looking at those data to be sure that they are what they say they are, and if there's a difference of opinion, let's talk about it. Let's not try to hide it. But that's something we can do for the radiologists who perform mammography.

CLINTON: Well, thank you, because that, as I said earlier, is a big problem in New York, and it's becoming a real barrier to access. Even if women are presented with all sides of this issue and make the determination they want a mammogram, it's becoming harder to get one, either because of access or affordability.

LEFFALL: That's correct.

CLINTON: So I want to thank, again, Chairman Mikulski for holding this important hearing, along with Chairman Harkin. It was a very important service.

MIKULSKI: Thank you very much.

Senator Harkin?

HARKIN: Thank you very much.

I just want to say, Dr. Leffall, with regard to one point that you just mentioned, I do have a bill in to increase that reimbursement rate for radiologists. I've been hearing from them.

Just yesterday, some of the ones in Iowa -- that question was asked -- what does it cost -- and they said $100 to $120, somewhere in that range. I think the reimbursement is now around $75.

LEFFALL: Average, yes.

HARKIN: The average is about $75. And so you're right. A lot of people just are turning people away.

LEFFALL: They're not doing it anymore. That's correct, Senator.

HARKIN: So I do have a bill in to get that done. If I can find something to attach it to this year, I'll attach it.

LEFFALL: Very well.

HARKIN: I'm wondering, though, if I will get the comments on the floor that maybe this is not necessary. I don't know. Is it necessary? Well, I'm just saying -- you know, with the conflict that seems to be out there now. People will say, "Well, why do you want to increase the reimbursement rate to radiologists that do the mammograms when we don't even know if mammograms are efficacious or not, you know? Maybe we shouldn't do it."

LEFFALL: But most groups in the United States believe that until we get something better, this is what we should continue to recommend. That's why the Koman Foundation is recommending it -- ACOG, the NCI, the American Cancer Society -- because we believe that it is based on the best available science that we have today.

And we'd like to emphasize we're not opposed to a re-look at the data to be sure that it's what we say it is and let patients know the truth. We're not trying to hide the truth.

But when you come up with something better -- and Dr. Von Eschenbach mentioned some things, like the PET scan, MRI, digital mammography. When they are proved to be better, then we can go to that. But until then, I think we should stick with what we have that we know can make the diagnosis early. And you asked many questions today about early detection, which is extremely important.

HARKIN: Fran Visco, we've worked together now for over 10 years.

VISCO: That's right.

HARKIN: And you said in your testimony that we've got to ask if mammography screening is the best use of finite dollars. Well, if we don't, what do we do, Fran? If we don't use them there, where do we use them?

VISCO: Well, I think we should use them to give health coverage to women. I think women need to be reimbursed for their medicine. I think more women need to have access to quality care.

There are many areas that are looking at truly early detection, looking at questions on how to prevent breast cancer, looking at non-toxic targeted therapies. The mammography debate is sucking up all of our time, all of our dollars, all of our attention, all of our focus. There is so much more to eradicating breast cancer, and that's where we need to move those dollars.

HARKIN: How much do we spend a year on mammograms?

VISCO: It's a multi-billion-dollar number. Exactly how many billions, I don't know. I've seen numbers recently, but they're not in my head. But I know it's many billions.

HARKIN: Most covered by insurance and Medicare, mostly Medicare?

VISCO: Probably. I don't know the answer to that question.

HARKIN: I'd like to find that out.

MIKULSKI: But not for the poor, Senator. Just in the interest of this dialog, you have Medicare covering mammography, but that's every other year. But at least it's something. We spearheaded that.

Then those of us who have private insurance receive reimbursement. But, again, you've got to watch your time on that or they won't do that. But for poor women, the only thing that we have is the Breast and Cervical Screening Program at CDC, which the women of Congress initiated, and, Senator, you have been steadfast in helping provide the funds for it. Did you hear what I just said?

(LAUGHTER)

HARKIN: Oh, I'm sorry. Talk to me at one time.

MIKULSKI: Are you done? Did you want to say anything else?

HARKIN: Talk to me at one time.

MIKULSKI: I said that for reimbursement, Medicare provides it for the women over 65 every other year. For other women, it's reimbursed through private health insurance, but, again, it has age guidelines to it. Third, for poor women, the only tool -- and it's a down payment tool -- is the Breast and Cervical Cancer Screening at CDC, and that's funded as -- through Medicaid -- that's funded through...

VISCO: No, the treatment component that we worked on for four years and last year were finally successful in getting enacted into law were women who are screened through the CDC program -- once they're diagnosed, they become Medicaid eligible for their treatment.

MIKULSKI: But you fund in your Labor-HHS the CDC program. But if it wasn't for your funding in the CDC program, poor women wouldn't even have an option. And by and large, even there, it's still a rather spartan number of women who can participate. But even when they're screened, the Medicaid is also optioned to the state.

VISCO: It's an optional program with the states, but the National Breast Cancer Coalition has been very successful over the past year in getting 39 states so far to opt in.

MIKULSKI: Well, bravo.

VISCO: Thank you.

MIKULSKI: Bravo for that. But, again, for poor women...

HARKIN: Well, my staff tells me it's $3 billion. I assume that's all insurance and Medicare and everything. Is that what you're telling me?

UNKNOWN: Yes, all together.

HARKIN: All together, it's $3 billion a year. So it is a sizable sum of money. I mean, we're putting $800 million on research now, right?

UNKNOWN: Yes, we are.

HARKIN: That's $800 million. So it is a lot of money for mammograms.

VISCO: And remember access to health care, too, for these women, to treatment and to oral anti-cancer drugs, very important issues in breast cancer.

HARKIN: Again, you know, in trying to clear this up, trying to get a definitive type of an answer to women out there, what would you tell my nieces? Both their mothers died of breast cancer, and they're now in their -- I don't know how old they are now -- late 20s, 30s now, maybe almost 40, and they've been getting breast cancer screening because of that. What would you tell them now?

VISCO: Well, I would tell them to go to the National Breast Cancer Coalition web site and look at our question and answer, which lays out all of the issues on this very debate. We'd be happy to help them work their way through it, and then they can make up their minds about what they want to do. But I think women have the power and the capability to understand this complexity and to make a decision on what to do.

HARKIN: Well, I believe that's true, also. But I still think early detection right now is still the best.

VISCO: We may not know how to detect breast cancer early enough.

HARKIN: Well, I know. I read your testimony. I know. I read it, and I know that.

VISCO: Well, believe me, I wish...

HARKIN: And we're working on a blood test. You know that. We have this blood test now for...

VISCO: Ovarian?

HARKIN: ... ovarian cancer. Thank you. That might be possible. I mean, they're working on it now to see. But, in the meantime, we don't have it. And you're right. It may not be early enough, but it's earlier than what you might detect if you were just doing physical exams.

VISCO: Well, the issue is does it make a difference, and that's the debate around the trials.

HARKIN: Well, I thought the answer to that was, all other things being equal, yes, it makes a difference, that the earlier detected, the quality of life and the probability of having a longer life is much better.

VISCO: Well, let me respond that the data don't necessarily show that in terms of length of life, but certainly quality of life. The data show from the trials that more mastectomies are performed in the group that are screened by mammography than in the control group, because we don't know how to treat very early breast cancer, and we tend to do mastectomies often in that population.

HARKIN: Or lumpectomies or something like that.

VISCO: Yes, but the data show that more mastectomies are done in the mammography screened group. That's the data.

HARKIN: But that data is based on the 60s and 70s and 80s.

MIKULSKI: And now we have new approaches.

HARKIN: We have new approaches now. That's why I say doing this study does not take into account some of the new technologies that we use now and the new interventions.

VISCO: I know we can have this debate forever, and, again, our Q&A, I believe, lays out some of these issues, and perhaps it warrants a longer debate at another time. But sometimes breast cancer is not a very logical disease. It is a very complex disease.

HARKIN: Well, again, I ask, as I've asked the other panelists, all things being equal, if someone has the insurance coverage, or if they're low income and they can get access to the Breast and Cervical Cancer Screening Program, should they go ahead and have mammography? Every single person I talked to yesterday in my state of Iowa said yes. These are clinicians, doctors, nurses, and breast cancer survivors. Every single one said yes.

I don't know. I'm not a doctor, and I wouldn't give that advice. But I think one of the purposes of our hearing here was to try to clear the air a little bit and get a little bit more definitive statement to the women of this country.

You're right. Women can make up their own minds. But it's very difficult to make up your mind when you're faced with a life-threatening illness, and the people that you put your trust in and confidence in have no real definitive answers for you or no guidelines for you to take.

I keep coming back to my basic question. All other things being equal, is early detection better than later detection, and will mammography give you earlier detection?

Dr. Runowicz, what do you say?

RUNOWICZ: I'd like to answer several of the questions that you've raised, your nieces, for one. There's been a breast cancer prevention trial that has been completed in this country and showed that Tamoxifen prevented breast cancer, and there is a star (ph) study now. And if they meet the eligibility criteria -- I don't think they will, because they're not post-menopausal -- but I would certainly encourage that they look into clinical trials and that they certainly discuss the issues of Tamoxifen.

RUNOWICZ: As far as right now, there is no compelling evidence to alter any of our guidelines. Every single major institution, every single major organization, is still saying stick with your guidelines, which is from age 40 to 50, every one to two years -- some organizations say every year, such as the American Cancer Society. Others say every one to two, such as the National Cancer Institute and the American College of OB/GYN -- after 50, every year until there is another co-morbid (ph) condition which precludes the sensibility of continuing mammography.

The debate here today is a statistical debate. The debate here today is media hype. The debate here today is the New York Times front page. And that is why we are here today.

We are not here because there is new data. We are here because there are statisticians who, in their own group, the Cochran Group -- that is an excellent group. These two investigators did not have the entire group behind them, and the Lancet article that they published was not published with the entire backing of that group. Instead, that group published a separate article, and they have their web site, where -- dissension from the two authors.

So that is why we are here today, because somebody has reanalyzed data. And they have chosen, based on their statistical evaluation, that they wish to exclude other studies, and other groups, such as the U.S. Preventive Services Health Task Force, said no, we don't agree with their exclusion.

So looking at the raw data again -- and it has been done in 1993. But looking at that raw data again will perhaps readdress these issues. But there is no compelling evidence and there is no new evidence to alter our guidelines.

Was that clear?

HARKIN: That was very clear.

LEFFALL: I would just like to echo that -- you were asking the question about your nieces. Without any question, I believe the answer is yes, please get the screening mammogram.

And this is not saying you're opposed to any of the other things that were mentioned today in terms of access to care, but what could be more important than access to health care? That's one of the most important things. But today, we're talking about the mammography debate, and it is a debate, a statistical debate.

But I think that Senator Dr. Frist, a colleague, mentioned that when you're sitting with a patient, and that patient asks you, "Doctor, what should I get," and you go over a lot of information, they say, "You're asking me to make a decision in a few minutes, and you've spent your entire professional life studying this. I don't think you're being fair to me." I'd get that when I used to go into a lot of detail, yet you're trying to inform patients.

Patients should be informed. Patients are very intelligent. They should be informed, but when we cut through the chaff to get to the wheat, get the screening mammogram. That's the answer.

HARKIN: Thank you all very much.

MIKULSKI: Before we conclude, because I said I'd be the wrap-up questioner, I just want to reiterate essentially what has come out of this hearing, and then I have a final question for you, Doctor.

First of all, what we see is that the biostatisticians disagree. That's quick. And they will be continuing to look at data and analyzing it and so on.

Clinicians, those who have the lives of the patients in their hands, do not disagree. The clinicians agree and recommend in the most enthusiastic, unabashed, and unqualified way that we follow the existing guidelines that have been established by the National Cancer Institutes of Health, recently reaffirmed by the Preventive Health Task Force at HHS, and have been longstanding recommendations also of the American Cancer Society.

So this hearing should not end without it being clear that those who are in charge of America's public health, its research institutes, the oldest cancer organization in the United States of America, and representing the clinicians all agree that if you are 40 and older, you should have a mammogram every other year, and if there is indication of greater risk, either genetically or because of medications, to pursue it. So that's where there's an agreement.

There is also an agreement even among -- whether it's the biostatisticians or also among the advocacy groups, where again there's disagreements, that, first of all, yes, we need access. We need access to women's health care, and as part of that, whatever then -- if you have access to health care, your doctor then can recommend the best next steps for whatever seems to be. It could be diabetes. It could be lung cancer, which is the biggest killer of women. It could be for heart disease, et cetera, but access to health care, and then access, also, to treatments, which means, again, the way we need to look at our patients' bill of rights.

I believe, Doctor, that OB/GYN should be designated also as primary care providers. You are the first and sometimes the only physician that women see, and you're the one that can say, "Wow, 20 years on birth control. We'd better get you in now, even though you're 38 years old." So access.

Of course, this debate is moot for the poor, because of the limited access to health care and the even further limited access to treatments, even where there is diagnosis. And we've all heard that.

I thank all of you for mentioning the Mammogram Quality Standards, as well as the Breast and Cervical Screening program at CDC. Thanks to the advocacy groups -- and, Fran, I particularly want to mention your group in that -- we really pushed for that. I take pride that I was one of the prime movers of that, initially, and then had these fine men of the Senate really support us. And we now know that's made a difference, and we welcome any views on mammogram quality standards. So we thank you for that.

So that's where we agree. I mean, we agree we've got to have our mammogram quality standards. We agree we need research on new tools and on new treatments, but new tools and new treatments are a hollow opportunity if we don't have access to health care for women. The start for what is the best way to go for whatever we confront really needs to be having the access to health care.

So that, then, I think, is where we agree, and I think if people said, "Well, what would you think about all this, Senator," I would say we need to stay the course in terms of the existing guidelines until there's clear, compelling, and convincing evidence otherwise. But we really need to pursue these mammogram quality standards as well as new research.

I'm going to close with the access issue. I raised this issue -- Senator Clinton and others. We've got to be really careful that while we scientifically disagree, we do not end up discouraging health insurance plans from covering this important screening tool.

It might not be the best tool right now, but it seems to be the only reliable -- or at least pretty reliable tool. And, in fact, we would like for the health insurance industry to take a whole new fresh look at women's health care and what they reimburse, starting with designating the OB/GYN as a primary care physician along with other internists.

So we say to the insurance companies we hope you've learned something. We say most of all to the American women, if you're over 40, get that mammogram. If you're under 40, let's find a way to get you in to talk to someone to see if you're at risk and go from there.

Thank you very much, and I really want to thank everyone who presented their views. And for the biostatisticians, thank you, even for your disputed presentations, because they caused us now to take a new look at where we are. We thank you, and we encourage you to continue in your own good work.

This hearing stands adjourned.

U.S. SENATOR EDWARD KENNEDY (D-MA) HOLDS HEARING ON ENVIRONMENTAL HEALTH PROBLEMS,
3/6/2002

CLINTON: We're going to have the first panel. Senator Reed had hoped to get here to testify himself and if he comes, we will interrupt our panel and let Senator Reed testify. But now we would like Dr. Jackson, Dr. Falk and Dr. Olden to please come to the table.

I am very pleased to chair today's hearing on improved surveillance of chronic conditions and potential links to environmental exposures. I want to thank Chairman Kennedy for granting my request for the committee to hold this hearing. It's a matter of grave importance to my constituents and to communities around the country and I think to all of us.

As we will hear from Dr. Ed Thompson, in one year alone, state health officers receive literally hundreds of requests from communities in their state for investigation into so-called cancer clusters. Now whether these clusters are actual or perceived, communities are right to be concerned about the rising rates of chronic disease because, unfortunately, the overall incidence in our country is rising. Children in America have experienced a 20 percent increase in asthma in the past 10 years alone. We've seen large increases in endocrine and metabolic disorders such as diabetes and neurological diseases such as Parkinsons.

And a recent study revealed that multiple sclerosis in women increased 50 percent in just one three-year period. Oftentimes, individuals and communities look to the environment as a possible cause or contributor to disease and communities and scientists have begun to trace the links between certain chronic conditions and the environment so that we are slowly beginning to fill in the gaps of our knowledge on both.

For example, as we will hear today from Dr. Thurston (ph) his most recent study shows a clear and devastating connection between exposure to small particles of soot and dust and the development of lung cancer and heart disease. According to the new study, the danger of breathing soot-filled air in polluted cities is comparable to the health risks associated with long-term exposure to second hand smoke.

Living in a city should not be the equivalent of living with a smoker. I think of some of my friends who have suffered from lung cancer and were never smokers and nobody could ever figure it out or explain to me or to them how this happened.

I'd also like to mention that certainly since September 11th, we in New York have been very concerned about the quality of air, both in the immediate vicinity of ground zero and how it has affected first responders and construction workers. We know that after a thorough screening of the fire department's personnel, 20 percent were found to have some respiratory problem that they did not have before.

We're seeing that the large percentage of fire fighters who experienced coughs and shortness of breath and a decline in pulmonary function are all likely tracing that to their exposure at ground zero. I held a recent hearing with Senator Lieberman to try to sort out what we know and don't know. I heard from many residents. I heard from people who work in the area. I heard from the teachers and the parents of children that go to school in the area and the reports are of persistent sinusitis, laryngitis, bronchitis and among some, the first attacks of asthma they've ever experienced.

Now in recent years, mostly through the study of twins, researchers have shown that our behavior and our environment play a much greater role in causing chronic disease than we ever once thought. As researcher Judith Stern (ph) puts it so vividly, genetics loads the gun, but the environment pulls the trigger.

When we can better identify the links between our health and our environment, we can take appropriate and cost effective action that will protect public health and possibly even save lives. Now one of the first major discoveries about the link between the manmade environment and our health concerns lead, lead in gasoline and lead in paint, which can cause reduced IQ and behavior and learning disabilities in children. Since we began to phase out lead use in the 1970s, the number of children under the age of six with blood levels of lead above the current health standards has decreased by over 80 percent.

As a result of cancer tracking efforts, elevated rates of oral cancers among women in the southeastern United States were found to be linked to the use of chewing tobacco. Similarly, elevated death rates for lung cancer in coastal areas of Virginia, Georgia and northeastern Florida and Louisiana were eventually linked to exposure of shipyard workers to asbestos during World War II.

Our current public health surveillance systems were developed when the major threats to health were infectious agents such as polio and tuberculosis. And we do track infectious diseases nationally for a very good reason, because we need to respond quickly when an infection appears. But now chronic diseases are the number one killer of people in our nation. Among three out of every four of us in this room will die of a chronic disease. Now four out of four of us will die, we all know that, but anything we can do to make ourselves healthier and to save some money expended on the health care system on our way to that inevitability is I think a very good investment.

That's why we need to be concerned not just about pathogens, but carcinogens and toxins. As we begin a round of long overdue investments in our public health infrastructure due to the emerging press of bioterrorism, it is the perfect time to begin thinking about how to modernize our surveillance systems and best adapt them to current threats. Despite their extraordinary burden on our nation's health, we have no current effective and comprehensive way to track the outbreak of chronic diseases.

We do not for example even track birth defects nationally, even though they are the leading cause of infant mortality according to the CDC. The cause of up to 80 percent of all birth defects is unknown. Now we are making progress on mapping cancer cases but we don't keep track of autoimmune diseases nationally and I'm very concerned that we do not monitor in any ongoing comprehensive way, the outbreak of asthma in children. So we can and we should do better and through improved tracking, we will make a difference.

The purpose of today's hearing is to examine our existing public health infrastructure and discuss ways we can learn from and build upon an existing surveillance and data collecting system. We have to do this in a way that is effective and meaningful for Federal, state and local environmental and public health officials for the research community and for the many, many communities and families that are looking for answers. I'm delighted that we've been joined by such distinguished witnesses to address this important issue. I look forward to their testimony and I'm also pleased that two of my colleagues have joined us and I'd like to turn to them now to ask if they have any opening comments. Senator Reed.

REED: Thank you very much Madam Chairwoman and first let me thank and commend you for organizing this hearing on an incredibly important topic as you've outlined so well in your opening statement. We are looking today to see if we can develop systems for tracking chronic diseases and whether or not we can identify those potential links to environmental exposure which might cause disease. This is particularly important for all of us. It's particularly important for me in Rhode Island. Just recently we had an outbreak in Bow (ph), Rhode Island, where the chemical NTB (ph) infiltrated the water system of that community and we have fortunately developed an alternate supply of water but residents are terribly concerned that over the last few months they've been exposed to toxic which cause long-term adverse health effects.

I want to personally thank the toxic, agency of the toxic substances and disease registry, Dr. Falk. Your colleagues are on the ground today in Bow (ph) Rhode Island, helping to assess the health effects of the exposure and they're doing a marvelous job and thank you for being here. And I thank you for what you're doing in your agency.

This is just one example of the constant interaction between environmental issues and health effects and we have prepared for much more. In addition to public water systems like Bouroughville (ph), there's also a threat to private well systems and I'd like to work with my colleagues to see if we could at least start monitoring the effect of this on private well systems, helping people monitor their own water.

Also I'd like to recognize and welcome Dr. Ed Thompson, who is here. Dr. Thompson appeared before this committee with respect to childhood immunization and provided some very, very critical insights and I thank you for that and I look forward to your testimony today. We have a lot to do as outlined so effectively by Senator Clinton and it's time I think to get on with this work to establish the links between environmental exposures and disease, to track disease and to determine if we can anticipate and preempt some of the effects of environmental exposures. And I thank the chairman.

CLINTON: Senator Wellstone.

WELLSTONE: Thank you Madam Chairman. I too thank you for your work and I thank the panelists. I'm going to apologize too because I'm in and out. We have a very controversial nominee before the Ag Committee that I have to attend, but I want to be a part of your work. I mean the only observation I would make in less than a minute is (inaudible) Swedish sociologist, once wrote, ignorance is never random. And then my translation of that is sometimes we don't know what we don't want to know. And in many ways I think that's what you're going after here.

I've been in too many schools. I know when Jonathan (inaudible) took me to P.S. 10 in Mathaven (ph) in south Bronx, what is it, over a third of the children have asthma and I've been in too many schools where that's been the case and I just met with a group of wonderful people, neighborhood activists in south Minneapolis. They're worried about the whole question of lead poisoning and but I think quite often we just don't want to -- I mean the public health infrastructure is so important to really, to really collecting the data and really being able to being honest, intellectually honest, about what are the connections here and in a lot of ways, I think we've wanted to put this in parenthesis.

We haven't wanted to look at this and I think the only thing I would say to you Madam Chairman, not that you're afraid of controversy. You are -- you're not afraid to fight for what you believe in. I think that ultimately where this will take you and all of us will be, we're going to have to challenge some fairly powerful interests when it comes to finally just saying, look, there comes a point in time where everybody can organize production, how they want to and everybody should be able to do well.

We're a strong private sector economy. I believe in that, up to the point where you're poisoning the air or you're poisoning the water or you're -- and you're harming children in which case then the public interest takes over and we need to be there to protect people and make a difference. And so I think this is, this is cutting edge work you're doing. Thank you.

CLINTON: Thank you very much and I notice we have quite a crowd. If some of the folks in the back could move over a little bit, we could get more people in the door and there are a few chairs I see up in the front if somebody wants to come and stay, visit and I certainly don't mind, especially with all the students coming in since really this is more about their futures than mine. If they want to come and sit down here in the carpeted areas as well.

I'm delighted that we're starting with such a distinguished group of public servants and I can't stress enough how impressed I am at the quality of our public health officials and work force. For too long, they have been under funded and under appreciated and certainly although they technically have the authority to conduct surveillance and chronic disease tracking, they don't have the direction or the resources to do that and that's what we hope the legislation that we intend to introduce next week will be designed to remedy.

Our first witness is Dr. Richard Jackson, the director of the National Center on Environmental Health, Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. He served previously as the California, at the California Department of Health Services where he directed the division of infectious disease control and the division of environmental hazard assessment.

At the CDC, Dr. Jackson is working to make that institution a premiere resource on environmental health and I know that he has spent his life advocating for greater protection for our children's health and for greater understanding of how the environment affects all of our health. Dr. Jackson was at the field hearings that I held on Long Island last year and I'm pleased that he could join us today to talk about what the CDC is doing on these important issues. Dr. Jackson.

JACKSON: Thank you Senator Clinton, Senator Reed. Thank you for the invitation to be here with you today. There's no doubt that the environment plays an important role, human development and health. We know for example that asbestos causes lung cancer and lead impairs the development of the brain. The information is still out on many other outcomes that can be related to the environment and we need to know a lot more.

In January of 2001, former Senator Lowell Weicker issued a report from the Pew Environmental Health Commission called "America's Environmental Health Gap" and why the country needs a nationwide health tracking network. That gap that was described in the report was the lack of basic information needed to document and disprove possible links, prove or disprove possible links between environmental hazards and chronic diseases.

You've already talked in your earlier statements about the importance of chronic diseases and I would put this in the formal record that I'll submit and I'll truncate my comments here if I may. CCATSDR (ph) and sister agencies came together following this report and developed a strategy for developing and implementing a integrated tracking system and to develop a trained environmental health work force. You mentioned for example that most states have an infectious disease epidemiologist. I would say very few states have an environmental epidemiologist, that is someone who is trained to look at environment and look at human health outcomes. That infrastructure is much, much thinner than in the infectious disease area.

JACKSON: And one thing that's very important is improving the collaboration between the health agencies and the environmental agencies. In fact as we've gone along in this, sometimes we go into a state. We found out that the health leader has never met the head of the environmental agency and one useful part of this is just creating that convening process where we're bringing these agencies together.

We'd like to thank Congress for the appropriation of $17 1/2 million in fiscal year 2002 to begin an implementation of a national environmental health tracking network. We've used this to support the development, beginning of a pilot tracking network in a number of states. We're not exactly sure what is the best investment, which diseases to start with. Some of these would take many years to put a tracking system in place and because of this, we've brought in 70 state partners, environmental and health people. We've had four rounds of meetings with them. They have extensive recommendations about here's step one. Here's step two and we're really at the stage where we're developing the blueprints. We haven't really begun an bulldozing or laying of the foundation but you've got to have a plan about how you're going to put all this in place.

One thing is the tracking of actual environmental hazards and that's something that EPA and the environmental agencies have much more strength with, but we've got to have common data systems. In other words, if the software that they're using is completely incompatible with the computers and softwares that the health people are using, that's going to make this much more difficult and in trying to go back and reconstruct exposures from five, 10 years, ago and having to reinvent it from inconsistent, incompatible data systems, is extraordinarily difficult. So just getting those systems coherent is very important.

The second thing is tracking of exposures and last year at this time we presented a report card on body burdens of chemicals in the American people. We reported on 27 chemicals including byproducts of tobacco smoke, (inaudible) other chemicals in the environment.

Later this year we'll be reporting on a total of 70 chemicals in the American people, again profiling body burdens of chemicals. We call this bio-monitoring but it's very important to know what's in the environment, know what's in people and then the third stage is no what happens to people, the health outcome tracking and that you've got to work with, old fashioned systems like vital statistics, birth certificates, death certificates and the rest in much more sophisticated systems such as you'll hear about today.

The leukemia cluster that we worked very hard on in (inaudible) Nevada, we at CDC, really is probably the gold standard of cluster investigations. Every child has been interviewed and four controls for every child, extensive questionnaires of blood specimens, urine specimens, genetic specimens have been obtained in that situation. It's really almost a laboratory for looking at this linking of environment with health.

And the other investigation we've been very active in is the World Trade Center which really I think exemplifies this need to link the hazards, the exposures and the disease outcomes. Our environmental health lab has received blood and urine specimens from the rescue workers at the World Trade Center more than 400 of them. We couldn't obviously do 10,000 fire fighters but we have them from 400 individuals collected about two weeks after the 9/11 event. And we're working closely with New York City, the fire department and many other partners to put this out. We hope to be able to provide a report. Already the fire fighters are receiving individual feedback about their results but the larger report is still in the pipeline but this will be very helpful.

I just want to mention, this question about how much registries or how many are there and what are they. CDC's funding 45 states, three territories in Washington, D.C. for the cancer registries. We're funding six states for estuary-related diseases. This was the pfisteria episode and what was going on with contaminated water systems. We have 35 states funded for birth defect surveillance and data usage and we're actually up to 37 states for asthma surveillance. So thanks to the support that we've received, that is just night and day different from where it was two years ago.

I've testified in front of Senator Reed about the lead surveillance program a number of times and you know that very well and I won't go into much depth there. In fact I'm going to close, skip the next two pages and just close with the point that the environmental health tracking program is a high-priority for CDC, ATSDR (ph) and all of our partners. It is very challenging. It's -- we're going to bring together people from all sides of government disciplines, local, state and public health and environmental leaders. It's a tremendous challenge.

The successful implementation will provide information regarding relationships between environmental exposures and chronic and other diseases and could lead to interventions that could make a difference in people's lives. We thank you for your support and for your invitation to appear here today.

CLINTON: Thank you very much Dr. Jackson. We've been joined by Senator Murray, a long-time champion of both health and environment. Would you care to make an opening statement Senator?

MURRAY: Thank you Madam Chairman. I'll just say how much I appreciate your having this very important hearing today. I've been an advocate for greater focus on environmental factors in contributing to the growing epidemic of a number of diseases from breast cancer to auto immune disorders and mass asthma over the years and I really think it is important that we focus on how we collect data and distribute it and educate people about the risks out there, but you can't talk about what to educate people unless you know what is out there and track it. And I've been especially interested in the last few years on the issue of asbestos and what happened in (inaudible) Montana and what we knew, didn't know, didn't collect and didn't tell and are still not telling people about asbestos in this country. So I really appreciate your holding this hearing. I'm looking forward to hearing from the witnesses and having an opportunity to ask them questions.

CLINTON: Thank you Senator. Our next witness is Dr. Henry Falk who served as the assistant administrator of the Agency for Toxic Substances and Disease Registry in Atlanta. He previously served as the director of the division of environmental hazards and health effects at the National Center for Environmental Health at the CDC. Dr. Falk has been a leader on a wide variety of environmental health programs and initiatives at the CDC. Senator Reed and I were privileged to hear from Dr. Falk during the field hearing in (inaudible) Nevada last year and I appreciate him being here today to continue his efforts to educate all of us about what needs to be done. Dr. Falk.

FALK: Thank you very much Senator Clinton, Senator Reed, Senator Murray. The Agency for Toxic Substances and Disease Registry or ATSDR is a sister agency to the Centers for Disease Control of the Department of Health and Human Services in Atlanta. Congress created ATSDR by way of the Superfund legislation to assess public health impact of Superfund sites to nearby populations and to determine the relationship between exposures to hazards substance and disease.

As a result we work very closely with EPA and also with colleagues at NIEHS who are involved with Superfund work and others. We have specific language in our legislative authority to work on developing and maintaining registries of serious diseases and illnesses as well as persons exposed to toxic substances. For example we are currently working on developing a registry of asbestos-exposed workers in (inaudible) Montana and I'll speak briefly about that in a little while.

We have worked over these past 20 years to recognize disease patterns in relation to toxic exposures from Superfund sites and so our work through the Superfund program links up I think with the general interests that we all have here in terms of environmental disease tracking.

We have worked closely in responding to the Pew Commission recommendations with CDC and have assisted and supported them in their efforts, including developing the CDC ATSDR response to the Pew Commission recommendations and we hope and anticipate to be able to continue working with CDC on further planning and implementation of environmental public health tracking network.

I wanted to briefly emphasize several aspects from our work that I think are of relevance as we move forward in this area. First is the efforts to portray a difficult picture in ways that people understand, in trying to link health data and environmental data, exposure data, hazard information. That's a lot to hold together at one time and we rely very heavily on our Superfund program on geographic information systems to be able to portray to people where are plumes of exposure, who is exposed, what are the health effects that we know and kind of overlay the different data systems so members of communities and people can understand what the data may actually mean and I think that has, those kinds of systems have potential for all of us as we move further in this area.

FALK: It's something that we thought a lot about over the last several months in terms of response to bioterrorism and how to portray some of those hazards. So I think it's not just GIS (ph) systems, but we need to think in terms of improving technology as to how to develop, portray and assemble data in ways that are meaningful for everybody.

Second, we do work in a number of areas, some of which have been mentioned in the opening statements. I wanted to refer to one of our recent reports, a study on childhood cancer, leukemia, in Toms River, New Jersey, a study which was released in late December. Working with the New Jersey Health Department, ATSDR showed that the overall childhood cancer incidence rate in Dover township, a portion of Ocean County, was statistically significant, elevated over a period of approximately 15 years. The excess rate was primarily due to leukemia and central nervous system cancer in female, young females residing in Toms River.

Working closely with New Jersey Health Department, we designed a study to test the hypothesis that water contaminants or other substances related to Superfund sites in the area might have been related to the increase. The ATSDR contribution to that study was to conduct a very painstakingly put together model of the water distribution system over a period of 35 years and actually there are dozens of wells in the Toms River Township and they came in and out of service over the course of several decades.

And to be able to do a proper study looking at the children with cancer and comparing them to others, you actually have to know how much water from different wells came to the individual faucets in homes so then you could have some kind of proper exposure assessment and we were able to develop with these systems of experts at Georgia Tech a water distribution model which was able to estimate by month from 1962 through 1996 the percentage of water from different and as a result, we're able to show an association just for the leukemia and with prenatal exposure to water from contaminated wells.

It's unusual in cluster investigations to be able to demonstrate such an association. The lesson for me is that if one gets very precise data, in another words we get that (ph) Dover (ph) Township, not just all of Ocean County. We didn't lose the increase in Dover Township by assembling data from a much broader area and by painstakingly reconstructing the water exposure, we're able to demonstrate an association which I am sure would not have been seen if one were just comparing in a more cursory manner county data with location of Superfund site. So the lesson there is that as we embark on this work I think better data, better precision, more accuracy and assembly of all of this in ways that one can test hypotheses will be very important.

In terms of surveillance systems or tracking systems, we at ATSDR have a hazardous substance emergency events surveillance system with 16 states. This was started after the Bhopal tragedy and an attempt to keep track of smaller such releases that might occur, accidents and so we do have in 16 states and I think the data is helpful to people in most states in terms of understanding what kinds of chemicals and situations are likely to lead to releases.

We place a great deal of emphasis on developing new tracking systems. I think you're very correct that there are a limited number of diseases from which you actually do track in cancer, birth defects, asthma, but there's a whole host of diseases from which we don't and some of those figure prominently around Superfund sites, concerns about neurologic disease such as multiple sclerosis, ALS, Parkinsons, frequently raise concerns about lupus and frequently raised by people concerned about their exposures to chemicals.

Senator Clinton referred to an ATSDR report just published in a journal called "Neurology," which, looking at national health interview survey data, demonstrated what appears to be a 15 percent increase in incidents from the early '80s compared to a three-year period during the mid '90s. We have pilot surveillance efforts for multiple sclerosis underway in several communities in Ohio, Missouri and Texas because to this point, we don't really have good incidence data on how often this disease occurs throughout the population.

But of course multiple sclerosis is just one disease that comes up and I think we need to think carefully about which diseases would be particularly important in terms of, especially in terms of potential for environmental exposures being important. Exposure to asbestos is clearly one of the things that's very important to us in the Superfund program. As Senator Murray mentioned, Libby (ph), Montana, ATSDR conducted a medical screening program in Libby, Montana, primarily in the summer of 2000, but also again last summer we've examined over 7,000 people there which is a good percentage of the population in the Libby, Montana area. Eighteen percent of all the people examined, and these were basically well people, seemingly well people coming in for a screening examination, 18 percent of all those people were found to have a lung abnormality, pleural thickening related to asbestos exposure and former WR Grace workers in the community had 48 percent incidence of such abnormalities and they're related to the (inaudible) asbestos in that area which is a contaminant of vermiculite.

I think that if a tracking system such of a kind that you all are talking about had been in place, I really do think this problem would have been perceived years earlier and hopefully would have prevented considerable anguish and heartbreak and suffering in that community. The cancer death, the death certificate data, when we looked back on it now for the 1980s and 1990s definitely shows a markedly increased incidence of asbestosis, probably 50, 60 times expected rate.

So and finally let me just mention that, in terms of registry work, we are also having discussions along with many others of my colleagues to my side with New York City health department about issues potentially thinking through the ideas of what a registry in the New York area could look like and that's active discussions that we're all embarked on now. So again, I appreciate the opportunity to be here. I'd be happy to answer any questions. Thank you very much.

CLINTON: Thank you very much Dr. Falk. And our next witness, Dr. Kenneth Olden is the director of the National Institute of Environmental Health Science and a director of the National Toxicology program. He is an expert on cell and cancer biology and has won numerous awards for his work in these areas and I greatly appreciate Dr. Olden joining us today.

OLDEN: Thank you Senator Clinton. Senator Reed and Senator Murray and other members of the committee, I'm very pleased to be here today to discuss the important link between the environment and chronic diseases and disorders. Today in my oral testimony, I want to make just one point. I want to emphasize the important role that the environment plays in the development of chronic diseases and disorders. However, I want to emphasize that while my institute was invited to make this presentation, other, in fact all institutes of NIH support research on environmental aspects of various diseases.

Now let me start by saying that virtually all diseases have both a genetic and an environmental component. In fact, most diseases are caused by the interaction of three factors. One's genetics, one's environment and one's behavior. But since behavior is influenced by both genetics and the environment, then I guess disease etiology and development reduces (ph) to have been caused by genetics and the environment.

The truth is however, that there are very few diseases that are caused only by genetics. Likewise, there are very few diseases caused solely by the environment. The truth is that most diseases like cancer, Parkinsons, Alzheimer's osteoporosis, asthma, autism, diabetes, auto immune diseases are caused by genes, environment interaction. Therefore, to prevent these chronic devastated diseases, we're going to have to understand the contribution of both genetics and the environment to their development.

Now as Senator Clinton pointed out in her opening statement, the relationship between genes and the environment can be compared to that of a loaded gun and its trigger. A loaded gun by itself as you know, causes absolutely no harm. It is only when the trigger is pulled, that the potential for harm is released or initiated. Likewise, once can inherit a genetic predisposition to have a disease but never have the disease unless exposed to the environmental trigger.

Now the loaded gun is genetic susceptibility genes. There can be one or more such genes, but it's so important to understand that even though one inherits genetic predisposition genes, one may or may not have the disease as a function of whether one is exposed to the environmental trigger. So the opportunity to prevent diseases is enormous. We can control our behavior. We can regulate exposure to environmental toxins and carcinogens.

Now as Senator Clinton pointed out earlier also, twin studies represent the gold standard for differentiating between the contribution of the environment versus genetics. About two years ago, there was a landmark paper published in the "New England Journal of Medicine" by a Professor Lichtenstein (ph) and his colleagues and they were looking at 11 very common cancers and the question they asked, what percent of 11 common cancers can be attributed the major respecter (ph) to cancer versus the environment.

They concluded and I quote, genetic factors make a minor contribution to susceptibility to most types of cancers and that the environment plays the principal role in causing sporadic cancers. They looked at the 11 cancers. In fact, on average, genetics contributed to about one third of the risk for these 11 cancers. They are common cancers. The environment contributed the major risk which was about two thirds of the risk.

Now similar studies have been conducted for other diseases, for example Parkinsons disease. A few years ago, Caroline Tanner (ph) and her colleagues at the Parkinsons Foundation in California also did a twins study and they reported that on late onset Parkinsons disease, that is disease that occurs after age 65, which is the majority of Parkinsons disease, then only 15 percent of the late onset disease can be attributed to genetics. The other 85 percent was attributed to the environment. But the truth is and I want to underscore that. It's not just the environment. I think when you finally unravel the causes of most chronic disease it's going to be genes and the environment interacting together and also with one's behavior and also as a function of one's age and stage of development.

Senator Clinton mentions senior citizens and children. They are especially vulnerable and a high risk because of their age. Now because of the investment that has been made in the past 10 years in the human genome project, we now have the tools to answer the questions that Senator Clinton pointed out earlier. We could develop the tools to do the environmental monitoring, to develop the databases. Now and to answer the fundamental question that need to be answered in relationship to the genes and the environment and the respective contributions to chronic diseases.

So let me just close by mentioning three major undertakings that we've initiated at the NIH with the leadership on these three projects at NIEHS. In 1997, we initiated a major national effort at the NIH to identify and it's called the environmental genome project. It's a major effort to identify every environmental susceptibility gene in the human genome. Now there is another major effort at the NIH called the single nucleotide polymorphism project that attempts to, that addresses the same issue but that project will also identify all susceptibility genes irrespective from where they require environmental triggers or not.

So the NIH is making the investment to provide the information about susceptibility. Susceptibility is a very important issue and genetics is one of the major controlling factors in susceptibility.

We also about two year ago, started another major national effort called the national center for toxico-genomics. And this is a high throughput genomic screening method to identify the top, all the top toxic and carcinogenic agents in the environment to which you and I are exposed.

Now it is a fact that we're exposed to a number of agents in the environment and we only have good toxicological data on no more than 20 to 25 percent of those, meaning 70 to 75 percent we don't have the data on. Well that means that we're living in a state of toxic ignorance if we only had good data on 25 percent of those.

And finally, we are in initiated with collaborations with other institutions in the NIH as well as CDC large population-based study, using the technologies and the knowledge that we gain in the environmental genome project and in the National Center for Toxico- Genomics (ph).

So let me just conclude, I, we can do the science to answer the important questions and tease apart the contribution of genetics versus the environment and it is, it is probably one of the powerful ways to prevent chronic diseases and to reduce the pain and suffering and to lower health care costs. Thank you very much.

CLINTON: Thank you very much Dr. Olden. Well, I think we have been exposed to some extraordinary information and ideas and I want to thank all three of our witnesses. Dr. Jackson, if I could start with you. The HHS healthy people 2010 document states that poor environmental quality is estimated to be directly responsible for approximately 25 percent of all preventable ill health in the world. Are we doing any international work? We just heard a good description of what we're doing here in our own country in our own government. Are we doing any international surveillance with respect to the integration of the environment and health?

UNKNOWN: To my knowledge, there's not direct appropriation in this area. CDC, which I can speak to, is overseas working very actively in immunization programs, the worldwide polio eradication effort. Right now one of my staff is working on the border of Afghanistan and Pakistan. She has overseen the project for 3 1/2 million refugees have been immunized against measles, polio and other diseases. That's more than were immunized in the entire oversight period of the Taliban regime. So it's been a tremendous effort in improving health there.

We do, we, CDC, have worked very closely with the Chinese and believe it or not, China just named and created a Chinese CDC which - the word CDC has no meaning in China, but they have modeled themselves because they're interested in how to practically change the health status of that population. There are tremendous environmental problems in virtually all the developing countries around the world.

One of the projects we've been working on is a, we call it (inaudible) but in essence it's a dialogue process where the community is actually working with the experts. What usually happens, the experts come in, tell a poor community you're disenfranchised. Here's what you need to do and it never works. There really is a need for that community to own whatever the interventions would be and because of this for example in Peru, CARE has awarded over $2 1/2 million in community-based intervention programs in impoverished communities around environmental health. That said, the issues of mega cities and environmental change worldwide are extraordinarily important.

CLINTON: I hope that as we do put together our own thinking about this. We keep in mind whatever information and data we can obtain from other countries as well. I understand also that the CDC has an incentive for birth defects and is also looking at developmental disabilities including autism and cerebral palsy. How if we were to move forward on the health tracking plan, would you envision the kind of surveillance methodology that would help us address this range of chronic disease including diseases like autism and cerebral palsy.

UNKNOWN: Number one I should defer to Dr. John Harris, who is, has actively managed one of the largest state birth defects registries in the country and basically the California one. That said, those require active surveillance for many of these developmental disorders. And what I mean by active surveillance is you can't sit back and have these reports appear on someone's desk.

In these programs, we have actually had to have abstracters, individuals go out to the hospitals and track these cases down. You got to make sure you're not counting the same person three times over. And for many of these problems, they don't appear until a child is three, four or five years of age. So this will be labor intensive. It is important to pick end points that you can measure early on and let me just say, bad data is worse than no data at all. You're better off doing it well in smaller areas than trying to do it poorly in large areas.

CLINTON: Thank you. Dr. Falk, I want to thank you also for what you're doing at the World Trade Center to help set up the registry of workers and residents in lower Manhattan. That's a very important effort and you talk in your testimony about ATSDR's authority to develop and maintain registries. How much, do you have any sense of how much additional resources and assistance you'd need in order to develop a more comprehensive nationwide health tracking network?

FALK: I think that's a very important question. At ATSDR over the last 20 years, the only registries that were developed and I arrived at ATSDR a little over two years ago. But historically the only registries that were developed were groups of people exposed to specific chemical substances such as dioxin, such as trichloroethylene who can then be tracked over time so we can learn more about the relationship between those chemicals and potential long-term effects. Before I came, there were discussions but actually no serious effort to start any type of national disease registry and I think the whole concept was just daunting to a relatively small agency like ATSDR.

I am particularly interested in this because it's clearly a concern at sites and so I am very aware of your interest and how it could mesh with what we do at Superfund sites. But I think it will require considerable attention, a step up in training and resources available, probably to health state departments, capacity to do these things. So it's I think just one thinks of the efforts to set up cancer registries or birth defects registries around the country. It takes no real effort and development of expertise locally in state health departments.

One of the things that's important in terms of thinking about disease surveillance is that it's not just a matter of adding another disease to somebody's reporting system so that for example if one wants to do surveillance for autism, one really has to think of the kinds of people who are treating children with autism and are collecting that data. If one is thinking about pulmonary diseases related to asbestos, that's a different group of physicians who are maintaining those records. Similarly multiple sclerosis and neurologists or lupus and rheumatologists, so it is a more intensive effort than simply advising someone to check off yet another disease.

CLINTON: I think that Dr. Olden's testimony drives home for me that the extraordinary breakthroughs we've had from the human genome project, you know, five, 10 years ago, we could not have even had this discussion and it would not have been likely that we could be talking about a health tracking system to try to make those distinctions between genetics and the environment. But I am very impressed with the emphasis that you're placing on this interaction between the environment and genetics and to try to find out more about susceptibility. You talked about the children's longitudinal study in your testimony. What environmental, behavioral and psycho-social factors will the study observe and how will those exposures be measured?

OLDEN: The study is just in the process of being designed and so I don't know. We've brought together a number of experts and the design of the study will take another year or so. But and it's a government effort. We are one of the four co-leaders but I guess today none of us could say exactly what the ultimate design will look like. But we're going to look at a whole host of factors and certainly behavior will be one of them and probably the most significant one because children's behavior is very different from that of adults. As a consequence, their exposure would be very different from that of adults. But in terms of specifics, we don't have them in place yet Senator Clinton.

CLINTON: We will look forward to receiving information as you go forward with that. Senator Reed.

REED: Thank you very much Senator Clinton. Thank you gentlemen for your testimony and for your work and again, let me commend Dr. Falk. You and your colleagues have - we were talking on Monday when they came up to my office in Rhode Island and they're doing a very good job of identifying the current problem. But then we talked about the long-term surveillance and they indicated quite clearly that's not within their purview or their ability and that falls back upon the state. So it raises a question I'd like to raise with all you gentlemen. But if we do this, we're going to have to have the states become involved, nature, health departments. And many times my observation is what little resources that you have, they have even less for public health problems. And then if we're really serious about developing a national system we have to have a concomitant obligation and enthusiasm on the state level and I wonder if you might comment just generally Dr. Jackson, Dr. Falk, Dr. Olden.

FALK: Thank you very much and I'm glad the ATSDR team was able to be helpful and we'll do whatever we can to...

REED: Thank you.

FALK: ... to assist you in Rhode Island. You're correct that. When one thinks about tracking systems and developing data, one really has to think of how it's collected locally and collated and then maybe it's assembled nationally and interpreted, and but really the strength of the state and local health systems in terms of collecting, working with the data, assembling it, knowing their local communities and what it may mean is obviously very essential. So I think for I'm sure for all of us as we think about any kind of environmental tracking system, it must start with a very strong foundation in state and local health departments.

REED: Dr. Jackson.

JACKSON: Frequently when one is trained to grapple with a very large and difficult problem, the tendency is to want to buy things, computers or systems or vaccines or antidotes and the important part of this investment in many ways is a very well trained competent workforce. You can't do this unless there are people that can pull together and weave together these strands, interpret them and then interact with both elected officials and with communities in a very reasonable way.

Twenty to 30 percent of all the local health department staff are environmental health people and yet precious little satellite training, web-based training, development of these people goes on right now. It really is something that absolutely has to be done.

REED: Is there - following up Dr. Jackson, is there any agency of the Federal government that's invested in this notion of training in a systematic way?

JACKSON: CDC does training but it's mainly done in the infectious disease area. I would say we've not done anywhere near as much in the environmental arena. The HRSA (ph) health group at HHS does some training. It's more for their HRSA clinics and their clientele as well and EPA of course does a lot of training but it's more on the engineering and legal side, rather than on the health side.

REED: Dr. Olden.

OLDEN: Let me just be brief and say that the research endeavors and our capacity to translate our results into public health policy in the practice of medicine. In the future it's going to require partnership, not only with state and city health officials, but also with communities and health care practitioners. So I think the wave of the future is collaboration and partnerships, at least that's what we're thinking in the National Institutes of Health.

REED: Thank you Doctor. We all recognize this is a very complicated problem in terms of technical issues and systems that talk to each other with common data and well-trained individuals. Let me add a further complicating issue. In regard to birth defect registries and surveillance, we have heard some comments that state privacy laws are inhibiting the free flow of information. And that raises the general question of whether both state and Federal legitimate concerns about protecting privacy, would present real challenges to developing surveillance systems.

JACKSON? : I would defer to Dr. Harris and the later speakers number one. That said, the information that for example, CDC collects, I cannot think of any situation where there has been a breach of privacy and we collect enormous amounts of information from the (inaudible) surveys to STD and many others. It is absolutely essential that the coding, the encryption, the privacy be maintained. At the same time if the public wants to know what its disease rates are, we're going to have to have some kind of access to records.

REED: Any other comments?

FALK? : I think these are particular concerns especially in areas where total numbers of cases of one thing or another may be relatively small in rural areas and especial concerns that I know the CDC statistical groups do in dealing with small areas where there may be much greater knowledge of what particular cases, who that might refer to.

OLDEN: I would just say, using contemporary genomic technologies, we're going to be able to generate a lot of information, a lot of data about issues like susceptibility (ph) and so in this kind of environment, clearly privacy concerns become very important.

REED: Thank you very much. Thank you Madam Chairman.

CLINTON: Senator Murray.

MURRAY: Thank you very much Madam Chairman and thank all of our witnesses today for their very important testimony. It's a very interesting and difficult issue we're all trying to grapple with. As I mentioned in my statement and you referred to too Dr. Falk, I have been very concerned about the issue of exposure to unhealthy concentrations of asbestos and this came to my attention because of what had happened in Libby, (ph) Montana. I know the chairwoman and Senator Clinton is very concerned as well about what's happening at ground zero. It's my understanding Dr. Falk, that your agency has been working with the EPA's office of solid waste and emergency response to review county health data to determine whether or not there are high exposures in other areas of the country. Can you update us on what you know about that or what you're seeing out there that we should be aware of.

FALK: Well, the - we have looked at the data in Libby, Montana and the surrounding portion of Lincoln County and we've looked at mortality data as well as morbidity data, illnesses reported to local physicians and pulmonary specialists and the screening that we did in the medical testing, so we're putting together a picture in the Libby, Montana area from the mild to more severe disease.

I think what you're referring to is that the vermiculite from the Libby, Montana area was shipped elsewhere in the country and the nature of processing vermiculite is when you heat it, it pops, kind of really like popcorn and so it's easier to ship it first and then process it in local areas where it's then used commercially and we have developed a protocol at ATSDR which we shared with a number of the state health departments so that the state health departments can look at mortality and morbidity, cancer registry data in their areas in a uniform way and look at whether any of those particular processing plants around the country seem to be related to disease in those areas. We have funded seven state health departments to do this work and that is ongoing. I don't have the results for that yet but they are looking for an incidence of mesothelioma, lung cancer.

MURRAY: How long will that take to...?

FALK: I think we will have that possibly later this spring so probably in maybe several months is my impression and we also in three states we are also working with and I believe that's New York, New Jersey and Wisconsin. We are working with them to look at their tumor registries and look at mesothelioma occurrence in their tumor registries and work backwards from that to see if there might be cases of mesothelioma that seemed to relate to vermiculite asbestos exposures.

When the National Cancer Institute looks at mesothelioma data, I believe that they can - there's a readily understandable link to asbestos exposure in a majority of cases, approximately two thirds but there are some case of mesothelioma which the link to asbestos is not understood and one of my concerns is that perhaps this could be related to associations with asbestos that were not appreciated previously like with vermiculite products or insulation or so on. So we're working with those three states to look at their mesothelioma data and see if there's any link and I'm not sure of the date when we'll have that information but I think that will take a little bit longer than the health statistics reviews.

MURRAY: When you have that, I would very much like to be brought up to date on what you have. I'm very concerned about this issue and continuing exposure. I know Senator Clinton shares that with me and I want to work with you to do what we can. Of course when we get that information the challenge then is to educate people about what the risks are and to do what we need to do in order to prevent others from being exposed as well and that includes all (inaudible) asbestos to other environmental factors that can trigger risks. And I'm curious how do we disseminate information? I know we're trying to let pregnant women know that right now, with the dangers of mercury, high mercury levels in fish, but how do you let people know once you have the access to the information and you know that there is an environmental link and people need to be (inaudible)?

FALK: Well, ATSDR, so much of that work is related to Superfund sites. We actually work in communities and around those sites. We work at about 500 sites per year so that our health education, risk communication programs at ATSDR are very heavily focused on communities involved. So for example, in the Libby, Montana area, we have a number of different ways by which we try to do community health education such as health fairs and materials and programs that are available to members of the community. We've had professional education programs for the physicians to make sure they're all aware of the different (inaudible) and potential complications from asbestos exposure. We provide many training materials such as case studies in environmental medicine that physicians can do for continuing medical education with tox specs and tox profile information. So we have a broad variety of educational materials which can be distributed more widely.
